If therefore the Mamertines, by no lawfull surrendrie of themselves and their possessions, were become subject vnto Rome, by what better title could the Romans assilt the Mamertines, against their most ancient friends the Carthaginians, than they might haue aided the Campanes, against the Samites, without the same condition? which was (as they themselves confessed) by none at all. But let it bee supposed, that some point serving to cleare this doubt, is lost in all Histories. Doubtlesse it is, that no companie, of Pirates, Theeues, Our-lawes, Murderers, or such other malefactors, can by any good successe of their villanie, obtaine the priuilege of ciuill societies, to make league, or truce, yea, or to require faire warre: but are by all means, as most pernicious vermine, to be rooted out of the world. I will not take vpon me, to maintaine that opinion of some Ciuitians, that a Prince is not bound to hold his faith, with one of these; it were a Position of ill consequence: This I hold; that no one Prince, or State, can giue protection to such as these, as long as any other is viting the sword of vengeance against them, without becoming accessarie to their crimes. Wherefore, we may esteeme this action of the Romans, so farre from being justifiable, by any pretence of Confederacie made with them; as that contrariwise, by admitting this nest of Murderers and Theeues, into their protection, they justly deserved to be warred vpon themselves, by the people of Sicily; yea, although Messana had bene taken, and the Mamertines all slain, ere any newes of this Confederacie had bene brought vnto the besiegers. The great Alexander was so farre perswaded herein; that he did put to sword all the Branchidae (a people in Sogdiana) and razed their Citie, notwithstanding that they joyfully entertained him as their Lord and King; because they were defended from a Companie of Atreusians, who to gratifie King Alexes, had robbed a Temple, and were by him rewarded with the Towne and Countre, which these of their posteritie enjoyed. Neuertheless, in course of humane iustice, long and peaceable possession giues ius acquiritum, a kinde of right by prescription, vnto that which was at first obtained by wicked meanes: and doth free the descendants, from the crime of their Ancestors, whose villanies they doe not exercise. But that the same generation of Theeues, which by a detestable but hath purchased a rich Towne, should be acknowledged a lawfull companie of Citizens, there is no thew of right. For euen the Conquerour, that by open warre obtaineth a Kingdome, doth not confirme his title, by those victories which gaue him first possession: but length of time is requisite, to establish him, vnlesse by some

some alliance with the ancient inheritors, hee can better the violence of his claime; as did our King Henrie the first, by his marriage with Maud, that was daughter of Malcolm, King of the Scots, by Margaret, the Neece of Edmund Ironside. Wherefore I conclude, that the Romans had no better ground (if they had so good) of iustice, in this quarrell, than had the Gethes, Hunnes, Vandalles, and other Nations, of the warres that they made vpon the Roman Empire, wherein Rome her selfe, in the time of her visitation; was burnt to ground.

§. IIII. Of the Island of Sicily.

1. I.

The qualitie of the Land: and the first Inhabitants thereof.

THe defence of the Mamertines, or the possession of Messana, being now no longer, since the first victories of Appius Claudius, the objects of the Roman hopes; but the Dominion of all Sicily being the prize, for which Rome and Carthage, are about to contend: it will be agreeable vnto the order, which in the like cases we haue obserued, to make a briefe collection, of things, concerning that noble Island, which hath bene the stage of many great acts, performed, as well before and after, as in this present Warre.

That Sicily was sometimes a Peninsula, or Pemie-Ile, adjoynt to Italie, as a part of Bruttium in Calabria, neare vnto Rhegium, and afterward by violence of tempest seuered from the same: it is a generall opinion of all antiquitie. But at what certaine time this diuision happened, there is no memoriall remayning, in any ancient writer. Strabo, Plinie, and Dionysius, affirme, that it was caused by an earthquake; Strabo, Plinie, and Cassiodorus, doe thinke it to haue bene done by the rage and violence of Sicily. the tide, and luges of the Sea. Either of these opinions may be true; for so was Euboea seuered from Bœotia; Atlante and Maoris, from Eubœa; Sittia here in England, from the Cape of Cornwall; and Britaine it selfe (as may seeme by Perseus arguments) from the opposite continent of Gaulle. But for Sicily, they which lend their eares to fables, doe attribute the cause of it to Neptune (as Eustathius witnesseth) who with his three forked Mace, in fauour of Iocastus, the sonne of Æolus, diuided it from the maine land, and so made it an Island, which before was but a Pemie-Ile; that by that meanes, hee might the more safely inhabit, and possesse the same. Diodorus Siculus, moued by the authority of Hesiodus, ascribeth the labour of sundring it from Italie, to Orion: who, that he might be compared to Hercules (cutting through the rocks and mountaines) first opened the Sietian streights, as Hercules did those of Gibraltar.

They which value the Islands of the mid-land Sea, according to their quantitie and content, doe make this the greatest, as Eustathius and Strabo, who affirme this, not only to excell the rest for bignesse, but also for goodnesse of soile. As concerning the forme of this Island, Pomponius Mela, saith, it is like that Capitall letter of the Greeke, which they call Delta, namely, that it hath the figure of a triangle; which is generally knowen to be true. That the whole Land was consecrated to Ceres and Proserpina, all old writers with one consent affirme. To Ceres it was dedicated, because it first taught the rules of letting and sowing of Corn; to Proserpina, not so much, for that shee was from hence violently taken by Pluto, as because (which Plutarch rich and Diodorus doe report for truth) that Pluto, as soone as three, vncouering be-selfe, first shewed her selfe to be scene of him, gaue her the Dominion thereof.

Of the fertile and riches of this Countrey, there is a famous testimonie written by Cicero, in his second Oration against Verres, where he saith, that Marcus Cato did call it the Granarie, and Storehouse of the Common-wealth, and the Nurse of the vulgar sers. The same Cicero doth adde in that place, that it was not only the store-houle of the people of Rome: but also that it was accounted for a well furnished treasure.
 For without any cost or charge of ours (saith he) it hath vsually clothed, maintained, and furnished, our greatest Armies, with leather, apparel, and corn. Strabo reporteth almost the same thing oft. Whatsoever Stellæ doth yeeld (saith Solinus) whether by the Sunne, and temperature of the aire, or by the indutrie and labour of man, it is accounted next vnto those things that are of best estimation: were it not, that such things, as the earth first putteth forth, are extremely ouer-grown with fallow. Diodorus Siculus saith, that in the fields, neare vnto Leontium, and in diuers other places of this Iland, wheat doth grow of it selfe, without any labour, or looking to, of the husbandman. Martianus sheweth, that there were in it fixe Colonies, and fixtie Cities: there are that reckon more, whereof the names are found scatteringly in many good Authours.

Now besides many famous acts, done by the people of this Iland, as well in peace as warre: there be many other things, which haue made it very renowned, as the birth of Ceres; the rauishing of Proserpina; the Giant Enceladus; the mount Aetna, Seylla and Charibdis, with other antiquities, and rarities: besides those learned men, the noble Mathematician Archimedes; the famous Geometrician Euclides; the painfull Historian Diodorus; and Empedocles the deepe Philosopher.

That Sicil was at first possessed and inhabited by Giants Lestrigones, and Cyclo- pes, barbarous people, and vnciuill; all histories and fables doe joyntly with one consent auerre. Yet Thucydides saith, that these sauage people dwelt only in one part of the Iland. Afterward the Sicani, a people of Spaine, possessed it. That these Sicani were not bred in the Isle (although some doe so thinke,) Thucydides and Dio- dorus doe constantly auouch.

Of these it was named Sicania. These Sicani were invaded by the Siculi; who inhabiting that part of Latium, whereon Rome was afterward built, were driven by the Pelagi from their owne leates, and finding no place vpon the continent, which they were able to master and inhabite, passed ouer into this Iland, three hundred yeares before the Greekes sent any Colonies thither: and (saith Philistus) eightie yeares before the fall of Troy. These Siculi gaue the name of Sicilia, to the Iland; and making warre vpon the Sicani, draue them from the East and Northerne part thereof, into the West and South. At their landing, they first built the Citie Zante, afterward called Messena; and after that, Catana, Leontium, and Syracuse; the last, becoming thence the Aetolians, who long before had set vpa Towne in that place.
 As for the name of Syracuse, it was not knowne, till such time as Archias of Corinth (long after) wonne that part of the Iland from the Siculi; Neither did the Siculi at their first arriall dispossesse the Aetolians thereof, but some hundred yeares after their descent, and after such time as they had founded the Cities before named, with Naxos, Hybla, Trinacia, and diuers others.

After these Siculi came another Nation out of Italie, called Morgetes; who were thence driven by the Oenotrians. These sate downe in that part of Sicil, where they afterward raised the Cities of Morgentium, and Leontium. For at this time the Siculi were diuided, and by a ciuill warre greatly infeebled. Among these ancient stories, we finde the last voyage, and the death of Minos, King of Creet. Thucydides, an Historian of unquestionable sinceritie, reports of Minos, that he made conquest of many Ilands: and some such businesse, perhaps, drew him into Sicil. But the common report is that he came thither in pursuit of Daedalus. The tale goes thus:
Daedalus fleeing the reuenge of Minos, came into Sicil to Cocalus, King of the Sicani, and

and during his aboade there, he built a place of great strength, neare vnto Alegria, for Cocalus, to lay vp his treasure in; together with many notable works, for which he was greatly admired and honoured.

Among the rest, he callt a Ramine in gold, that was set vp in the Temple of Pe- nni Ergini; which he did with so great arte, as those that beheld it, thought it rather to be liuing, than counterfeit.

Now Minos, hearing that Cocalus had entertained Daedalus, prepares to invade the Territorie of Cocalus; but when he was arriued, Cocalus doubting his owne strength, promitteth to deliuer Daedalus. This he performs not, but in the meane while, kills 10 Minos by treason, and perswades the Cretans; Minos's followers, to inhabite a part of Sicil; the better (as it seemes) to strengthen himselfe against the Sicani. Hereunto the Cretans (their King being dead) gaue their consent, and builded for themselves the Citie of Minos, after the name of their King Minos. After, they likewise built the Towne of Engyum, now called Gange; and these were the first Cities, built by the Greeks in Sicil, about two ages before the fall of Troy; for the grand children of Minos serued with the Greeks at the siege of Troie.

But after such time as the Cretans vnderstood, that their King had by treason bene made away; they gathered together a great Armie, to invade Cocalus: and landing neare vnto Camicus, they belieged the same fixe yeares but in vaine. In the 20 end (being forced to returne, without any reuenge taken) they were wrackt on the coast of Italie; and hauing no means to repaire their ships, nor the honor they had lost, they made good the place whereon they fell, and built Hyris, or Hyrium, be-twene the two famous Ports of Brundisium, and Tarentum. Of these Cretans came those Nations, afterward called Iapyges, and Messapij.

After the taking of Troy, Aegleus and Elymus, brought with them certaine troups into Sicil, and feared themselves among the Sicani; where they built the Cities of Aegleus and Elyma.

It is said, that Aeneas visited these places in his passage into Italie: and that some of the Troians, his followers, were left behinde him, in these Townes of Sicil:
 30 whereof there want not good Authours, that make Aeneas himselfe the founder.

About the same time, the Phenicians seized vpon the Promontories of Pachinus, and Lilybeum, and vpon certaine small Isles adioyning to the maine Iland: which they fortified, to secure the trades, that they had with the Sicilians; like as the Por- tugals haue done in the East India, at Goa, Ormuz, Mosambiq, and other places. But the Phenicians staid not there; for after they had once assured their descents, they built the goodly Citie of Panormus, now called Palerma.

These we finde, were the Nations, that inhabited the Isle of Sicil, before the warre of Troy, and ere the Greeks in any numbers began to straggle in those parts.

It may perchance seeme strange to the Reader, that in all ancient storie, he findes 40 one and the same beginning of Nations, after the flood; and that the first planters of all parts of the World, were said to bee nightie and Giantlike men, and chat, as Phenicia, Egypt, Lybia, and Greece, had Hercules, Orestes, Antaeus, Typhon, and the like; as Denmarke had Starobaterus, remembered by Saxo Grammaticus; as Seythia, Britanie, and other Regions, had Giants for their first Inhabitants; so this Isle of Sicil had her Lestrigones and Cyclopes. This discourse I could also reject for famed and fabulous; did not Maso make vs know, that the Zamzummim; Emims; Asa- kims, and Og of Basin, with others, which sometime inhabited the Mountaines and Deserts of Morab, Ammon, and Mount Seir, were men of exceeding strength and stature, and of the races of Giants: and were it not, that Tertullian, St. Augustine, Vi- 50 cephorus, Procopius, Isidore, Plinius, Diodore, Herodotus, Solinus, Plutarch, and many other Authours, haue confirmed the opinion. Yea, Plutarch, in his second Nautication into America, hath reported, that himselfe hath seene the like men in those parts. Again, whereas the selfe-same is written of all Nations, that is written of any one; as touching their implicitie of life, their meane fare, their feeding on ac-

cornes and roots, their poore cottages, the couering of their bodies, with the skins of beaſts, their hunting, their armes, and weapons, and their warfare, their firſt paſſages ouer great Riuer, and armes of the Sea, vpon rafts of trees tied together, and afterward, their making boats, firſt, of twigs and leather, then of wood; firſt, with Oares, and then with ſaile; that they eſteemed as Gods, the firſt finders out of Arts; as of Huſbandrie, of Lawes, and of Policie: it is a matter, that makes me neither to wonder at, nor to doubt of it. For they all liued in the ſame newneſſe of time, which we call Oldtime, and had all the ſame want of his inſtruction, which (after the Creator of all things) hath by degrees taught all Mankind. For other teaching had they none, that were removed farre off from the Hebrewes, who inherited the knowledge of the firſt Patriarchs, than that from variable effects they beganne, by time and degrees, to finde out the cauſes: from whence came Philoſophie Naturall; as the Moral did diſt from diſorder and conſuſion; and the Law from crueltie and oppreſſion.

But it is certaine, that the Age of Time hath brought forth ſtranger and more incredible things, than the Infancie. For we haue now greater Giants, for vice and iniuſtice, than the World had in thoſe daies, for bodily ſtrength; for cottages and houſes of clay and timber, we haue raiſed Palaces of ſtone; we carue them, we paint them, and adorne them with gold; inſomuch as men are rather knowne by their houſes, than their bodies by them; we are fallen from two diſhes, to two hundred; from water, to wine and drunkenneſſe; from the couering of our bodies with the ſkinnes of beaſts, not only to ſilke and gold, but to the very ſkinnes of men. But to conclude this digreſſion, Time will alſo take reuenge of the exceſſe, which it hath brought forth; Quam longa dies peperit, longiorq; auſcit, longiſſima ſubruit; Long time brought forth, longer time increaſed it, and a time, longer than the reſt, ſhall overthrow it.

†. I. I.

The plantation of the Greeks in Sicil.

WHEN the firſt inhabitants had contended long enough about the Dominion of all Sicil: it happened, that one Theodes, a Greece, being driuen vpon that coaſt by an Eaſterly winde; and finding true the commendations thereof, which had bene thought fabulous, being deliuered only by Poets; gaue information to the Athenians of this his diſcouerie, and propoſed vnto them the benefit of this eaſie conqueſt, offering to become their guide. But Theodes was ſo little regarded by the Athenians, as Columbus, in our Grand-fathers times, was by the Engliſh. Wherefore hee tooke the ſame courſe, that Columbus afterwards did. Hee ouer-laboured not himſelfe in perſwading the noble Athenians (who thought themſelues to bee well enough already) to their owne profit; but went to the Chalcidians, that were needie and induſtrious, by whom his project was gladly entertained. By theſe was built the Citie of Naxos, and a Colonie planted of Eubeans.

But theſe of the Greekes were wiſer than our weſterne Princes of Europe: for they had no Pope, that ſhould forbid them, to occupie the void places of the World. Archias of Corinth followed the Eubeans, and landed in Sicil, neare vnto that Citie, called afterward * Syracule: of which, that part only was then compaſſed with a * Syracule, at Cero relates, was the greateſt, and moſt goodly Citie of all that the Greeks poſſeſt. For, the ſituation is both ſtrong, and of an excellent proſpect, from euery entrance, by Land, or Sea. The Port was (for the moſt part) enuironed with beautifull buildings; and that part which was without the Citie, was on both ſides bankt vp, and ſuſtained with beautifull walls of Marble. The Citie it ſelfe was one of the greateſt of the World: for it had in compaſſe (as Syracule reporteth) without the treble wall thereof, 186. furlongs; which made of our miles ſhore 18. It was compounded of foure Cities, (Strato ſaith of five) to wit, Infula, Acradina, Tycha, and Neapolis: of which greateſt, the ruines and foundations of the walls doe yet winneſe.

wall, which the Ætolians called Homohermen; the Greeks, Nafus; the Latines, Infula. He with his Corinthians hauing ouer-come the Siculi, draue them vp into the Countrey; and after a few yeares, their multitudes increaſing, they added vnto the Citie of the Iſland, that of Acradina, Tycha, and Neapolis. So as well by the commoditie of the double Port, capable of as many ſhips, as any Hauen of that part of Europe, as by the fertilitye of the ſoile; Syracule grew vp in great haſte, to be one of the goodlieſt Townes of the World. In ſhort time the Greekes did poſſeſſe the better part of all the Sea coaſt; forcing the Sicilians to withdraw themſelues into the ſaile and mountainous parts of the Iſland, making their Roiall reſidence in

Some ſeuene yeares after the arriuall of Archias; the Chalcidians, encouraged by the ſucceſſe of the Corinthians, did aſſaile, and obtayne the Citie of Leontium, burnt and poſſeſt by the Siculi. In briefe, the Greekes winne from the Siculi, and their Associates, the Cities of Catana, and Hybla, which, in honour of the Megarians that ſore it, they called Megara.

About hie and ſortie yeares after Archias had taken Syracule; Antipheas; and Enimius, the one from Rhodes, the other from Crete, brought an Arme into Sicil, and built Gela; whole Citizens, one hundred and eight yeares after, did erect that magnificent and renowned Citie of Agriuentum, gouerned according to the Lawes

20 of the Dorians.

The Syraculians alſo, in the ſeuentieth yeare after their plantation, did ſet vp the Citie of Akra, in the Mountaines; and in the ninetieth yeare Casmene, in the Planes adjoining; and againe, in the hundred and thirtieth yeare of their dwelling in Syracule, they built Camerina; and ſoone after that, Enna, in the very Center of the Iſland. So did the Cumani, about the ſame time, recover from the Siculi the Citie of Zande, which they had founded in the ſtreight betwene Sicil and Italic. They of Zande had bene founders of Himera.

Not long after this, Dorians the Lae Leontinior built Heraclia; which the Phenicians, and Carthaginians, fearing the Neighbourhood of the Spartans, ſoone after inaded and ruined, though the ſame were againe ere long re-edified. Selinus alſo was built by a Colonie of Megara; and Zande was taken by the Aſſeſſenians; who hauing loſt their owne Countrey, gaue the name thereof vnto this their new purchaſe. Such were the beginnings of the greateſt Cities in this Iſland.

†. I. I.

Of the gouernement and affaires of Sicil, before DIONYSIUS his Tyrannie.

THE moſt part of the Cities in Sicil, were gouerned by the rule of the people, till ſuch time as Phalaris beganne to ſurpe the ſtate of Agriuentum, and to exerciſe all manner of tyrannie therein.

This was that Phalaris, to whom Perillus, the cunning Artificer of a deteſtable Engine, gaue an hollow Bull of braſſe, wherein to encloſe men, and ſcorch them to death: praiſing the deuiſe with this commendation; That the noiſe of one tormented therein, ſhould bee like vnto the bellowing of a Bull. The Tyrant gaue a due reward to the Inuentour; by cauſing the firſt trial to be made vpon himſelfe. Hee reigned one and thirtie yeares, ſaith Eufebus; others giue him but ſixteene: How ſoouer it were, one Telemachus, in the end, fell vpon him with the whole multitude of Agriuentum, and ſtoned him to death; being thereto animated by Zeno,

even whilst the Tyrant was tormenting the same Zeno, to make him confesse some matter of conspiracie.

After the death of Phalaris, the Citizens recovered their libertie, and enjoyed it long, till Thero usurped the gouernement of the Common-weale: at which time lo Panastus made himselfe Lord of Leontium; and Cleander of Gela: but Cleander, hauing ruled seuen yeares, was slaine by one of the Citizens. Cleander being dead, his brother Hippocrates succeeded in his roome, and greatly afflicted the people of Naxos, of Zancle or Messena, and of Leontium; whom with diuers other of the ancient Inhabitants, he forced to acknowledge him their Lord. He also made warre with the Syracusanians, and, in the end, got from them, by composition, the Citie of Camerina. But when he had reigned nune yeares, he was slaine in a battaile against the Siculi, before Sylla.

At this time did the Syracusanians change their forme of Gouernement, from Popular to Aristocratically, a preparation towards a Principalltie, whereinto it was loone after changed. After the death of Hippocrates, Gelon (descended from the Euboeians, which together with the Cretans had long before, among other of the Greekes, seated themselves in Sicily) that had commanded the forces of Hippocrates, in the former warre, with notable successe, became Lord of Gela. Hee, after his Masters death, breaking the trust committed vnto him by Hippocrates ouer his children, and being in possession of Gela, took the occasion and aduantage of a contention in Syracuse, betweene the Magistrates and the People. For comming with a strong Armie to the succour of the Gouernours, driuen out by the multitude, they elected him their Prince, being the first, and (indeede) the most famous, that euer gouerned the Syracusanians. This change happened in the second yeare of the threecore and twelfth Olympiad; wherein the better to establish himselfe, he tooke to wife the Daughter of Thero, who had also usurped the state of Agirgentum.

Now this Gelon, the sonne of Dinomenes, had three brethren; Hiero, Polydorus, and Thrasybulus: to the first of which hee gaue vp the Citie of Gela, when hee had obtaigned the Principalltie of Syracuse. For, after that time, all his thoughts traualled in the strenghtning, beautifying, and amplifying of Syracuse. He defaced Camerina, that a little before was fallen from the obedience of the Syracusanians who built it; and brought the Citizens to Syracuse. The Sicilianians that had moued a warre against him, he ouer-came; the richer sort he brought to Syracuse; and the people he sold for slaues. In like manner dealt he with other places vpon like occasion. Not long after this, Thero, a Prince of the Agirgentines, hauing dispossessed Terillus, of his Citie Himera; the Carthaginians were drawne into the quarrell by Anaxilus, Lord of Messena, Father-in-law to Terillus: and Gelon also was solicited by his Father-in-law, Thero. Gelon was content, and in fine, after diuers conflicts, the Carthaginians, and other Africans, led by Amilcar, were ouerthrowne by Gelon: and an hundred and fiftie thousand of them left their bodies in Sicily.

This Gelon it was, to whom the Athenians and Lacedaemonians sent for succour, when Xerxes with his huge Armie past the Hellepont. Hee, for their reliefe hauing armed thirtie thousand Souldiers, and two hundred ships, refused neuerthelesse to send them into Greece; because they refused him the commandement of one of their Armies, either by Sea or by Land. So he ueltd to their Embassadors only this saying, That their Spring was withered; accompting the Armie, by him prepared, to be the flower of the Greece Nations.

The Carthaginians, after this great losse receiued, fearing the inuasion of their owne Countrey, sent to Gelon by their Embassadors, to desire peace; who graunts it them on these conditions; That from thenceforth they should not sacrifice their children to Saturne; That they should pay him two thousand talents of siluer; and present him with two armed ships, in signe of amitie. These conditions the Carthaginians, not only willingly accepted, but with the two thousand talents, and the ships for warre, they sent vnto Demarata; Gelon's wife, a crowne, valued at an hundred hundred talents of gold, with other presents. Whereby we see, that some Nations, and some Natures, are much the better for being well beaten. The warres ended; and Sicily in peace; Gelon beautified the Temples of the Gods, and created others in honour of them. So being exceedingly beloued and honoured of his Subjects, he left the World, and left for his Successour his brother Thero. Philistius and Punic report, That, when his bodie was burnt, according to the custome of that Age, a Dogge of his, which alwaies waited on him, ranne into the fire, and suffered himselfe to be burnt with him.

To Gelon, Thero his brother succeeded; a man rude, cruell, couetous, and so suspicious of his brethren Polydorus, and Thrasybulus, as hee sought by all means to destroy them. Notwithstanding all this; by the conseruation which hee had with Amilcar, he became of better condition, and greatly delighted with the studie of good Arts. Diuers quarrells he had, as well with Theron of Agirgentum, as with other Cities: all which he shortly after compounded, and gaue a notable ouerthrow to the Carthaginians, whom Xerxes had incited to invade Sicily, fearing the succours which Gelon had prepared, to aide the Grecians, against him. Hee also ouerthrew in battaile Thrasydians, the sonne of Theron, and thereby restored the Agirgentines to their former libertie. But in the end hee lost the loue of the Syracusanians; and after he had reigned eleuen yeares, he left the Kingdome to his brother Thrasybulus, who became a most vnjust and bloudie Tyrant. Thrasybulus enjoyed his Principalltie no longer than ten moneths. For, notwithstanding the force of mercinarie Souldiers, which he entertained for his guards, he was beaten out of Syracuse by the Citizens; to whom, being besieged in Acradina, he restored the gouernement, and was banished the Iland. From whence he sailed into Greece, where he died a priuate man, among the Locrians.

And now had the Syracusanians recovered againe their former libertie, as all the rest of the Cities did, after which they had neuer fought, had the Successours of Gelon inherited his vertue, as they did the Principalltie of Syracuse. For in all changes of Estates, the preseruacion ought to answer the acquisition. Where a liberall, valiant, and aduised Prince, hath obtaigned any new Signiorie, and added it to that of his owne, or exalted himselfe from being a priuate man, to the dignitie of a Prince; it becometh the Successour to maintaine it by the same way and arte, by which it was gotten.

To conclude, Syracuse (though not without blowes, ere shee could cleanse herselfe of the creatures and louers of Gelon) was now againe become Mistresse of her selfe, and held her selfe free, well neare threecore yeares, to the time of Dionysius; though there were in the meane while greatly indangered, by a Citizen of her owne, called Tyndarus.

Now, to prevent the greatnesse of any one among them, for the future, they devised a kinde of banishment of such among them, as were suspected; taking patterne from the Athenian Ostracisme. They called this their new deuised iudgement of exile, Petalismus, wherein euery one wrote vpon an Olive leafe (as at Athen) they wrote vpon shells) the name of him, whom hee would haue expelled the Citie. Hee that had most suffrages against him, was banished for five yeares. Hereby, in a short time, it came to passe, that those of iudgement, and best able to gouerne the Common-weale, were by the worst able either suppressed or thrust out of the Citie. Yea, such as feared this Law, though they had not yet felt it, withdrew themselves as secretly as they could; seeking some place of more securitie, wherein to maintaine themselves. And good reason they had so to doe; seeing there is nothing so terrible in any State, as a powerfull and authorized ignorance. But this Law lasted not long. For their necessity taught them to abolish it, and restore againe the wiser sort to the Gouernement; from which, the Nobilitie hauing practised to banish one another, the State became altogether Popular. But after a while, being inuaded by Dionysius, King of the Sicilians, that inhabited the inner part of the Iland (who had already taken Enna, and some other of the Græcian Cities, and overthrowne the Armie of the Agregetines) the Syracufians sent forces against him, commanded by an unworthy Citizen of theirs, called Bolcon. This their Captain made nothing so much haile to finde Ducitus, against whom he was employed, as he did to flee from the Armie he led, as soone as Ducitus presented him battaile. So, for want of conduct, the greatest number of the Syracufians perished.

But making better choice among those, whom they had banished, they leue other troops: by whom, in conclusion, Ducitus being beaten, submitted himself, and is constrained to leave the Iland for a time. Yet it was not long ere hee returned againe, and built the Citie Castellina on the Sea-side.

Ducitus being dead; all the Greece Cities did in a fort acknowledge Syracuse: Trinacria excepted; which also by force of armes, in the foreknowledge and list Olympus, they brought to reason.

But they doe not long enjoy this their Superintendencie. For the Citizens of Leontium, being opprest by them, seeke aide from the Athenians, about the fixt yeare of the Peloponnesian Warre. In this suite they prevailed by the eloquence of Gorgias their Orator; and got an hundred Athenian Gallies to succour them, vnder the leading of Laches, and Charades. To this fleet, the Leontines, and their Partners, added one hundred more; with which forces, and with some supplies brought by Sophocles, Pytholorus, Eurymedon, and other Athenian Captaines, they invaded the Territories of the Syracufians, and their Partisans; wanne and lost diuers places; tooke Mellana; and, in the seventh yeare of the Peloponnesian Warre, lost it againe. They also, at the same time, attempted Himera, but in vaine. The fire of this quarrell tooke hold vpon many Cities, which invaded each others Territories with great violence. But when they had wearied themselves on all hands, and yet could see none issue of the warre; the Leontines, without the aduise of the Athenians, came to an accord with the Syracufians, and were admitted into their societie, with equall freedome. So the Athenians, who hoped to haue greatened themselves in Sicily, by the diuision and ciuill warre, were disappointed of their expectation, by the good agreement of the Sicilians, and faine to bee gone with the broken remainder of their fleet. This they knew not how to amend; but (according to the custome of popular Estates) by taking reuenge vpon their owne Commanders. So they banished Pytholorus, and Sophocles, and laid an heauie fine vpon Eurymedon. Shortly after this, followed the most memorable Warre, that euer was made by the Greekes in Sicily: which was that of the Athenians, against the Selminines, and Syracufians, in fauour of the Cities of Egesta, Leontium, and Catana. They of Selinus had opprest the Egestians; and they of Syracuse, the Leontines, and the Catanians: which was the ground of the warre. For, the Athenians vnderooke the protection of their old friends: And, in hatred of the Athenians, aide from Lacedæmon was sent to the Syracufians. The Lacedæmonians dealt plainly, hauing none other end, than that which they pretended, namely, to helpe a people of their owne Tribe, that crauid their succour, being in distresse. The Athenians scarce knew what to pretend: for their preparations were so great, as discovered their intent to bee none other, than the conquest of the whole Iland. Yet they which had called them in, were so blinded with their owne passions, that they would not beleue their owne eyes, which presented vnto them a Fleet, and Armie, farre greater, than the terrible report of fame had made it.

In this Expedition, the Citie of Athens had ingaged all her power; as regarding, not only the greatnesse of the enterprize, but the necessity of finishing it in a short space of time. For the Lacedæmonians (as hath already bene shewed in due place) stood at that time in such broken termes of peace with Athens: differing not much from open warre. Wherefore it was thought necessarie, either to spend no cost in this great expedition, or altogether to forbeare it: which was likely to be hindred by wars

at home, if their proceedings were slack abroad. And surely, had not the desire of the Athenians bene ouer-passionate, the arguments of Nicias had caused them to abstaine from so chargeable a buisnesse, and to referre their forces for a more needfull vfe. But yong counsailes prevailed, against the authoritie of ancient men, that were more regardfull of faletie than of honour.

Of this buisnesse, mention hath bene already made, in that which wee haue written of the Peloponnesian warre. But what was there deliuered in generall termes, as not concerning the affaires of Greece, otherwise than by consequence; doth in this place require a more perfect relation, as a matter, wherein the whole State of Sicily was like to haue felt a great conuersion.

Though Alcibiades had prevailed against Nicias, in exhorting the people to this great voyage; yet Nicias, together with Alcibiades, and Lamachus, was appointed to be one of the chiefe Commanders therein.

These had consultation and direction, as well to succour the Egestians, and to re-establish the Leontines, cast out of their places by the Syracufians; as also, by force of armes, to subiect the Syracufians, and all their adherents, in Sicily, and compell them by tribute, to acknowledge the Athenians for their supreme Lords. To effect which, the fore-named Captaines were sent off, with an hundred and thirtie Gallies, and five thousand one hundred Souldiers, besides the thirtie ships of burden, which transported their victuals, engines, and other munitions for the warre; and these were Athenians, Asintians, Rhodians, and Carians: there were, besides these, fixe thousand Megarians light armed, with thirtie horse-men.

With these troops and fleets they arrive at Rhegium, where the Rhegiens refuse to giue them entrie; but sell them victuals for their monie. From thence they resort to the Egestians, to know what treasure they would contribute towards the warre, seeing, for their sakes, they had entred thereinto. But they found by their answers, that these Egestians were poore, and that they had abused the Athenian Embassadors with false shewes of gold, hauing in all but thirtie talents. The Athenians further were discouraged, when they found that the Rhegiens, their ancient friends, and allied vnto the Leontines, refused to trust them within their walls. Hereupon Nicias aduise to depart towards the Selminines, and to force them, or perfwade them, to an agreement with the Egestians; as likewise to see what disbursuments the Egestians could make; and so to returne againe into Greece, and not to waite Athens in a needlesse warre. Alcibiades, on the other side, would sollicite the Cities of Sicily to confederacie, against the Syracufians and Selminines, whereby to force them vnto restitution of all that they had taken from the Leontines. Lamachus, hee perfwades them to assile Syracuse it selfe, before it were prepared against them. But in the end (being excluded out of diuers Cities) they surprize Catana: and there they take new counsaile, how to proceede. Thence they imploied Nicias to those of Egesta, who receiued from them thirtie talents towards his charges; and one hundred & twentie talents more there were of the spoiles they had gotten in the Iland. Thus, the Sommer being spent in idle consultations, and vaine attempts, the Athenians prepare to assile Syracuse. But Alcibiades hauing bene called at home, in his absence, was sent for back by the Athenians, to make his answer: and the Armie was left to the conduct of Nicias and Lamachus. These Commanders obtaine a landing place, very neare vnto Syracuse, by this deuise.

They imploie to Syracuse an inhabitant of Catana, whom they trust; and instruct him, to promise vnto the Syracufians, that hee would deliuer into their hand all the Athenians, within Catana. Hereupon the Syracufians draw thitherward with their best forces. But in the meane while, the Athenians, letting faile from Catana, arrive at Syracuse, where they land at faire ease, and fortifie themselves against the Towne. Shortly after this, they fight, and the Syracufians had the losse: but the Athenians, wanting horse, could not pursue their victorie to any great effect. They then retire themselves, with a resolution to refresh their Armie at Catana, for the winter-season.

From

From thence they made an attempt vpon Meſſana, hoping to haue taken it by intelligence, but in vaine. For Alcibiades had diſcouered ſuch as were Traitors within the Citie to the Meſſenians. This he now did, in deſpight of his owne Citizens the Athenians; becauſe they had recalled him from his command, with a purpoſe either to haue put him to death, or to haue baniſhed him: whereof being allured by his friends, he tooke his way towards the Lacedaemonians, and to them hee gave miſchieuous counſaile againſt his Countrey. While this Winter yet laſted, the Syracufians ſend Embaſſadors to Lacedaemon, and Corinth, for aide: as likewise the Athenian Captaines in Sicily, ſend to Athens, for ſupplies. Which both the one and the other obtained.

In the Spring following (which was the beginning of the eighteenth yeare of the Peloponneſian warre) the Athenians in Sicily, ſaile from the Port of Catana, to Stegara, for ſaken of the Inhabitants; from whence foraging the Countrey, they obtaine ſome ſmall victories ouer the ſtragling Syracufians: and at their returne to Catana, they receiue a ſupply of two hundred men at armes, but without horſe, which they hoped to furniſh in the Iland, from the Segetians, and other their adherents: they were alſo ſtrengthened with a companie of Archers, and with three hundred talents in monie.

Hereupon they take courage, and incampe neare Syracufe, vpon the banks of the great Port, repelling the Syracufians, that ſailed to impeach their intrincements. They alſo receiued from their Confederates foure hundred horſe-men, with two hundred other horſe, to mount their men at armes. Syracufe was now in effect blockt vp, ſo as hardly any ſuccours could enter, but ſuch as were able to force their paſſage: yet the Athenians receiue diuers loſſes; among which it was not the leaſt, that Lamachus, one of their beſt Commanders, was ſlaine.

In the meane while, Gylippus, and Pythos, with the Lacedaemonian, and Corinthian forces arriue, and take land at Homera. The Citizens of Homera, and of Gela, together with the Selinuntines, joyne with them; ſo that with theſe and his owne troups, Gylippus aduentured to march ouer-land towards Syracufe. The Syracufians ſend a part of their forces to meet him, and conſult him. The Athenians prepare to encounter them, expecting his arriuall neare vnto the Citie, vpon a place of aduantage. At the firſt encounter, they had the better of their enemies, by reaſon that the Syracufian horſe-men could not come to fight in thoſe ſtreights: but ſoone after, Gylippus charging them againe, brake them, and conſtrained Nicias to fortifie himſelfe within his Campe. Whereupon Nicias made the ſtate of his affaires knowne, by his letters, to the Athenians; ſhewing, that, without great ſupplies by Sea and Land, the enterpriſe would bee loſt, together with the ſmall Army remaining. Theſe letters receiued, the Athenians appoint two other Generalls, Eurymedon, and Demophones, to joyne with Nicias: the one they diſpatch preſently with ſome ſupply; the other they ſend after him in the Spring following.

In the meane while, Gylippus at Syracufe, fights with the Athenians, both by Sea and Land, ſometimes with ill, and at other times with good ſucceſſe: but in conſequence, he tooke from them their Port, neare vnto Syracufe, at the Promontorie, called Phormyrum; wherein the Athenians loſt their treaſure, and a great part of all their prouiſions. Notwithſtanding which loſſe, and that the Athenians themſelves, in Greece, were (in effect) belieged within Athens, by the Lacedaemonians; yet were they moſt obſtinate in perſecuting the warre in Sicily, and diſpatched away Demophones with new ſuccours. Demophones, in his way towards Sicily, encountered with Polyarchus the Corinthian, with his fleet: both the Captaines being bound for Sicily, the one to ſuccour Nicias, the other, Gylippus. The loſſe betwene them was in effect equall; and neither ſo broken, but that each of them perſeuted the enterpriſe they had in hand. But before the ſuccours arriued to either, Gylippus and Ariften had ſailed the Athenians in the great Port of Syracufe, and in a Sea-fight put them to the worſt, to the great diſcouragement of the Athenians. On the neck of this, Demophones arriued with threeſcore and thirteene Gallies, charged with foot-men; and (blaming the ſlouth of Nicias) he inuaded the Syracufians, the ſame day that he arriued. But he made more haſte, than he had good ſpeede, being ſhamefully beaten, and repulſed with great loſſe. Hereupon Demophones and Eurymedon, determine to riſe vp from before Syracufe, and returne to the ſuccour of Athens: but Nicias diſputed to the contrarie, pretending that hee had good intelligence within Syracufe, whereby he learned, that the Towne could not long hold out.

Whatſoeuer Nicias his intelligence was; vpon the arriuall of a new ſupply into the Towne, the Athenians had all conſented to depart, and to lodge at Catana: had not an Eclipse of the Moone, boding (as was thought) ill ſucceſſe, cauſed them to deſerre their departure. But this ſuperſtition coſt them deare. For the Syracufians, Lacedaemonians, and Corinthians, with threeſcore and ſeuenteene ſaile of Gallies, entred the great Port of Syracufe, wherein the Athenians kept their fleet, and whereon they had fortified themſelves. The Athenians, in the ſame Port, encountered them with foureſcore and ſixe Gallies, commanded by Eurymedon, in which the Athenian fleet was beaten, by the leſſer number, and Eurymedon ſlaine. Now, though it were ſo, that the Syracufians receiued the more loſſe by Land (for the fight was generally) yet when the Athenians were beaten by Sea, in which kinde they thought themſelves inuincible, they were wonderfully caſt downe. For it was well ſaid of Gylippus, to the Syracufians; When any people doe finde themſelves vanquiſhed in that manner of fight, and with thoſe weapons, in which they perſuade themſelves that they exceede all others, they not only looſe their reputation, but their courage. The Athenians, beſides the Gallies ſunk and wrackt, had ſeuenteene taken, and poſſeſſed by the enemy: and with great labour and loſſe they defended the reſt from being fired, haueing drawne them within a Palſade, in one corner of the Port, vnaduiſedly: for it is as contrarie to a Sea-warre, to thruſt ſhips into a ſtreight roome and corner, as it is to ſcatter foot in a plaine field againſt horſe; the one ſubſiſting, by being at large; the other, by cloſe imbarailing.

The Syracufians, hauing now weakened the Athenian fleet, reſolue to imprifon them within the Port. And to that purpoſe they range all their Gallies in the mouth of the Hauen, being about a mile ouer, and there they came to Anchor; filling the Out-let with all manner of Veffels, which they man moſt ſtrongly, becauſe the Athenians, being now made deſperate, ſhould not with double ranks of Gallies breake through the Syracufian fleet; which lay but ſingle, becauſe they were ſoſt to range themſelves ouer all the Out-let of the Port. They therefore, not only mored themſelves ſtrongly by their Anchors, but chained the ſides of their Gallies together, and laied behinde them againe certaine thiaps, which ſerued in the former warre for victuallers: to the end, that if any of their Gallies were ſunk; or the chaine, which joyned them to their fellows, broken, the Athenians might yet finde themſelves, a ſecond time, intangled and arreſted. To diſorder alſo thoſe Athenian Gallies, which came on in forme of a wedge, to breake through, and force a paſſage, the Syracufians had left within theſe Gallies and Ships, chained together, a certaine number of looſe ones, to ſtop their courſe and furie. For where the way of any veffell, vling oare or ſailes, is broken, and their ſpeede fore-ſlowed, they cannot force with any weight and violence, the reſiſtance oppoſing.

On the other ſide, the Athenians knew that they were vtterly loſt, except with an inuincible reſolution, they could make their way, and breake downe this great bridge of boats; or (at leaſt) force a paſſage through them in ſome part or other: which they reſolue to hazard, with all their ſhipping (to the number of one hundred and ten, of all ſorts) and with all the ſtrength of their Land-armie, in them imbarqued. But the Gallies, which were within the bridge of boats, did ſo diſorder the Athenian fleet, ere they came to force the bridge, as albeit ſome few of them had broken through the chaines, yet being ſtopped by the ſhips without, and affailed by other looſe Gallies of the Syracufians, which were purpoſely left at large in the Sea, they

they were either taken or funke. Three great difadvantages the Athenians had: the first, that fighting within a Haven, and (as it were) in a freight, they had no room to turne themselves, nor to free themselves one from another, being intangled; the second, that having over-petted their Gallies with Souldiers, who vs'd on ordinarie armes of darts and slings, they had not place vpon the decks to breeth their armes; the third was, the discomfortable end for which they fought, namely, to force a passage, by which they might save themselves by running away. To be short, the fight was no lesse terrible than the confusion; the slaughter great on all sides; and the noise, and the cries, folowd and lamentable, as that no direction could be heard. But in the end, the Athenians, as many as suruiued, were beaten back to the Land, with losse of threecore of their Gallies, broken, funke, or abandoned. The *Syracusan*s did also loose twentie of theirs, with Pythion, Commander of the *Corinthian*s. The rest of the Athenian Gallies, running themselves into the bottome of the Port, saved themselves by the helpe and countenance of the Land-armie, there fortified. In this desperate estate, the Athenian Commanders goe to counsell. Demofthenes perswades them, to furnish with fresh Souldiers those few Gallies which remained; and while the Syracusians were triumphing, and made secure by their present victorie, to set vpon them, and forcing their way out of the Port, to returne to Athens. This was no ill counsaile. For, as we haue heard of many great Captaines (yea, the greatest number of all that haue bene victorious) that haue neglected the speedie prosecution of a beaten enemy; so might we produce many examples of those, who, hauing slept securely in the bosome of good successe, haue bene suddenly awaked, by the re-allied Companies of a broken Armie, and haue thereby lost againe all the honour, and advantage, formerly gotten. But Nicias opposeth the aduice of Demofthenes: Others say, that the Sea men were against it. Whereupon abandoning their Gallies, they all resolute to march ouer land to the Cities of their Confederates, till some more favourable fortune should call them thence. On the other side, Gylippus, and other the Lacedaemonian and Corinthian Captaines, with Hermocrates, exhorted the Syracusians to put themselves presently into the field, and to stop all the passages, leading to those Cities of their enemies, to which the Athenians might make retreat. But many were wearie, and many were wounded, and many of them thought that they had done enough for the present. Which humour in some of our Commanders at Cadex, lost vs both the Indian fleet, and the Spoiles of many other Neighbour-places. Hermocrates, the Syracusan, finding it a lost labour, to perswade his Countreimen to any hallic prosecution, deuised this good stratagem, thereby to gaine time; not doubting, but that after a day or two, hee should draw them willingly out. He sent two or three horse-men out of Syracuse by night, willing them to finde Nicias; and (after they had assured him, that they were of the Athenian faction) to giue him aduice not to march away ouer-hastily from the place, wherein hee was fortified; alleging that the Syracusians had lodged their Armie, which could not long stay there, vpon the passages and places of aduantage, leading towards the Cities of their Allies. These tidings Nicias easily beleued, and put off his iourne to the third day. For men, newly beaten, are (for the most part) more fearefull than wise; and to them, euery thistle in the field, appeares, by night, a man at armes.

The third day (leauing all their Gallies, and all their baggage) they remoue; being pierced and pursued with the lamentable out-cries of those that were sick and hurt: whom they abandon to the cure of their enemies swords. The rest march away, to the number of fortie thousand; and make their first passage by force, ouer the Riuer of Anapus, notwithstanding the opposition of their enemies. But being euery day charged in their marches, and by the Syracusan horse-men, beaten in from foraging, and prouision of fooode, they grow weak and heartlesse. The Syracusians also possesse the Mountaine Lepas, by which they were to passe toward: Corinthians, and thereby force them to fall back againe towards the Sea-coast, and to take what what way they could: being vnable to proceede in their iourne intended. Many hard shifts they made, in difficult passages, and blinde marches by night; which they were faine to endure, as hauing none other meanes to escape from the enemy that pursued them, and held them waking with continuall skirmishing. To keepe all in order, Nicias vnder-tooke the leading of the Vangard; and Demofthenes conducted the Reare. At the Riuer Erineus, Nicias takes the start of a whole nights march, leauing Demofthenes to make the retreat: who being incompanied, and over-prest with numbers, in the end renders himselfe. The conditions he obtained, were farre better than he could haue hoped for, and the faith of his enemies farre worse than he suspected. For he was afterward, with Nicias, murdered in prison. The Armie of Demofthenes being dissolved, they pursue Nicias with the greater courage; who being utterly broken, vpon the passage of the Riuer Asinarus, rendered himselfe to Gylippus, vpon honest conditions. Gylippus sought to preferre him, and to haue had the honour, to haue brought these two to Sparta; Nicias, as a noble enemy to the Lacedaemonians, and who, at the ouerthrow, which they received at Pylus by the Athenians, had saved the liues of the vanquished; Demofthenes, as one that had done to Lacedaemon the greatest hurt. Hermocrates also, the Commander of the Syracusan Armie, dissuaded the rest, by all the art hee had, from using any barbarous violence, after so noble a victorie. But the cruell, and the cowardly sort, (cowardly and crueltie, being inseparable passions) prevailed, and caused these braue Captaines to be miserably murdered; one part of their Souldiers to be flured in locksome prisons; and the rest sold for slaves. This was the success of the Syracusan warre: which tooke end at the riuer Asinarus, the foure and twentieth day of May, in the fourescore and eleuenth Olympiad.

The Athenians being beaten out of Sicily, the Egeffians (for whose defence, against the Selinuntines, this late warre had bene taken in hand) fearing the victorious Syracusians, sought helpe from the Carthaginians, to whom they offered themselves, and their Citie, as their Vassalls. The Carthaginians, though ambitious enough of enlarging their Dominion in Sicily, yet considering the prosperitie of the Syracusians, and their late victories ouer the Athenians, they stand a while to dispute of the matter: whether they should refuse, or accept, the offer made vnto them: for the Selinuntines were straightly allied to the Syracusians, as may appeare by what is said. In the end, the Senators of Carthage resolute vpon the enterprise; and (by a trick of their Panick wit) to separate the Syracusians from the Selinuntines, they send Embassadors to Syracuse: praying that Citie, as in the behalfe of the Egeffians, to compell the Selinuntines to take reason, and to rest content with so much of the lands in question, as they of Syracuse should thinke meet to allow them. The Syracusians approued the motion; for it tended to their owne honour. But the Selinuntines would make no such appointment: rather they tooke it ill, that the Syracusians, with whom they had run one course of fortune, in the Athenian war, should offer to trouble them, by interposing as Arbitrators, in a busines, that themselves could end by force. This was right as the Carthaginians would haue it. For now could they of Selinus with an ill grace craue aide of Syracuse; and the Syracusians as ill grant it vnto those, that had refused to stand to the Arbitrement, which the Carthaginians would haue put into their hands. Hereupon, an Armie of three hundred thousand men is set out from Carthage, vnder the conduct of Hannibal, Nephew to that Amilcar, who (as you haue heard before) was ouerthrowne with the great Carthaginian Armie at Himera by Gelon. Hannibal was exceeding greedie of this imploiment, that he might take reuenge, as well of his Vncles, as of his Fathers death; the one of whom hauing bene slaine by the Himerians; the other by those of Selinus. Both these Cities, Hannibal, in this warre, wonne by force of armes, sacked, and burnt them; and hauing taken three thousand of the Himerians prisoners, hee caused them to be led vnto the place, where Amilcar was slaine, and buried there.

Hermocrates, who had lately bene General of the Syracusan forces, against the Athenians. The malice of his enemies had so farre prevailed with the ingratefull inultitude, that he was condemned to exile for his meere vertue, at such time, as he was aiding the Lacedemonians, in their warre against Athens; wherein hee did great service. All the honestest fort within Syracuse were forie for the injurie done vnto him, and fought to haue him repcaled. Hermocrates himselfe, returning into Sicill, gathered an Armie of sixe thousand; with which he beganne to repaire Selinus; and by many noble actions laboured to winne the loue of his Citizens. But the faction that opposed him was the stronger. Wherefore, he was aduised to seize vpon a Gate of Syracuse, with some strength of men; whereby his friends, within the Towne, might haue the better meanes to rise against the aduerser partie. This he did: but presently the multitude fell to armes, and set vpon him; in which conflict hee was slaine. But his sonne-in-law, Dionysius, shall make them with Hermocrates aliae againe.

of DIONYSIUS the Tyrant: and others, following him, in Syracuse.

THE Syracusians had enjoyed their libertie about threescore yeares, from the death of Thrasibulus, to the death of Hermocrates: at which time Dionysius was raised vp by God, to take reuenge, as well of their crueltie towards strangers, as of their ingratitude, towards their owne best Citizens. For before the time of Dionysius, they had made it their pastime, to reward the vertue of their worthiest Commanders with death, or disgrace: which custome they mult now bee taught to amend.

Dionysius obtayned the Principalltie of Syracuse, by the same degrees, that many others, before him, had made themselves Masters of other Cities, and of Syracuse itselfe. For, being made Priester, and commanding their Armies against the Carthaginians, and other their enemies, he behaued himselfe so well, that he got a generall loue among the people, and men of warre. Then beganne he to follow the example of Pisistratus, that made himselfe Lord of Athens; obtayning a band of sixe hundred men, to defend his person: vnder pretence, that his private enemies, being traitorously affected to the State of Syracuse, had laid plots how to murder him, because of his good seruices. He doubled the pay of the Souldiers, alleging, that it would encourage them to fight manfully: but intending thereby to assure them to himselfe. He perswaded the Citizens, to call home, out of exile, those that had bene banished, which were the best men of Syracuse; and these were afterwards at his deuotion, as obliged vnto him by so great a benefit. His first fauour, among the Syracusians, grew from his accusation of the principall men. It is the delight of base people to raigne ouer their betters: wherefore, gladly did hee helpe them to breake downe, as fetters imprisoning their libertie, the barres that held it vnder safe custodie. Long it was not, ere the chiefe Citizens had found whereat hee aimed. But what they saw, the people would not see: and some that were needie, and knew not how to get Offices without his helpe, were willing to helpe him, though they knew his purposes to be such, as would make all the Citie to smart. He began early to hunt after the tyrannie; being but fise and twentie yeares of age when he obtayned it: belike, it was his desire to raigne long. His first worke, of making himselfe absolute Lord in Syracuse, was, the possession of the Citadell; wherein was much good prouision, and vnder it the Gallies were moored. This hee obtained by allowance of the people; and having obtained this, he cared for no more, but declared himselfe without all shame or feare: The Armie, the chiefe Citizens, reposed by him from banishment; all the needie fort within Syracuse, that could not thrive by honest courses; and some neighbour-townes, bound vnto him, either for his helpe in warre, or for his establishing the faction, reigning at that present; were wholly affected to his assistance. Having therefore gotten the Citadell into his hands, he needed no more, saue to assure what hee had already. Hee strengthened himselfe by diuers marriages; taking first to wife the daughter of Hermocrates; and after her, two at once: the one a Locrian, Loris; by whom hee had Dionysius, his Successor, the other, Arifomache, the daughter of Hippwinus, and sister to Dion, honourable men in Syracuse, which bare vnto him many children, that serued to fortifie him with new alliances.

Yet it was not long, ere some of the Syracusians (enuying his prosperitie) incited the multitude, and tooke armes against him, even in the noueltie of his Rule. But their enterprife was more passionately, than wisely governed. He had shamefully been beaten by the Carthaginians at Gela: which, as it vexed the Sicilian men at armes, making them suspect that it was his purpose to let the Carthaginians waite all, that hee might afterwards take possession of the desolate places; so it inflamed them with a desire to free themselves from his tyrannie. They departed therefore from him, and marched hastily to Syracuse, where they found friends to helpe them: there they forced his Palace, rancked his treasures, and so shamefully abused his wife, that for the griefe thereof shee poisoned her selfe. But he followed their heeles apace; and firing a Gate of the Citie by night, entred soone enough to take reuenge, by making a speedie riddance of them. For he spared none of his knowne, nor of his suspected enemies. After that, he grew lo doubtfull of his life, as he neuer durst trust Barber to trim him, nor any person, no, nor so much as his brother, to enter into his chamber, vndripped and searched. He was the greatest Robber of the people, that euer reigned in any State; and withall, the most vnrespectfully cruel.

After this, he separated with fortification that part of the Citie, called the Island, from the rest; like as the Spaniards did the Citadell of Antwerp: therein he lodged his treasures, and his Guards.

He then beganne to make warre vpon the free Cities of Sicill: but while hee lay before Herbesse, an in-land Towne, the Syracusians rebelled against him; so, as with great difficultie hee recovered his Citadell: from whence, hauing allured the old Souldiers of the Campanians, who forced their passage through the Citie, with one thousand and two hundred horse, hee againe recovered the matter ouer the Syracusians. And when a multitude of them were busied in gathering in their Haruest, hee disarmed all the Townes-men remayning; and new strengthened the Fort of the Island, with a double wall. He inclosed that part also, called Eppolus; which, with threescore thousand labourers, hee finished in three weekes; being two leagues in compass. He then built two hundred new Gallies, and repaired one hundred and ten of the old; forged one hundred and fortie thousand Targets, with as many swords, and head-peeces, with foureteen thousand corselets, and all other futable armes. Which done, he sent word to the Carthaginians, (greatly enfeebled by the plague) That except they would abandon the Grecike Townes, which they held in Sicill, he would make warre vpon them: and, not staying for answer, hee tooke the spoile of all the Phoenician ships, and merchandize, within his Ports; as King Philip the second, did of our English, before the warre in our late Queens time. He then goes to the field with foure score thousand foot and three thousand horse, and sends his brother Lepistes to sea, with two hundred Gallies and fise hundred ships of burden. Most of the Townes which held for Carthage yielded vnto him; saving Panormus, Segesta or Egesta, Amyra, Motya, and Entella. Of these, he first wonne Motya by assault, and put all therein to the sword; but before Egesta hee lost a great part of his Armie, by a sallie of the Citizens. In the meane while Stimice arrives; but, ere hee tooke land, hee lost in a fight at Sea, with Leptines, fiftie ships of warre; and fise thousand Souldiers, besides many ships of burden. This notwithstanding, hee recovered againe Motya vpon his first descent. From thence marching towards Me- fen,

Jena, he tooke Lypara, and (soone after) Messena, and rased it to the ground. Now beganne Dionysius greatly to doubt his citie. Hee therefore fortified all the places hee could, in the Territorie of the Lemines, by which hee supposed that Himilco would passe toward Syracuse, and he himselfe tooke the field againe, with tour and thirtie thousand foot, and one thousand horse. Now, hearing that Himilco had divided his Armie into two parts, marching with the one halfe ouer land, and sending Mago with the other by Sea: he sent Leptines, his brother, to encounter Mago. But Leptines was viceroy beate by the Carthaginians; twentie thousand of his men were slaine, and an hundred of his Gallies loott. It is very strange, and hardly credible, which yet good Authors tell vs; That one Citie should be able to furnish five hundred saile of ships, and two hundred Gallies: (for, so many did Syracuse arme in this warre) and more strange it is, that in a battaile at Sea, without any grent Artillerie, or Musket-shot, twentie thousand should be slaine in one fight. In all our fights against the Turkes, of which that at Lepanto was the most notable, we heare of no such number loott; nor in any other fight by Sea, that euer hapned in our age, nor before vs. When Charles the first went to besiege Algier, hee had in all his fleet, transporters and others, but two hundred and fiftie saile of ships, and threecore and fiftie Gallies: for the furnishing of which fleet, he sought helpe from all the Cities and Ports of Spain, Naples, and the rest of Italy. But in old times it was the manner to carrie into the field, vpon extremitie, as many as were needfull, 20 of all that could beare armes, giuing them little wages, or other allowance: in our daies it is not so; neither, indeede, is it often requisite. Vpon this overthrow, Timonius posset away to Syracuse, to strengthen it: Himilco followes him, and besiegeth the Towne by Land and Sea. But the Tyrant, hauing receiued aide from the Lacedemonians, vnder the conduct of Pharacides, puts himselfe to Sea, to make provision for his Citizens: who, in his absence, take twentie of the Carthaginian Gallies, and sinke foure. Hereupon, finding their owne successe prosperous, and that of the Tyrant exceeding ill; hauing also at the present weapons in their hands; they consult how to recouer their libertie. And this they had done, had not Pharacides the Lacedemonian resisted them. It also fell out, to his exceeding advantage, that the plague was so increased, and so violent, among the Carthaginians; as it is said, that about an hundred thousand of them died thereof. Hee therefore, with the power that he could gather together, sets vpon them both by Sea and Land; and hauing slaine great numbers of them, forceth Himilco to desire peace. This peace Timonius sold him for a great summe of monie, on condition, that he should steale away with his Carthaginians only: which he basely accepted, betraying the rest of the Africans and Spaniards. Yet no faith was kept with him: for he was pursued, and left many of his Carthaginians behinde him. The rest of the Africans fell vnder the swords of their enemies; only the Spaniards, after they had a while brauely defended themselves, were (after their submission) entertained, and serued the Conquerour.

Many such examples of perfidious dealing haue I noted in other places, and can hardly forbear to deliuer vnto memorie the like practises, when they meete with their matches: That which hapned vnto Monseigneur de Piles, was very futable to this treacherie, wherewith Dionysius pursued Himilco. I was present, when De Piles related the iniurie done vnto him. He had rendered St. Iohn d'Angely, to the French King Charles the ninth, who besieged him therein. Hee ended it, vpon promise made by the faith of a King, that he should be suffered to depart in safetie, with all his followers. Yet in presence of the King himselfe, of the Duke of Anjou his brother, Generall of his Armie, of the Queene Mother, and of diuers Dukes and Marshalls of France, he was set vpon and broken in his march; spoiled of all that he had; and forced to saue his life by flight, leauing the most of his Souldiers dead vpon the place: the Kings hand and faith, warranting him to march away with ensigne displayed, and with all his goods and prouisions, no whit auailing him. It needes not therefore seeme strange, that an Heathen Tyrant should thus breake his faith, since Kings, Kings, professing Christianitie, are bold to doe the like, or command their Capitaines to doe it for them.

Dionysius, after this great victorie, tooke care to re-edifie Messena. Antago, who staid in Sicily, to hold vp the Carthaginians therein, is againe beate by Dionysius; who is also beate by the Tauromenians. A new supply of fourecore thousand Souldiers is sent from Carthage to Mago; but they take egges for their monie, and make peace with Dionysius, leauing the Sicilians in Tauromenium, to shift for themselves: whom Dionysius, after a long siege, ouer-came, and gaue their Citie to his mercinarie Souldiers.

10 He then past into Italy, obtained diuers victories there, brought the Libegians on their knees, forced them to pay him one hundred and fourecore thousand crownes, to furnish him with threecore Gallies, and to put in an hundred pledges, for assurance of their future obseruance of covenants. This hee did, not with any purpose to performe vnto them the peace that they had so dearly bought; but that hauing taken from them their Gallies, he might besiege them, and ruine them vtterly, with the more ease. Now to the end he might not, without some colour, failline the faith that he had giuen to them; he pretended to want victuals for his Armie, at such time as he seemed readie to depart out of Italy, and sent to them to furnish him therewith; promising to returne them the like quantitie, at his comming home to Syracuse.

20 His resolution was, that if they refused to furnish him, hee would then make their refusal the cause of his quarrell: if they yielded to aide him with the proportion which he desired, that then they should not be able, for want of foode, to endure a siege any long time against him. For to ruine them hee had fully determined, at what price soeuer. And great reason he had to take reuenge of them, if he had done it fairly, and without breach of faith. For when, in the beginning of his reign, he desired them to bestow a daughter of some of their Nobilitie vpon him, for a wife: they answered, That they had not any one fit for him, saue the Hang-mans daughter. Princes doe rather pardon ill deedes, than villanous words. 30 Alexander the Great forgave many sharpe swords, but neuer any sharpe tongues; no, though they told him but truly of his errors. And certainly, it belongs to those that haue warrant from God, to reprehend Princes; and to none else, especially in publike.

It is said, that Hermie the fourth of France, had his heart more inflamed against the Duke of Biron, for his ouer-bold and biting taunts, than hee vsed against him before Amiens, than for his conspuracie with the Spaniard, or Saucy: for he had pardoned ten thousand of such as had gone farther, and drawne their swords against him. The contemptuous words that St. Iohn Parret vsed of our late Queene Elizabeth, were his ruine; and not the counterfait letter of the Romish Priest, produced against him. So fared it with some other, greater than hee, that thereby ranne the same, and a worse fortune, soone after.

To bee short, hee made them know new bread from old. Hee assaulted their Towne on all sides, which hee continued to doe eleuen moneths, till hee wonne it by force. He vsed his victorie without mercie; specially against Phlyten, who had commanded within it.

Some other warres hee made with the Carthaginians, after the taking, and raising of this Citie; and those with variable successe. For as in one encounter hee slue Mago, with ten thousand Africans: so the sonne of Mago beate him, and slue 50 his brother Leptines, with foureteene thousand of his Souldiers. After which hee bought his peace of the Carthaginians, as they had formerly done of him; following therein the aduice of Prosperitie and Aduersitie, as all Kings and States doe.

When

When he had reigned eight and thirtie yeares, he died: some say, in his bedde, peaceably; which is the most likely, though others report it otherwise. A cruell man hee was, and a faithlesse; a great Poet, but a foolish one. Hee entertained Plato a while, but afterward, for speaking against his tyrannie, hee gaue order to haue him slaine, or sold for a slaue. For hee could endure no man, that flattered him not beyond measure. His Paralties therefore siled his crueltie, The hate of euill men, and his lawlesse slaughters, The ornaments and effects of his iustice. True it is, that flatterers are a kinde of vermine, which poison all the Princes of the World; and yet they prosper better, than the worthiest and valiantest men doe: And I wonder not at it; for it is a world: and as our Sauieur Christ hath told vs, The World will loue her owne.

To this Dionysius, his sonne of the same name succeeded; and inherited both his Kingdome, and his Vices. To winne the loue of the People, hee pardoned, and released out of prison, a great number of persons, by his Father lockt vp, and condemned. Withall, he remitted vnto his Citizens diuers payments, by his Father imposed vpon them. Which done, and thereby hoping, that he had fastened vnto himselfe the peoples affections; hee cast off the Sheeps skinne, and put on that of the Wolfe. For, being jealous of his owne Brethren, as men of more vertue than himselfe, hee caused them all to bee slaine; and all the Kindred that they had by their Mothers side. For Dionysius his Father (as hath beene said) 10 had two Wiues; Doris of Loeris; and Artemaschea a Syracusan, the sister of Dion, which Brother-in-law of his he greatly enriched.

By Doris he had this Dionysius, who succeeded vnto him: and by Artemaschea he had two Sonnes and two Daughters; of which the elder, called Sophrosyne, he gaue in marriage to his eldest Sonne, and her halfe-brother, Dionysius; the younger, called Areta, he bestowed on his Brother Theorides: after whose death, Dion rooke her to Wife, being his Neece.

This Dion, a iust, and valiant man, finding that Dionysius had abandoned all exercise of vertue, and that hee was wholly giuen ouer to sensuality, preuailed so much with Plato, whose Disciple he had beene, as he drew him into Sicily, to instruct the young King. And hauing perswaded the King to entercytne him, he wrought so well with him, as Dionysius beganne to change condition; to change Tyrannie, into Monarchie; and to hold the Principalltie, that he had, rather by the loue of his People, and his Nationall Lawes, than by the violence of his Guards and Garrisons. But this goodnesse of his lasted not long. For Philistus the Historian, and other his Paralties, that hated *Dion*s feueritie, wrought him out of the Tyrants fauour; and caused him soone after to bee banished out of Sicily, to the great griefe of the whole Nation. For whereas Dion had made offer to the King, either to compound the quarrells betwene him and the Cartaginians, of whom Dionysius stood in great feare, or (at least) if they refused it, to furnish him with fiftie Gallies at his owne charge, during the warre against them: his enemies found meanes, by sinister interpretation, to conuert his good will into matter of treason. They told Dionysius, that all the great commendations, giuen of Plato, had tended to none other end, than to soften his minde, and to make him neglect his owne affaires, by the studie of Philosophie; whilest Dion, in the meane time, hauing furnished fiftie Gallies, vnder colour of the Kings seruice, had it in his owne power, either to deliuer to the Syracusan their former libertie, or to make himselfe Lord and Soueraigne of their State.

It is likely, that the honest and liberall offer which he made, to serue the King with so great a preparation, at his owne charge, begot him many enemies. For they that had serued the King for none other end, than to raise and enrich themselves, and had alreadie bene raised and enriched, thought themselves bound to make the same offer, that Dion had made, if the King had had the grace to conceive it aright. But these couetous and ignorant cowards, that had neither the knowledge, nor the daring, that Dion had, were bold to stile his Loue and Liberaltie, Pride and Presumption; and heartned the young King, in his oppressing and eating vp his owne people, of whose spoiles they themselves shared no small portion. I haue heard it, That when Charles the fift had the repulse at Algier in Africa, Ferdinando Cortes, one of the bravest men that euer Spain brought forth, offered vnto the Emperour, to continue the siege at his owne charge. But hee had neuer good day after it. For they that enuid his victories, and his conquest of Mexico in the west Indies, perswaded the Emperour, that Cortes sought to value himselfe about him; and to haue it said, That what the Emperour could not, Cortes had effected; and was therefore more worthy of the Empire, than he that had it.

When Dion was newly banished, the Tyrant was contented, at first, to send him the reuenues of his Lands, and permit him to dispose of his mouables, at his owne pleasure: not without giuing hope, to recall him in short time. Had hee continued in this good moode, like enough it is, that Dion would haue bene well pleased to liue well, as he did, at Athens. But after some time, Dionysius made Port-fale of this Noble-mans goods; and thereby vrged him to take another course; euen to seek the restitution of his Countrie to libertie. The vertues of Dion, especially his great liberalitie, had purchased much loue in Greece. This loue made him suspected and 10 hated of the Tyrant: but it stood him in good stead, when hee sought to raise men, with whose helpe he might returne into Sicily. Yet he got not about eight hundred (for hee carried the matter closely) to follow him in this aduerture. But many of them were men of qualitie, and fit to be Leaders. Neither did he doubt of finding in Syracuse, as many as should be needfull, that would readily assist him. Therefore hee landed boldly in Sicily; marched to Syracuse; entered the Citie without resistance; armed the multitude; and wonne all, saue the Citadell.

Dionysius was then absent in Italy; but hee quickly had aduertisement of this dangerous accident. Wherefore he returned hastily to Syracuse; whence, after many vaine treaties of peace, and some forceable attempts to recover the Towne, 30 he was faine to depart; leaving yet the Citie to the custodie of Apollonides, his eldest sonne. Yet ere he went, his Minion Philistus, comming with a strength of men to assist him, was beaten, taken, and put to death by torment. But Dion, for the recovery of his Countries libertie, had the same reward, that all worthe men haue had from popular Estates. He was disgraced, assaied, and forced to abandon the Citie. He retirerth himselfe to the Leontines, who receiue him with great joy. Soone after his departure from Syracuse, new troups enter the Citie: they sallie out, assaile, spoile, and burne a great part of the Citie. Dion is sent for, with humble request; yet, ere he could arrive, Dionysius his Souldiers were retired; and the Townsmen, thinking themselves secure, shut the Gates against Dion. But the next 40 night, they of the Citie sallie againe, with greater furie than euer; they kill Man, Woman, and Child, and set fire in all parts of the Towne. In this their extremitie Dion comes the second time to their succour; the loue of his Countrie surmounting all the injuries that he had receiued. He sets vpon the Garrison of the Citie, with the one part of his Armie; and quencheth the fire, euerie where killed with the other part. In conclusion, after he had conquered both the fire and the fard, that had well-nere burnt to ashes, and depopulated Syracuse, hee recovered the Citie, with the munition and furniture thereof, and sent Apollonides, after Dionysius his Father, into Italy. But their malice, of whom hee had best deserv'd, and whom he had loued most, gaue an vntimely end to his dayes. For he was, soon after, 50 by his victorie, murdered by Cleippus; who, after hee had, with ill success, a while gouerned Syracuse, was slaine with the same Dagger, with which hee had murthered Dion.

Ten yeares after the death of Dion, Dionysius, with the assistance of his friends in Italy, recouers his estate, and returns to Syracuse, driving Nysus thence, whom he found Governour therein. The better sort of the Citizens, fearing, more than euer, his crueltie, flee to Ietes, a Syracusan borne, and then ruling the Leontines. Ietes enters into confederacie with the Carthaginians, hoping by their assistance, not only to preuaile against Dionysius; but by the hatred of the Syracusians towards Dionysius, to make him also Lord of their Citie. The Syracusians, being desirously afflicted on all sides, send to the Corinthians for succour. Ietes also sends thither, and disswades the Corinthians, as well as hee can, from intermeddling in the businesse. He tells them, by his Messengers, That he had entred into league with the Carthaginians, who were so sterred by Sea, that it was not in the power of Ietes, to land any Armie in Sicily. But the Corinthians, being by this treason of Ietes, more enraged than disswaded, sent Timoleon with nineteene Gallies, to deliuer Syracuse from tyrannic. In the meane while, Ietes had entred Syracuse, and, with the help of the Carthaginians, driuen Dionysius into the Castle, wherein hee beliedge him.

Ietes, being himselfe a Tyrant in Leontium, rather sought how to enlarge his power, than, how to deliuer his Countrie. Therefore, hearing that Timoleon was arrived at Rhegium, he sent to perswade him, to returne his fleet; for that all things were (in effect) established in Sicily. The Carthaginian Gallies were also in the same Port of Rhegium, whose Captaines aduised Timoleon, to get him gone in peace. They had farre more Gallies there, than he had, and were like to compell him, if Timoleon, hindring himselfe ouer-mannered, makes request to the Carthaginian Captaines, that they would be pleased to enter into Rhegium, and there, in an open assembly of the people, to deliuer vnto him those arguments, for his returne, which they had vsed to him in private; that hee might, by publique testimony, discharge himselfe to the Senate of Cyrinth.

The Carthaginians, perswading themselves, that a victorie, obtayned by a few faire wordes, was without losse, and farre more easie, than that of many blowes and wounds, yielded to Timoleon's desire. But while the Orations were deliuering, Timoleon, fauoured by the Rhegiens, stole out of the presse; and hauing set sail, before the Gates were opened to the Carthaginians, he recovered the Port of Tourmentum, where he was joyfully received by Andromachus the Governour. From thence he marched towards Adranum, where surprisng Ietes's Armie, hee slue a part thereof, and put the rest to runne. It is the nature of victorie to beget friends. The Adranians joyned with him; and so did Mamercus, the Tyrant of Catana. Dionysius also sent to Timoleon, offering to surrender the Castle of Syracuse into his hands: as thinking it better to yield vp himselfe, and the places which he could not defend, vnto the Corinthians, than either to Ietes, whom hee disdained, or to the Carthaginians, whom hee hated. Now Timoleon, who within fiftie daies, after his arrivall, had recovered the Castle of Syracuse, and sent Dionysius to Corinth, to lue there a priuate man, was still invaded by the Armies, and molested by the practices, of Ietes. For he beliedge the Corinthians, within the Castle of Syracuse, and attempted (but in vaine) the murder of Timoleon.

The Corinthians send vnto Timoleon a supply of two thousand foot, and two hundred horse, which are staid in Italy by foule weather. Ietes is strengthened with threecore thousand Africans, brought vnto him by Mago (all which hee lodgeth within Syracuse) and with an hundred and fiftie Gallies, to keepe the Port. This was the first time, that euer the Carthaginians had dominion within the walls of that Citie. With this great Armie, Ietes assaulted the Castle. Timoleon sends them victuals, and succour, in small boats, by night, from Catana. Mago and Ietes doe therefore resolute to beliedge Catana; but they were no sooner on their way towards yo it, with part of their forces, than Leen, Captaine of the Corinthians, sallied out of the Castle, and tooke that part of Syracuse, called Acadina, which he fortified.

In the meane while, the two thousand Corinthians arrive: with whom, and two thousand other Souldiers, Timoleon marcheth towards Syracuse. Mago abandoneth Ietes, Ietes, being frighted out of Sicily (which he might easily haue conquered) with an idle rumour of treason. This made him returne to Carthage; where the generall exclamation against his cowardize, did so much affright him, that for feare of further punishment, he hanged himselfe. Timoleon enters the Citie, and beats downe the Cattle (which hee called the nest of Tyrants) to the ground. But he found the Citie, when the strangers were fled, in effect desolate; so as their horses did feede on the grasse, growing in the market-place. Therefore, he writes to Corinth, for people to re-inhabite it. Ten thousand are sent out of Greece; many come from Italy; others, from other parts of the Island.

15 But a new storme ariseth. Asiarchus and Amilcar, Carthaginians, arrive about Liphicum, with threecore and ten thousand Souldiers, transported (with all their provisions) in a thousand ships of burden, and two hundred Gallies. Timoleon marcheth thither, and chargeth this great Armie vpon the passage of a River.

A tempest of raine, haile, and lightning, with boisterous windes, beating vpon the faces of the Carthaginians, they are vtterly broken: ten thousand slaine, five thousand taken, with all their carriages and provisions: among which, there were found a thousand corlets, gilt and grauen. After this, Timoleon gaue an ouerthrow to Ietes and, following his victorie, tooke him, with his sonne Eusebius, and the Generall of his horse, prisoners, whom he caused all to be slaine: and afterwards (which was imputed to him for great crueltie) hee suffered Ietes's wives and daughters to be put to death. But this was the reuenge of God vpon Ietes, who (after the murder of Dion) had caused Arcte, Dion's wife, and a yong child of his, with Artemache his sister, to be cast into the Sea.

He againe preuailed against Mamercus, Tyrant of Catana, and wonne Catana it selfe. Mamercus fled to Hippion, Tyrant of Messena: but Timoleon, pursuing him, wonne the towne, deliuering Hippion to his Citizens, who tormented him to death. The same end had Mamercus, and all other, the Tyrants in Sicily.

Finally, he made peace with the Carthaginians; on condition, That they should not passe the River of Lycus. After this, he liued in great honour among the Syracusanians, till his death; and was solemnly buried by them, in the market-place of their Citie: the day of his Funerals, being for euer ordayned to bee kept holy among them.

After such time, as Timoleon had deliuered Syracuse, from the tyrannie of Dionysius, and brought peace to the whole Island, the Inhabitants enjoyed their libertie in peace, about twenty yeares. The Cities and Temples were repaired; the Trade renewed; the Merchant failed in fateties; and the Labouring man enjoyed the fruits of the earth in quiet. But, it was impossible, that a Nation, which neither knew how to gouerne, nor how to obey; which could neither endure Kings, nor men worthe to be Kings, to gouerne them; should any long time subsist.

40 Twenty yeares after the death of Timoleon, there flared vp an Agathocles among them, a man of base birth, and of base condition; who from a Beggar, to a common Souldier; from a Souldier to a Captaine; and so from degree to degree, rising to bee a Proter; finally became Lord and Soueraigne of the Syracusians. Many fortunes he ranne, and vnder-went as many dangers, ere hee obtained the Principallitie. For he had more than once attempted it, and was therein both beaten and banished. A passing valiant man he was, and did notable seruice, as well for those by whom he was imploied, as also for the Syracusians, and against them. For in their warres against those of Enna, and the Campanians, hee did them memorable seruice: and on the contrarie, as memorable seruice for the Murgantines against the Syracusanians. For being entertained by the people of Murgantia, and made Generall of their forces, hee sackt Leontium; and beliedge Syracuse so streightly, that the Citizens were driuen to craue aide, euen from their ancient and natural enemies, the Carthaginians. Amilcar was sent by the Carthaginians, to relieue Syracuse. With him Agathocles wrought so well, that hee got him to make peace betwene himselfe and the the Syracusians, binding him selfe by promise and oath, to remaine a friend and servant to the state of Carthage, for ever after. Amilcar entertained the businesse, and compounded the quarrells betwene Agathocles, and the Syracusians. Agathocles is chosen Prator; he entertaines five thousand Africans, and diuers old Souldiers of the Murgantines, vnder colour of a purpose to besiege Herbita. With these, and with the assistance of the poore and discontented Syracusians (the Citie being also diuided into many factions) he assailes the Senators, kills all his enemies and opposites; diuides the spoile of the rich among the poore; and giues libertie to his Souldiers, to robbe, to raulh, and to murder, for two whole dayes and nights, without controulment: the third day, when they had blunted their barbarous appetites, and fired the streets with ten thousand dead carkasses, besides those that had broken their necks ouer the walls; their furie had no further subject to worke on.

Agathocles, in an assembly of the people (being an eloquent knaue) perswaded them, that, for the violent licknesse, by which the common-wealth was vtterly cōsumed, he found no better, than the violent remedies, which he had admittred; and that he affected no other thing, than the reducing of the state from an Oligarchie, or the rule of a few tyrannous Magistrates, to the ancient and indifferent Democratie, by which it had beene gouerned, from the first institution, with so great glorie and prosperitie. This he did, to haue the crowne clapt on his head (as it were) perforce. For as he knew, that he had left none liuing, within the Citie, fit, nor able, to exercise the office of a Magistrate: so knew he right well, that all they which had assisted, in the murder and spoile of their fellow-Citizens, had no other hope of defence, than the support of a lawlesse Lord, who had bene partaker with them, in their villanies and cruelties committed. So as this Rabble, his Oration ended, proclaimed him King: againe and againe, saluting, and adoring him, by that name, as if it had beene giuen to him by some lawfull election. Hence had our King Richard the third a peece of his patterne; but, the one was of base; the other, of Kingly parents; the one tooke libertie from a Common-weale; the other fought only to succede in a Monarchie; the one continued his crueltie to the end; the other, after he had obtained the Crowne, fought, by making of good lawes, to recover the loue of his people.

The life of this Tyrant, is briefly written by Iustine; more largely and particularly by Diodorus Siculus: the summe whereof is this. The same Amilcar that had brought him into Syracuse, and that had lent him five thousand men, to helpe in the massacre of the Citizens, was also content to winke at many wrongs, that hee did vnto the Confederates of the Carthaginians. It was the purpose of Amilcar, to settle Agathocles in his tyrannie, and to let him vex and waste the whole Iland; because it was thereby like to come to passe, that hee should reduce all Sicily into such termes, as would make it become an easie prey to Carthage. But, when the Cities confederate with the Carthaginians, sent their Embassadors, with complaint of this ill dealing, to Carthage; the Punicke faith (so much taunted by the Romans, as no better than mere falsehood) shewed it selfe very honourable, in taking order for their redresse. Embassadors were sent to comfort the Sicilians, and to put Agathocles in minde of his couenants; Amilcar was recalled home into Africa; and a new Capitaine appointed to succede in his charge, with such forces, as might compell Agathocles to reason, if otherwise he would not hearken to it. All this tended, to saue their Confederates, from suffering such injuries in the future. For that which was past (since it could not be recalled) they tooke order to haue it severely punished. Amilcar was accused secretly, and by way of scrutinie: the suffrages being giuen, but not calculated; and so referred, vntill he should returne. This was not so closely handled, but that Amilcar had some notice of it. In managing his businesse with Agathocles, it is likely that he had an eye to his owne profit, as well as to the publike benefit of his Countrey. For he had made such a composition with the Syracusians, as

gave him not only meane to weaken others, but to strengthen himselfe, both in power and authoritie, euen against the Carthaginians. Such is commonly the custome of those, that hope to worke their owne ends by cunning practises; thinking to deale subtilly, and finely, they spinne their threads so small, that they are broken with the very winde. Amilcar saw, that his Carthaginians had a purpose to deale substantially; and that therefore it would bee hard for him, to make them follow his crooked deuices: which if he could not doe, it was to be expected, that their anger would breake out into so much the greater extremitie, by how much the more they had concealed it. Therefore he followed the example, which some of his foregoers had taught him; and, for feare of such a death, as the Iudges might award him, he ended his owne life in what sort he thought best. This desperation of Amilcar serued to informe Agathocles of the Carthaginians intent. He saw they would not be deluded with words, and therefore resolued to get the start of them in action. He dissembled no longer; but, in steade of spoile and robberie, made open warre vpon all their Adherents. He had made the better part of Sicily his owne, ere the Carthaginian forces arriued: which thinking to haue encountered an ill-established Tyrant, found him readie, as a King, to defend his owne, and giue them sharpe entertainment. They were beaten by him; and their Naue was fo Tempelt-beaten, that they could neither doe good by Land, nor Sea, but were glad to leaue their businesse vndone, and returne into Africa.

The Carthaginians prepare a new fleet: which being very gallantly manned and furnished, was broken by foule weather, and the best part of it cast away, euen whilst it was yet within kenning of their Citie. But Amilcar, the sonne of Gisco, gathering together the remainders of this ship-wrack, was bold to passe ouer into Sicily, and landed not farre from Gela; where Agathocles was soone readie to examine the cause of their coming. Many skirmishes passed betweene them, in which (commonly) the Syracusian had the better. But his good successe begat presumption; whereby he lost a battaile, more important than all the other fights. One aduersé chance is enough to ouerthrow the state of a Tyrant, if it be not vp-held by great circumspection. The warre was soone transferred to the walls of Syracuse; within which Agathocles was closed vp, and driuen to make his last defence by their helpe, who may be iudged to haue loued him not very greatly. But the Inhabitants of Syracuse, after that great massacre of the principall men, made in the beginning of this new tyrannie, were (for the most part) such, as had beene either mercinarie Souldiers, enfranchised slaues, or base and needie people; helpers in establishing the present Gouernement, and Executioners of the murders, and spoile, committed in that change. If there were any other (as some there were) they were so well observed, and (withall) so fearfull, that they durst not stirre. But it was not enough, that they all agreed in the common defence of themselves and their Citie; Amilcar was likely to grow vpon them, and enforce them to change their resolution. In this necessitie, Agathocles aduentured vpon a strange course, which the euent commended, as wise. He imbarqued as many as he thought meet, in those vessels that rode in the Hauen; and committing the gouernment of the Citie to his brother Antander, willed the people to be of good courage, for that (as he told them) hee had be thought himselfe of a meane, both to raise the siege, and to repaire all other losses. A Carthaginian fleet lay in the mouth of the Hauen, both to hinder the entrance of victuallers, and to keepe the besieged from issuing forth.

Now, at such time as Agathocles was readie to depart, aduertisement came, that many ships of burden, laden with corne, and other provisions, were drawing neare vnto Syracuse. To intercept these, the Carthaginians hoise saile, and launch forth into the deepe. They were not farre gone, when they might behold Agathocles, issuing forth of the Port, with purpose (as they thought) to giue conuoy vnto his victuallers. Hercupon they wheele about, and make amaine towards him, as thinking him the better bootie. He neither abode their coming, nor fled back into the Citie, Citie, but made all speede towards Africk; and was pursued by the Carthaginians, as long as day would giue them light. In the meane season, the victuallers were gotten into Syracuse; which was the more plentifully relieved by their coming, for that Agathocles had unburdened the place of no small number. When the Carthaginian Admirall perceived; first, that by pursuing two fleets at once, he had mislead of them both; and secondly, that Agathocles returned not againe, but was gone to seeke his fortune elsewhere; he thought it good to pursue those that were sicke, and to attend so well vpon them, that they should not haue leifure to doe mischief in some other part.

The Carthaginian Nauie followed Agathocles (whether by chance, or by relation of such as had met with him at Sea) directly towards Africk, and ouer-tooke him after sixe dayes. He had (at the first) a great flart of them; so that (belike) they rowed hard; and wearied themselves, in seeking their owne misfortune. For he fought with them, and beat them; and, hauing sunk, or taken many, draue the rest to flie which way they could, laden with strange tidings of his voiage.

When Agathocles had landed his men in Africk, then did he discouer vnto them his project; letting them vnderstand, that there was no better way to diuert the Carthaginians, not only from Syracuse, but from all the Ile of Sicily, than by bringing the warre to their owne dores. For here (said he) they haue many that hate them, and that will readily take armes against them, as soone as they perceiue that there is an Armie on foot, which dares to looke vpon their walls. Their Townes are fortified; their people vntrained, and vnexperienced in dangers; the mercinarie forces, that they leuie in these parts, will rather follow vs than them, if we offer greater wages than they can giue: which we may better promise and make good, by letting them haue some share with vs in all the wealth of the Carthaginians, than our enemies can doe, by making some addition to their stipends. Thus he talked, as one already Master of all the riches in Africk; and with many braue wordes encouraged his men so well, that they were contented to set fire on all their ships (refusing one or two, to vse as Messengers) to the end that no hope should remaine, saue only in victory. In this heat of resolution, they winne by force two Cities; which after they had thoroughly sacked, they burnt to the ground; as a marke of terrour to all that should make resistance. The Carthaginians, hearing this, are amazed; thinking that Amilcar is broken, and his whole Armie destroyed in Sicily. This impression so dismaies them, that when they know the truth of all, by such as had escaped in the late Sea-fight, yet still they feare, and know not what. They suspect Amilcars faith, who had suffered Agathocles to land in Africk: they suspect their principall Citizens at home of a meaning to betray Carthage, vnto the enemy; they raise a great Armie, and know not vnto whose charge they may safely commit it.

There were at that time two famous Captaines in the Citie, Hanno, and Bomilcar; great enemies, and therefore the more vnlily to conspire against the Common-wealth. These are made Generalls of the Armie leuied; which farre exceeded the forces of Agathocles. But it seldom happens, that dissension betwene Commanders produceth any fortunate event. Necessitie draue Agathocles to fight; and the courage of his men, resolute to deale with the whole multitude of the Carthaginians, made easie the victory against the one halfe of them. For Bomilcar would not flurre; but suffered Hanno to be cut in peeces.

The reputation of this victory, brought ouer a King of the Africans, from the Carthaginian Societie to take part with Agathocles: who pursuing his victory, winnes many Townes, and sends word to Syracuse of his good successe. The Carthaginians also send into Sicily, willing Amilcar, their Generall, to succour the state of Africk, which was in danger to be lost, whilest he was traouailing in the conquest of Sicily. Amilcar sends them fife thousand men: all his forces he thought it not needfull to transport; as hoping rather to draw Agathocles back into Sicily, than to be drawne home home by one, that could scarce retaine his owne Kingdome. But these good hopes had a bad issue. He spent some time in winning a few Townes, that adhered vnto the Syracusanians; and hauing brought his matters to some good order, he conceived a sudden hope of taking Syracuse by surpris. It was a pretie (though tragically) accident, if it were true, as Tullie relates it. Amilcar had a dreame, which told him that he should suppe the next day within Syracuse. His fancy begot this dreame, and he believed it. He made more haile, than good speede, toward the Citie: and coming vpon it on the sudden, had good hope to carrie it. But his enemies were prepared for him, and had laied an ambush to intrap him, whereinto he fell. So he was carried prisoner into the Citie; in which it was likely, that he had no great cheare to his supper: for they struck off his head, and sent it into Africk (a welcome present) to Agathocles.

This good successe of things at home, did put such courage into the Sicilian Armie, that Agathocles was bold to weare a Crowne, and stile himselfe King of Africk. He had allured Ophellus, King of the Cyrenians, to take his part, by promises to deliuer the Countrey into his hands: for that (as he said) it was sufficient vnto himselfe to haue diuerted the Carthaginians from Sicily, wherein (after this warre ended) he might raigne quietly. Ophellus came with a great Armie, and was friendly entertained. But the traitorous Sicilian, taking an aduantage, did murder this his affiant; and afterwards, by good wordes, and great promises, drew all the Cyrenian Armie to follow him in his warres. Thus his villanie found good successe; and he so prevailed in Africk, that he got leifure to make a step into Sicily. Many Townes in Sicily had embraced a desire of recouering their libertie; thinking it high time to fight at length for their owne freedome, after that they had so long bene exposed, (as a reward of victorie) either vnto Aliens, or to Tyrants, of their owne Countrey. These had prevailed farre, and gotten many to take their parts, as in a common cause: when the coming of Agathocles abated their high spirits, and his good successe in many fights, compelled them to obedience. Out of Sicily he returned into Africk, where his affaires stood in very bad termes. Archagathus, his sonne, had lost a battaile; and (which was worse) had ill meanes to helpe himselfe: his Armie being in mutinie for lack of pay. But Agathocles pacified the tumult, by the accustomed promises of great bootie and spoile. It had now bene time for him, to offer peace to the Carthaginians; which to obtaine, they would (questionlesse) haue giuen to him, both monie enough to pay his Armie, and all that they then held in Sicily. For their Citie had bene distressed, not only by this his warre, but by the treason of Bomilcar, who failed not much of making himselfe Tyrant ouer them. But ambition is blinde. Agathocles had all his thoughts fixed vpon the conquest of Carthage it selfe: out of which dreame he was awaked, by the losse of a battaile, not so memorable in regard of any accident therein, as of the strange events following it. The Carthaginians, after their great misfortunes in this warre, had renewed their old sacrifices of children to Saturne: from which they had obtained, euer since they made peace with Gelos. And now they made choice of some, the goodliest of their prisoners, taken in the battaile, to offer vnto the said Idol, in way of thankfulness for their victorie. The fire, with which these vnhappy men were consumed, caught hold vpon the lodgings nearest vnto the Altar; and spreading it selfe farther through the Campe, with the destruction of many men, caused such a tumult, as is vsual in the like cases. At the same time, the like accident of fire burnt vnto Paulion of Agathocles. Hereupon both the Armies fled away; each of them belcuing, that the noise in the aduersé Campe, was a signe of the enemies coming to invade it. But the Carthaginians had a late retreat: Agathocles, by a second error, fell into a new calamitie. In the beginning of this his flight in the darke, he met with his owne African Souldiers; and thinking them to bee enemies, (as indeede the one halfe of them had revolted from him, to the Carthaginians, in the last battaile) he beganne to assaile them, and was so stoutly resisted, that he lost in this blinde fight, above about foure thousand of his men. This did so discourage his proud heart; that being fallen from the neare hope of taking the Citie of Carthage, vnto some distrust of his owne safetie, he knew no more how to moderate his present weake fears, than lately he had knowne how to gouerne his Ambition. Therefore he tooke the way that came next into his head; which was, to scale closely aboard his ships, with his younger sonne (the elder he suspected of Incelt, and of Ambition) and to flie into Sicil; thinking it the best course, so thit for himselfe, as wanting vessels wherein to transport his Armie. His elder sonne, Archagathus, perceived his drift, arrested him, and put him vnder custodie: but by meanes of a sudden tumult, hee was let loose, escaped, and fled alone, leauing both his sonnes behinde him. His flight being noised through the Armie, all was in vprore; and extremitie of rage caused not only the common Souldier, but euen such as had bene friends to the Tyrant, to lay hold vpon his two sonnes, and kill them. That this flight of Archagathus was extremely base; I neede not vfe wordes to proue: That his fcare was truly, as all feare is said to be, a passion, depriving him of the succours which reason offered, the sequel doth manifest. His forsaken Souldiers, being now a headlesse companie, and no longer an Armie to be feared, obtained neuerthelesse a reasonable composition from the Carthaginians: to whom they sold those places, whereof they had possession, for ninetene talents. Likewise, Agathodes himselfe, hauing lost his Armie, did neuerthelesse, by the reputation of this late warre, make peace 20 with Carthage vpon euall termes.

After this, the Tyrant, being deliuered from forraine enemies, discouered his bloudie nature in most abominable cruelties, among the Sicilians. His wants, and his feare, vrged him so violently, that he was not satisfied with the spoiles of the rich, or the death of those whom he held suspected: but in a bestiall rage depopulated whole Cities. He deuised new engines of torment; wherein striving to exceede the Pull of Phalaris, he made a frame of brasse, that should serue to korch mens bodies, and withall giue him leaue to behold them in their miserie. So deuillish is the nature of man, when reason, that should be his guide, is become a flauo to his brutish affections. In these mischiefs he was so outrageous, that he neither spared 30 Sexe, nor Age; especially, when he was informed of the slaughter of his children in Africa. But this was not the way to preserue his estate: it threw him into new dangers. They whom he had chased out of their Countrie, tooke armes against him, and draue him into such feare, that he was faine to seeke the Ioue at Carthage, by rusing well, he might haue had in Sicil. He freely deliuered into the Carthaginians hands, all those Townes of the Phoenicians in Sicil, belonging vnto them, which were in his possession. They requited him, honourably, with great store of corne, and with foure hundred talents of gold and siluer. So (though not without much trouble and hazard) he prevailed against the Rebels, and sciled his estate. Hauing no further businesse left in Sicil, he made a voyage into Italie. There he 40 subdued the Bruttians, rather by terrour of his name, than by any force, for they yielded at his first coming. This done, he went to the life of Lipara, and made the Inhabitants buy peace with one hundred talents of gold. But when he had gotten this great summe, he would needs exact a greater; and finding plainly that they had no more left, he was bold to spoile the Temples of their Gods. Heron (me thinks) he did well enough. For how could he belieue those to be Gods, that had continually giuen deaf eares to his horrible perjuries? Then he returned richly home, with eleuen ships loaden with gold: all which, and all the rest of his flut, were cast away by foule weather at Sea; one Gallie excepted, in which he himselfe escaped, to suffer a more miserable end. A grieuous sicknes fell vpon him, that rotted his whole bodie, spreading it selfe through all his veines and sinewes. Whilst he lay in this case, all desiring his end, saue only Theogenis (a wife that he had taken out of Aegypt) and her small children: his Nephew, the sonne of Archagathus before mentioned, and a younger sonne of his owne, beganne to contend about the 50 Kingdome.

Kingdome. Neither did they seeke to end the controuersie by the old Tyrants decision; they regarded him not so much. But each of them laied wait for the others life: wherein the Nephew sped so well, that he flue his Vncle, and got his Grandfathers Kingdome without asking any leaue. These tidings wounded the heart of Agathodes with feare and sorrow. He saw himselfe without helpe, like to become a prey to his vngracious Nephew, from whom hee knew that no tauer was to be expected, either by himselfe, or by those, whom only hee now held deare, which were, Theogenis, and her children. Therefore hee aduised her and them to flie before they were surprisid: for that otherwise they could by no meanes auoid, either death, or somewhat that would be worse. He gaue them all his treasures and goods, wherewith he euen compelled them (weeping to leaue him desolate in so wretched a case) to imbarke themselves hastily, and make speede into Aegypt. After their departure, whether he threw himselfe into the fire, or whether his disease consumed him, there was none left that cared to attend him; but he ended his life as basely, as obscurely, and in as much want, as he first beganne it.

After the death of Agathodes it was, that the Mamerines his Souldiers traitreously occupied Messana, and infested a great part of the land. Then also did the Carthaginians beginne to renew their attempts of conquering all Sicil. What the Nephew of Agathodes did, I cannot finde. Likely it is that hee quickly perished. 20 For the Sicilians were driuen to send for Pyrrius to helpe them, who had married with a daughter of Agathodes. But Pyrrius was soone wearie of the Countrie (as hath bene shewed before) and therefore left it; prophcing that it would become a goodly champaigne field, wherein Rome and Carthage should fight for superiortie. In which businesse, how these two great Cities did speede, the order of our storie will declare.

§. V.

30 A recontination of the Roman warre in Sicil. How Hieron, King of Syracuse, forsooke the Carthaginians; and made his peace with Rome.

Hen Appius Claudius, following the aduantage of his victorie gotten at Messana, brought the warre vnto the Gates of Syracuse, and besieged that great Citie; Hieron found it high time for him to seeke peace: knowing that the Carthaginians had neither any reason to be offended with him, for helping himselfe by what meanes he could, when they were not in case to giue him assistance; and foreseeing withall, that when once hee 40 had purchased his quiet from the Romans, it would be free for him to sit still, without feare of molestation, whilst Rome and Carthage were fighting for the maiestie. In this good moode, the new Roman Consuls, M. Valerius, and C. Otacilius, found him, and readily embraced the offer of his friendship. Yet they made vfe of their present aduantage, and sold him peace for an hundred (some say two hundred) Talents.

These Consuls had brought a great Armie into Sicil; yet did they nothing else in effect, than bring our Hiero to their side. If the Syracusan held them bulied (which I finde not, otherwise than by circumstances, as, by the summe of monie imposed vpon him, and by their performing none other peece of seruice) all the 50 whole time of their abode in the land; then was his departure from the friendship of Carthage, no lesse to his honour, than it was to his commoditie. For by no reason could they require, that he should suffer his owne Kingdome to runne into manifold perill of subuersion, for their sakes, that should haue receiued all the profit of the victorie: seeing they did expose him to the whole danger, without straining them.

themselves to give him reliefe. But the Carthaginians had lately made good proofe of the strength of Syracus, in the daies of Agathodes; and therefore knew, that it was able to beare out a very strong siege. And hereupon it is like that they were the more slack, in sending helpe: if (perhaps) it were not some part of their desire, that both Rome and Syracuse should weaken one the other, whereby their owne worke might be the easier against them both. Yet indeede, the case of the besieged Citie was not the same, when the Romans lay before it, as it had bene, when the Carthaginians attempted it. For there was great reason, to trie the vttermost hazard of warre against the Carthaginians, who sought no other thing than to bring it into slauerie: not to against the Romans, who thought it sufficient, if they could with draw it from the parrie of their enemies. Besides, it was not all one to be governed by Agathodes, or by Liero. The former of these cared not what the citizens endured, so long as he might pre-erue his owne tyrannie: the latter, as a iust and good Prince, had no greater desire than to winne the loue of his people, by seeking their commoditie; but including his owne felicitie within the publique, laboured to vphold both, by honest and faithfull dealing. Hereby it came to passe, that he enjoyed a long and happie raigne; lining deare to his owne Subjects, beloued of the Romans, and not greatly molested by the Carthaginians; whom, either the consideration, That they had left him to himselfe, ere he left their societie, made vnwilling to seek his ruine; or their more earnest businesse with the Romans, made vnable to compass it. 10

§. VI.

How the Romans besiege and winne Agigentum. Their beginning to maintain a fleet. Their first losse, and first victorie by Sea. Of Sea-fights in general.

* Agigentum was a goodly Citie, built by the Gods, vnder conduct of Aristes and Pythias.

EIRON, hauing sided himselfe with the Romans, aided them with victualls, and other necessities: so that they, presuming vpon his assistance, recall some part of their forces. The Carthaginians finde it high time to bestirre them; they send to the Ligurians, and to the troups they had in Spain, to come to their aide, who being arrived, they made the Citie of Agigentum, the seat of the warre, against the Romans, filling it with all manner of munition. 20
The Roman Consuls, hauing made peace with Iheron, returned into Italia; and, in their places, Lucius Pessumius, and Quintus Mamilius, arrived. They goe on towards * Agigentum: and finding 40 no enemy in the field, they beseege it, though it were flusht with fiftie thousand Souldiers. Alter a while, the time of ha. uell being come, a part of the Roman armie range the Countie to gather corne, and those at the siege grow negligent; the Carthaginians fallie furiously, and indanger the Roman Armie, but are in the end repelled into the towne with great losse: but by the smart fel on both 50 sides, the Assailants redoubled their guards, & the besieged kept within their couert. Yet the Romans, the better to assure themselves, cut a deepe trench, betweene tweene the walls of the Citie and their Campe: and another on the out-side thereof; that neither the Carthaginians might force any quarter suddenly, by a sallie, nor chole of the Countie without, breake vpon them vnwares: which double defence kept the assieged also from the receiving any reliefe of victualls, and munitions, whilst the Syracusan supplies the assailants with what they want. The besieged send for succour to Carthage, after they had bene in this fort pent vpon five moneths. The Carthaginians imbarke an Armie, with certaine Elephants, vnder the command of Hanno, who arrives with it at Heraclea, to the West of Agigentum. Hanno puts himselfe into the field, and surpriseth Erbesius, a Citie wherein the Romans had bestowed all their prouision. By meanes hereof, the famine without grew to be as great, as it was within Agigentum; and the Roman campe no lesse tightly assieged by Hanno, than the Citie was by the Romans: in somuch, as if Iheron had not supplied them, they had bene forced to abandon the siege. But seeing that this distresse was not enough to make them rise, Hanno determined to giue them battaile. To which end departing from Heraclea, he makes approach vnto the Roman campe. The Romans resolute to sustaine him, and put themselves in order. Hanno directes the Numidian horse-men to charge their Vanguard, to the end to draw them further on; which done, he commands them to returne, as broken, till they came to the body of the Armie, that lay shadowed behind some rising ground. 20 The Numidians performe it accordingly; and while the Romans pursued the Numidians, Hanno giues vpon them, and hauing slaughtered many, beats the rest into their Trenches.

After this encounter, the Carthaginians made no other attempt for two moneths, but lay strongly incamped, waiting vntill some oportunitie should inuite them. But Annibal, that was belieged in Agigentum, as well by signes as messengers, made Hanno know, how ill the extremitie which he endured, was able to brooke such dilatorie courtes. Hanno thereupon, a second time, prouoked the Consuls to fight: but, his Elephants being disordered by his owne Vanguard, which was broken by the Romans, lost the day, and, with such as escaped, he recovered Heraclea. Annibal 30 perceiving this, and remaying hopelesse of succour, resolute to make his owne way. Finding therefore that the Romans, after this daies victorie, wearied with labour, and secured by their good fortune, kept negligent watch in the night; he rusht out of the Towne with the greatest part of his armie, and past by the Roman campe without resistance. The Consuls pursue him in the morning, but in vaine: sure they were, that he could not carrie the Citie with him, which with little-doe the Romans entred, and pitifully spoiled. The Romans, proud of this victorie, purpose henceforth rather to follow the direction of their present good fortunes, than their first determinations. They had resolute in the beginning of this Warre, only to succour the Mamertines, and to keepe the Carthaginians from their owne coasts: 40 but now they determine to make themselves Lords of all Sicily; and from thence, being fauoured with the winde of good successe, to saile ouer into Africa.

It is the dileafe of Kings, of States, and of priuate men, to couer the greatest things, but not to enjoy the least; the desire of that which we neither haue nor neede, taking from vs the true vse and fruition of what we haue already. This curk vpon mortall men, was neuer taken from them since the beginning of the World to this day.

To prosecute this Warre, Lucius Valerius, and Titus Otacilius, two new Consuls, ascended into Sicily. Whereupon, the Romans being Masters of the field, many inland Townes gaue themselves vnto them. On the contrarie, the Carthaginians 50 keeping still the Lordship of the Sea, many maritime places became theirs. The Romans therefore, as well to secure their owne coasts, often invaded by the African fleets, as also to equall themselves in euery kinde of warfare with their enemies, determine to make a fleet. And herein fortune fauoured them with this accident, that being altogether ignorant in shipwrights-craft, a storme of winde thrust one of the Carthaginian Gallies, of five banks, to the shore.

Now had the Romans a patterne, and by it they beganne to set vp an hundred Quinquemes, which were Gallies, rowed by five on euery bank, and twentie of three on a bank: and while these were in preparing, they exercised their men in the feat of rowing. This they did after a strange fashion. They placed vpon the Sea-fands many leates, in order of the banks in Gallies, whereon they placed their water-men, and taught them to bear the land with long poles, orderly, and as they were directed by the Master, that so they might learne the stroke of the Gallie, and how to mount and draw their Oares.

When their fleet was finished, some rigging and other implements excepted, 10 C. Cornelius, one of the new Consuls (for they changed euery year) was made Admirall: who being more in loue with this new kinde of warfare, than well aduised, past ouer to Messina with seuentene Gallies, leauing the rest to follow him. There he staid not, but would needs row alongst the coast to Lipara, hoping to do some peece of seruice. Hannibal, a Carthaginian, was at the same time Gouverneur in Panormus; who being aduertised of this new Sea-mans arrival, sent forth one Boades, a Senator of Carthage, with twentie Gallies, to entertaine him. Boades, falling vpon the Consul vnwares, tooke both him and the fleet he commanded. When Hannibal receiued this good newes, together with the Romans Gallies and their Consul; he grew no lesse foolish hardie than Cornelius had bene. For he, 20 fancying to himselfe to surpris the rest of the Roman fleet, on their owne coast, ere they were yet in all points provided; sought them out with a fleet of fiftie saile: wherewith falling among them, he was well beaten, and leauing the greater number of his owne behinde him, made an hard escape with the rest: for of one hundred and twentie Gallies, the Romans vnder Cornelius had lost but seuentene, so as one hundred and three remained, which were not easily beaten by fiftie.

The Romans, being aduertised of Cornelius his overthrow, make haste to redeeme him, but giue the charge of their fleet to his Colleague, Dulius. Dulius, considering that the Roman vessels were heauie and slow, the African Gallies hauing the speede of them, deuised a certaine engine in the prow of his Gallies, where 30 by they might fasten or grapple themselves with their enemies, when they were (as we call it) boord and boord, that is, when they brought the Gallies sides together. This done; the waighier ships had gotten the aduantage, and the Africans lost it. For neither did their swiftnesse seruet them, nor their Marriners craft; the Vessells, wherin both Nations fought, being open: so that all was to be carried by the aduantage of weapon, and valour of the men. Besides this, as the heauier Gallies were likely to crush and crack the sides of the lighter and weaker, so were they, by reason of their breadth, more steadie; and those that best kept their feet, could also best vse their hands. The example may be giuen betweene one of the long boates of his Majesties great ships, and a London-barge.

Certainely, he that will happily performe a fight at Sea, must be skilfull in making choice of Vessells to fight in: he must beleue, that there is more belonging to a good man of warre, vpon the waters, than great daring; and must know, that there is a great deal of difference, betweene fighting loose or at large, and grappling. The Gunnes of a slow ship pierce as well, and make as great holes, as those in a swift. To clasp ships together, without consideration, belongs rather to a mad man, than to a man of warre: for by such an ignorant brauerie was Peter Stroscius 40 lost at the Azores, when he fought against the Marquesse of Santa Cruz. In like sort had the Lord Charles Howard, Admirall of England, been lost in the year 1588, if he had not bene better aduised, than a great many malignant fooles were, that found fault with his demeanour. The Spaniards had an Armie aboard them; and he had none: they had more ships than he had, and of higher building and charging; so that, had he intangled himselfe with those great and powerfull Vessells, he had greatly endangered this Kingdome of England. For twentie men vpon the defences, are equall to an hundred that boord and enter; whereas then, contrariwise, the Spaniards had an hundred, for twentie of ours, to defend themselves withall. But our Admirall knew his aduantage, and held it: which had he not done, he had not bene worthie to haue held his head. Here to speake in generall of Sea-fight (for particulars are fitter for priuate hands, than for the Public) I say, That a fleet of twentie ships, all good sailers, and good ships, haue the aduantage, on the open Sea, of an hundred as good ships, and of slower sayling. For if the fleet of an hundred saile keepe themselves neare together, in a grosse Squadron; the twentie ships, charging them vpon any angle, shall force them to giue ground, and to fall 10 back vpon their next fellows: of which so many as intangle, are made vnersueable, or lost. Force them they may easily, because the twentie ships, which giue themselves scope, after they haue giuen one broad side of Artillerie, by clapping into the winde, and slaying, they may giue them the other: and so the twentie ships batter them in peeces with a perpetuall vollicie; whereas those, that fight in a troupe, haue no roome to turne, and can alwaies vse but one and the same beaten side. If the fleet of an hundred saile giue themselves any distance, then shall the lesser fleet preuaile, either against those that are a-reare and hindmost, or against those, that by aduantage of ouer-sailing their fellows keepe the winde: and if vpon a Lee-shore, the ships next the winde be constrained to fall back into their owne Squadron, then it is all to nothing, that the whole fleet must suffer shipwrack, or render it selfe. 20 That such aduantage may be taken vpon a fleet of vnequall speede, it hath bene well enough conceiued in old time; as by that Oracion of Hermocrates, in Thucydides, which he made to the Syracusanians, when the Athenians invaded them, it may easily be obserued.

Of the Art of Warre by Sea, I had written a Treatise, for the Lord HENRIE, Prince of Wales; a subiect, to my knowledge, neuer handled by any man, ancient or moderne: but God hath spared me the labour of finishing it, by his losse; by the losse of that braue Prince, of which, like an Eclipse of the Sunne, wee shall finde the effects hereafter. Impossible it is to equall wordes and sorrowes; I will 30 therefore leaue him in the hands of God that hath him. Cura leues loquuntur, ingentes silent.

But it is now time to returne to the beaten Carthaginians; who by losing their aduantage of swift boats, and boording the Romans, haue lost fiftie saile of their Gallies: as on the other side, their enemies, by commanding the Seas, haue gotten libertie to saile about the West part of Sicily; where they raised the siege laid vnto Segesta, by the Carthaginians, and wonne the Towne of Mazella, with some other places.

¶ VII.

Diuers enterfeits of warre, betweene the Romans and Carthaginians, with variable successe. The Romans prepare to invade Africa: and obtaine a great victorie at Sea.

50 He victorie of Dulius, as it was honoured at Rome, with the first Naual triumph, that was euer scene in that Citie; so gaue it vnto the Romans a great encouragement, to proceede in their warres by Sea; whereby they hoped, not only to get Sicily, but all the other Iles betweene Italy and Africa, beginning with Sardinia, whither soone after they sent a fleet for that purpose. On the contrary side, Amilcar the Carthaginian, lying in Panormus, carefully waited for all occasions, that might helpe to recompence the late misfortune: and being aduertised, that some quarrell was growne betwene the Roman Souldiers, and their Auxiliaries, being such as caused them to incampe a part, hee sent forth Hanno to set vpon them; who taking them vnawares, buried foure thousand of them in the place. Now during the continuance of the Land-warre in Sicily, Hannibal, who had lately bene beaten by Sea, but escaped vnto Carthage, meaning to make amends for his former error, obtained the trust of a new fleet, whereat hee arrived at Sardinia: the conquest of which Iland, the Romans had entertained for their next enterprise. Now it so fell out, that the Romans, crossing the Seas from Sicily, arrived in the Port where Hannibal with his new fleet anchored. They set vpon him vnawares, and tooke the better part of the fleet which he conducted; himselfe hardly escaping their danger. But it little auailed him to haue escaped from the Romans. His good friends the Carthaginians, were so ill pleased with this his second vnfortunate voyage, that they hanged him vp for his diligence: for (as it hath bene said of old) Non est in bello peccare; in uarare it is too much to offend twice.

After this, it was long ere any thing of importance was done by the Confulls, till * Panormus was besieged: where, when the Romans had fought in vaine to draw the Carthaginians into the field; being vnable to force that great Citie, because of the strong Garrison therein bestowed: they departed thence, and tooke certaine inland Townes, as Mytilirum, Enna, Camerina, Hippina, and others, betwene Panormus and Messina. The yeare following, C. Attilius the Confull, who commanded the Roman fleet, discovered a Companie of the Carthaginian Gallies, ranging the coast: and, not staying for his whole number, pursued them with ten of his. But he was well beaten for the faile hee made, and lost all, but the Gallie which transported him: where in himselfe escaped with great labour. But ere all was done, the rest of Attilius his fleet was gotten vp: who renewing the fight, recovered from the Carthaginians a double number of theirs; by which the victorie remaining doubtfull, both chal-

** The Quinquemes are Gallies, where in euery Oare hath five men to draw it; the Quadreres had foure to an Oare; and the Triremes three.

The Romans resolute to transport the warre into Affrick; the Carthaginians, to arrest them on the coast of Sicily. The numbers, with which of them filled their fleet, was (perhaps) the greatest that euer fought on the waters. By Polybius his estimation, there were in the Roman Gallies an hundred and fortie thousand men; and in those of Carthage, an hundred and fiftie thousand: reckoning one hundred and twentie Souldiers, and three hundred Rowers, to euery Gallie, one with the other. The Roman fleet was diuided into foure parts, of which the first made the forme of a Wedge or Triangle; the two first squadrons making the Flanks, and the third the point thereof (wherein were the two Con-

fills as Admiralls) looking toward the enemy; and the middle of each, being equipt. Their Vessells of carriage were towed by the third squadron. After an came the fourth, in forme of a Crescent; very well manned; but exceeding thinne: for as the hornes of it inclosed all the third squadron, together with the corners of the first and second. The order of the Carthaginian fleet I cannot conceiue by the relation; but, by the manner of the fight afterwards, I conjecture, that the front of their fleet was thinne, and stretched in a great length, much like to that which the French call Combat en hay; a long front of horle, and thinne: which for meane the Pitot premised ouer the Lance, they haue changed. Behind this front stretched front, their Battalions were more solide. For Amilcar, Admiral for the Carthaginians, had thus ordered them, of purpose, (his Gallies hauing the fore side of the Romans that, when the first fleet of the Romans halted to breake through the first Gallies, they should all turne taile, and the Romans pursuing them (as after a victorie) disloace themselves, and, for euery selfe of taking the Romans awares, haue then other three squadrons barre b. hinder them. For to must it needs fall out, seeing that the third squadron towed their horse-boats, and victuallers; and the fourth had the Rearward of all. According to Amilcars direction it succeeded. For when the Romans had charged and broken, the thinn front of the Carthaginian fleet, which an away, they forthwith gaue after them with all speed possible, not so much as looking behinde them for the second squadron. Hereby the Romans were drawne neere vnto the side of the Carthaginian fleet, led by Amilcar, and by him (at the first) received great losse, till their second squadron came vp, which forced Amilcar to take him to his Oares. Hanno also, who commanded the right wing of the Carthaginian fleet, invaded the Roman Rearward, and preuailed against them. But Amilcar being beaten off, Marcus Attilius fell back to their succour, and put the Carthaginians to their heeles; as not able to sustaine both squadrons. The Rear being releued, the Confulls came to the aide of their third Battalion, which towed their victuallers, which was also in great danger of being beaten by the Africans: but the Confulls, joyning their squadron to it, put the Carthaginians to that part as to running. This victorie fell to the Romans, partly by the hardihood of their Souldiers; but principally, for that Amilcar, being first beaten, could neuer after joyne himselfe to any of his other squadrons: that remained a yet in fire like libes of unwilling to long as they fought upon euery terme; and but squadron to squadron. But Amilcar, forsaking the fight, ruen by let a fifth fourth part of the Roman fleet vnto, and ready to giue succour to any of the other parts that were oppressed. So as in conclusion, the Romans got the honour of the day: for they lost but foure and twentie of theirs; whereas the Africans lost thirtie that were funke, and heereore and three that were taken.

Now, if Amilcar who had more Gallies than the Romans, had also diuided his fleet into foure squadrons, (besides those that he ranged in the front, to draw on the enemies and to engage them) and that, while hee himselfe fought with one squadron that charged him, all the rest of the enemies fleet had been at the same time entertained, he had preuailed: But the second squadron, being first come to the rescue of the first, by which Amilcar was oppressed: and Amilcar, being oppressed and scattered, the Confulls had good leisure to relieve both their third and fourth squadron, and got the victorie.

Chloe the first among other his Precepts to Plutarch the second his sonne, where he aduised him concerning Warre against the Turkes, tells him that in all battles betwene them and the Christians he should neuer sitte to charge the Turks in the beginning of the fight, and to engage them at once with the rest. For (saith he) the Turks, who are alwaies refroued in the Reare of the battaile, and in whom the Turks repose their greatest confidence; come vp in a groff body, when all the troups, on both sides, are disbanded and in confusion; whereby they carrie the victorie before them without resistance. By the same order of fight, and reservation, did the Romans also preuaile against other Nations. For they kept their Triary in fore (who were the choice of their Armie) for the vp-shot and last blow. A great and a victorious advantage it hath euer bene found, to keepe some one or two good troups to looke on, when all else are disbanded and engaged.

§. VIII.

The Romans preuaile in Affric. Atilius the Consul propoundeth intolerable conditions of peace to the Carthaginians. He is utterly beaten, and made prisoner.

NOW the Romans, according to their former resolution, after they had repaired and re-vitualled their fleet, set saile for Africa, and arrived at the Promontorie of Hercules, a great Head-land, somewhat to the East of the Port of Carthage, and some fortie leagues from Heraclium in Sicily, where Amilcar himselfe as yet laid. From this Head-land (leaving the entrance into Carthage) they coasted the East-side of the Promontorie, till they came to Clypea, a Towne, about fiftie English mile from it. There they did imbarke, and prepared to besiege Clypea; which, to ease them of labour, was yeelded vnto them. Now had they a Port of their owne on Africa side; without which all inualions are foolish. By this time were the Africans also arrived at their owne Carthage; fearing that the Roman fleet and armie had directed themselves thither: but being aduertised, that they had taken Clypea, they made provisions of all sorts, both by Sea and Land, for their defence. The Romans send to Rome for directions, and in the meane while waste all round about them. The order given from the Senate, was, that one of the Consuls should remaine with the Armie, and that the other should returne, with the fleet, into Italie. According to this direction, Manlius the Consul is sent home to Rome; whither he carried with him twentie thousand African captives, with all the Roman fleet and armie; except fortie ships, fiftie teene thousand foot, and fise hundred horse, that were left with Atilius.

With these forces, Regulus easily wanne some Townes and Places, that were vnwalled, and laid siege to others. But he performed no great matter, before he came vnto Adis. Yet I hold it worthy of relation, that neare vnto the River of Bagrada, he encountered with a Serpent of one hundred and twentie foot long, which he slue, not without losse of many Souldiers, being driuen to vse against it such engines of warre, as serued properly for the assailing of Townes. At Adis he met with the Carthaginian Armie, whereof the Captaines were Tunno and Wallas, together with Amilcar, who had brought ouer out of Sicily fise thousand foot, and fise hundred horse, to succour his Countrey. These (belike) had an intent, rather to wearie him out of Africa, by warie protraction of time, than to vndergoe the hazard of a maine fight. They were careful to hold themselves free, from necessitie of coming to blowes: yet had they a great desire, to saue the Towne of Adis out of his hands. Intending therefore to follow their generall purpose, and yet to disturbe him in the siege of Adis, they incampe neare vnto him, and strongly (as they thinke) on the top of an hill: but thereby they loose the seruices, both of their Elephants, and of their horse-men. This disadvantage of theirs Regulus discouers, and makes vse of it. He allais them in their strength, which they defend a while; but in fine the Romans preuaile, and force them from the place, taking the spoile of their campe. Following this their good fortune at the heeles, they proceede to * Tunis, a Citie within sixteene miles of Carthage, which they assault and take.

* This Citie was taken from the Tunics by Charles the first in the year 1536, and was one of the three Keyes, which he gaue in charge, to Philip the second his sonne to keepe safe: to wit, this Tunis, the Key of Africa; Flus, the Key of the Maghreb; and Cadix, the Key of Spain. Romans preuaile, and force them from the place, taking the spoile of their campe. Following this their good fortune at the heeles, they proceede to * Tunis, a Citie within sixteene miles of Carthage, which they assault and take.

them againe: the third, our English were hold, in the time of the renowned Queene Elizabeth, to wring out of his hands; where we flaid not to pick any lock, but brake open the dees, and having effed all, threw it into the fire.

By

By the losse of this battaile at Adis, and more especially by the losse of Tunis, the Carthaginians were greatly dismayed. The Numidians, their next Neighbours towards the West, insult vpon their misfortunes; inuade, and spoile their Territorie, and force those that inhabite abroad, to forsake their villages and fields, and to hide themselves within the walls of Carthage. By reason hereof, a great famine at hand threatens the Citizens. Atilius findes his owne aduantage, and assures himselfe that the Citie could not long hold out: yet he feared least it might defend it selfe, vntill his time of Office, that was neare expired, should be quite runne out, whereby the new Consuls were like to reape the honor of obtaining it. Ambition therefore, that hath no respect but to it selfe, perswades him to treat of peace with the Carthaginians. But he propounded vnto them so vnworthy and base conditions, as thereby their hearts, formerly possessed with feare, became now so courageous and disdainfull, that they resolued, either to defend their libertie, or to die to the last man. To strengthen this their resolution, there arrived at the same time a great troupe of Greekes, whom they had formerly sent to entertaine. Among these was a very expert Souldier, named Xantippus, a Spartan: who being informed of what had passed, and of the ouerthrow which the Carthaginians receiued neare vnto Adis, gaue it out publicly, that the same was occasioned by default of the Commanders, and not of the Nation. This bruit ranne, till it came to the Senate; Xantippus is sent for; giues the reason of his opinion; and in conclusion, being made Generall of the African forces, he puts himselfe into the field. The Armie which he led, consisted of no more than twelue thousand foot, and foure thousand horse, with an hundred Elephants. No greater were the forces, wherewith the Carthaginians fought for all that they had, Libertie, Liues, Goods, Wiues, and Children: which might well make it suspected, that the Armies by Sea, before spoken of, were misse-numbered; the one consisting of an hundred and fortie thousand, and the other of an hundred and fiftie thousand: were it not commonly found, that they which vse the seruice of mercinarie Souldiers, are stronger abroad, than at their owne dores.

Xantippus, taking the field with this Armie, marched directly towards the Romans; and ranging his troups vpon faire and leuell ground, sitteth both for his Elephants and Horse, presented them battaile. The Romans wondred, whence this new courage of their enemies might grow: but confident they were that it should be soone abated. Their chiefe care was, how to resist the violence of the Elephants. Against them they placed the Velites, or light-armed Souldiers, as a solonne hope; that these might, either with darts and other casting weapons, driue back the beasts vpon the enemies, or at least breake their violence, and hinder them from rushing freely vpon the Legions. To the same end, they made their battailes deeper in file, than they had bene accustomed to doe. By which meanes, as they were the lesse subject vnto the impression of the Elephants; so were they the more exposed vnto the violence of horse, wherein the enemy did farre exceede them. The Elephants were placed by Xantippus, all in one ranke, before his Armie; which followed them at a reasonable distance: his horse-men, and some light-armed foot, of the Carthaginian Auxiliaries, were in the wings. The first onset was giuen by the Elephants, against which the Velites were so vnable to make resistance, that they brake into the battalions following, and put them into some disorder. In this case, the depth of the Roman battaile was helpfull. For when the beasts had spent their force, in piercing through a few of the first ranks; the Squadrons neuertheless persisted in their order, without opening. But the Carthaginian horse, hauing at the first encounter, by reason of their aduantage in number, driuen those of Atilius out of the field, beganne to charge the Roman battalions in flanke, and put them in great distresse; who being forced to turne face every way, could neither passe forward, nor yet retire; but had much to doe to make good the ground whereon they stood. In the meane while, such of the Romans, as had escaped the furie of the Elephants, and left them at their backs, fell vpon the Carthaginian Arriere, that met them in very good good array. It was no even match. The one were a disordered Companie, wearied with labour, and hurt; the other, fresh, and well prepared, to haue dealt with the enemy vpon equal termes. Here was therefore a great slaughter with little fight; the Romans hastily recoiling to the body of their Armie, which being surrounded with the enemy, and spent with traualle, fell all to rout, vpon the decar of these troupes, that open the way to a generall ouerthrow. So the Carthaginians obtayned a full victorie, destroying the whole Roman Armie, save two thousand, and taking six hundred prisoners, together with Attilius the Consull. Of their owne they loit no more than eight hundred mercenaries, which were slaine, when the fight began, by two thousand of the Romans, that wheeling about, to auoide the Elephant, bare downe all before them, and made way euen to the Carthaginian trenches. These were the two thousand that escaped, when the whole Armie behinde them was routed. All the rest were either taken or slaine. Here by fortune made the Romans know, that they were no lesse their vassalls, than were the Carthaginians: how insolent soeuer they had bene in their proposition of peace, as if they had purchased from her the inheritance of their prosperitie, which shee neuer gaue nor sold to any mortall man. With what joy these newes were well-come, when they came to Carthage, we may easily coniecture; and what great things the vertue of one man hath often brought to passe in the World, there are many examples to proue, no lesse than this of Xantippus: all of them confirming that sentence of EVARISTUS, Atena sapientis, plurimum vincit manus; Many mens hands equal not one wise minde.

After this great service done to the Carthaginians, Xantippus returned into Greece; whether first that he was more enuid than honoured, or for what other cause, it is vnknew.

The death of Attilius Regulus the Consull, was very memorable. He was sent from Carthage to Rome, about the exchange and ransom of prisoners on both sides: giving his faith to returne, if the bulineffe were not effected. When hee came to Rome, and plainly saw that his Countrey should looke by the bargain: so far was he from vrging the Senate vnto compassion of his owne miserie, that he earnestly perswaded to haue the prisoners in Affrick left to their ill destinies. This done, he returned to Carthage: where for his paines taken, he was rewarded with an horrible death. For this his constancie and faith, all Writers highly extoll him. But the Carthaginians seeme to haue judged him an obstinate and malicious enemy; that neither in his prosperitie would hearken to reason, nor yet in his calamitie would haue the naturall care, to perscure himselfe and others, by yielding to such an office of humanitie, as is common in all warres (not ground vpon deadly hatred) only in regard of some small aduantage. What soeuer the Carthaginians thought of him; sure it is, that his faithfull obseruance of his word giuen, cannot be too much commended. Put that graue speech, which he made in the Senate, against the exchange of prisoners, appeares, in all reason, to haue proceeded from a vaine glorious frowardnesse rather than from any necessitie of state. For the exchange was made soone after his death; wherein the Romans had the worse bargain, by so much as Regulus himselfe was worth. As for the authoritie of all Historians, that magnifie him in this point; we are to consider that they liued vnder the Roman Empire: Plinius, the Carthaginian, perhaps did censure it otherwise. Yet the death which he suffered with extreme torments, could not be more grieuous to him, than it was dishonourable to Carthage. Neither doe I thinke that the Carthaginians could excuse themselves herein, otherwise than by recrimination: saying, That the Romans desired to be no better intreated, for as much as it was their ordinarie practise to vs: others in the like sort. Crueltie doth not become more warrantable, but rather more odious, by being custumarie. It was the Roman custome, to whip almost to death, and then to behead, the Captaines of their enemies whom they took, yea although they were such, as had alwaies made faire warres with them. Wherefore fore it seeme: not meet, in reason, that they should crie out against the like tyrannical insolence in others, as if it were lawfull only in themselves.

The consideration both of this misfortune, that rewarded the pride of Attilius his intolerable demands; and of the sudden valour, wherinto the Carthaginians were changed by mere desperation; calls to remembrance the like insolence of others in prosperitie, that hath bred the like resolution in those, to whom all reasonable grace hath bene denied. In such cases I neuer hold it impertinent, to adde vnto one, more testimonies; approning the true rules, from which our passions carrie vs away.

In the year 1378. the Genovais wonne so fast vpon the Venetians, as they not only draue their Gallies out of the Sea, but they brought their owne fleet within two miles of Venice it selfe. This bred such an amazement in the Citizens of Venice, that they offered vnto the Genovais (their state referred) whatsoever they would demand. But Peter Doria, blowne vp with many former victories, would hearken to no composition; saue the yielding of their Citie and State to his discretion. Hereupon, the Venetians, being filled with disdain, thrust out to Sea with all their remaining power, and assailed Doria with such desperate furie, that they brake his fleet; kill Doria himselfe; take nineteene of his Gallies, foure score boats of Psaras, and foure thousand prisoners; recover Chios, Sza, and all the places taken from them; and following their victorie, enter the Port of Genoa, enforcing the Genovais, basely to begge peace, to their extreme dishonour and disaduantage, being beaten; which being victorious, they might haue commanded, to their greatest honour and aduantage. The like hapned to the Earle of Flanders, in the year 1380. when hauing taken a notable, and withall an ouer-cruell reuenge vpon the Ganteis, he refused mercie to the rest; who in all humilitie, submitting themselves to his obedience, offered their Citie, goods, and estates, to be disposed at his pleasure. This when he had vniuocally refused, and was resolved to extinguishe them utterly; they flue out of their Citie with five thousand chosen men, and armed with a desperate resolution, they charge the Earle, brake his Armie, enter Bruges (pele-mell) with his vanquished followers; and enforce him to hide himselfe vnder a heape of straw in a poore cottage; out of which with great difficultie he escaped, and saved himselfe. Such are the fruits of insolencie.

§. IX.

How the affaires of Carthage prospered after the victorie against ATILIVS: How the Romans hauing lost their fleet by tempest, resolve to forsake the Seas: The great aduantages of a good fleet in warre, betwene Nations diuided by the Sea.

BY the reputation of this late victorie, all places that had bene lost in Affrick, returned to the obedience of Carthage. Only Cyprus stands out; before which the Carthaginians sit downe, and assaile it, but in vaine: For the Romans, hearing of the losse of Attilius with their forces in Affrick, and withall, that Cyprus was besieged, make readie a grosse Armie, and transport it in a fleet of three hundred and fiftie Gallies, commanded by M. F. militus, and Ser. Fulvius, their Consulls. At the Promontorie of Mercure two hundred Carthaginian Gallies, set out of purpose, vpon the bruit of their coming, encounter them: but greatly to their cost. For the Romans tooke by force an hundred and fouretee of their fleet, and drew them after them to Cyprus; where they laid no longer, than to take in their owne men that had bene besieged: and this done, they made amaine toward Sicily, in hope to recouer all that the Carthaginians held therein. In this battie voyage they despise the aduice of the Pilots, Pilots, who pray them to finde harbour in time, for that the season threatned some violent formes; which euer hapned betweene the riling of Orion, and of the * Juglar. Now although the Pilots of the Roman Fleet had thus fore-warned them of the weather at hand, and certified them withall, that the South coast of Stiel had no good Ports, wherein to fave themselves vpon such an accident: yet this victorious Nation was perswaded, that the winde and seas feared them no lesse, than did the Africans; and that they were able to conquer the Elements themselves. So refusing to lay within some Port, as they were aduised, they would needs put out to Sea; thinking it a matter much helping their reputation, after this victorie against the Carthaginian fleet; to take a few worthlesse Townes vpon the coast. The mercilesse winde in the meane while ouertake them, and neare vnto Camerina, ouerturne and thrust headlong on the rocks; so that fourecore of three hundred and fortie ships: as their former great victorie was denouered by the Seas, before the same thereof recovered Rome.

The Carthaginians, hearing what had hapned, repaire all their warlike Vessells, hoping once againe to command the Seas: they are also as confident of their land-forces since the ouerthrow of Asinius. They send Asdrubal into Stiel with all their old Souldiers, and an hundred and fortie Elephants, imbarqued in two hundred Gallies. With this Armie and fleet he arrives at Lilybaum; where hee begins to vex the Partians of Rome. But aduersitie doth not discourage the Romans: They build in three months (a matter of great note) one hundred and twentie ships; with which, and the remainder of their late shipwrack, they row to Panormus, or Palermis, the chiefe Citie of the Africans in Stiel, and surround it by Land and Water: after a while they take it, and leaving a Garrison therein, returne to Rome.

Very desirous the Romans were to bee doing in Africk: to which purpose they imploied C. Scenuius, and C. Sempronius, their Consulls. But these wrought no wonders. Some spoile they made vpon the coasts of Africa: but Fortune robbed them of all their gettings. For in their returne, they were first set vpon the sands, and like to haue perished, neare vnto the lesser Syrie, where they were faine to heave all ouer-board, that so they might get off: then, hauing with much a doe doubled the Cape of Lilybaum, in their passage from Panormus towards Italie, they lost an hundred and fittie of their ships by foule weather. A greater discouragement neuer Nation had; the God of the warres fauoured them no more, than the God of the waters afflicted them. Of all that Mars enrich them with vpon the Land, Neptune robbed them vpon the Seas. For they had now lost, besides what they lost in fight, foure hundred and fixe ships and gallies, with all the munition and Souldiers transported in them.

The exceeding damage hereby receiued, perswaded them to giue ouer their Navigation, and their fight by Sea, and to send only a Land-armie into Stiel, vnder L. Caecilius, and C. Furius, their Consulls. These they transported in some three-score ordinarie passage-boats, by the straights of Messana, that are not above a mile and an halfe broad from land to land. In like sort, the ouerthrow which Asinius receiued in Africa, occasioned chiefly by the Elephants, made them lesse cholerick against the Carthaginians, than before; so that for two yeares after they kept the high and woodie grounds, not daring to fight in the faire and champion Countries. But this late resolution of forsaking the Seas lasted not long. For it was impossible for them to succour those places which they held in Stiel, without a Naue, much lesse to maintain the warre in Africa. For whereas the Romans were to send forces from Messana to Egesta, to Lilybaum, and to other places in the extreme West parts of Stiel, making sometimes a march of about an hundred and fortie English mile by land, which which could not be performed with an Armie, and the prouisions that follow it, in lesse than fourteene daies; the Carthaginians would passe it with their Gallies, in eight and fortie houres.

An old example we haue, of that great aduantage of transporting Armies by water, betweene Canutus, and Edmond Ironside. For Canutus, when he had entred the Thames with his Naue and Armie, and could not preuaile against London, suddenly imbarqued; and sailing to the West, landed in Dorset-shire, so drawing Edmond and his Armie thither. There finding ill entertainment, he againe slipt his men, and entred the Seuerne, making Edmond to march after him, to the succour of Worcester-shire, by him greatly spoiled. But when he had Edmond there, he failed back againe to London: by meanes whereof, he both wearied the King, and spoiled where he pleased, ere succour could arrive. And this was not the least helpe, which the Netherlands haue had against the Spaniards, in the defence of their libertie, that being Masters of the Sea, they could passe their Armie from place to place, vnwaried, and entire, with all the Munition and Artillerie belonging vnto it, in the tenth part of the time, wherein their enemies haue beene able to doe it. Of this an instance or two. The Count Maurice of Nassau, now liuing, one of the greatest Captaines, and of the worthiest Princes, that either the present or preceding Ages haue brought forth, in the year 1590. carried his Armie by Sea, with fortie Canons, to Breda: making countenance either to besiege Bosledune, or Gertruiden-Berg; which the enemy (in preuention) slied with Souldiers, and victuals. But as soone as the winde serued, he suddenly set saile, and arriving in the mouth of the Meuse, turned vnto the Rhine, and thence to Tydel, and fate downe before Zutphen. So before the Spaniards could march ouer land round about Holland, about fourecore mile, and ouer many great Riuers, with their Canon and carriage, Zutphen was taken. A-gaine, when the Spanish Armie had ouer-come this wearisome march, and were now farr from home, the Prince Maurice, making countenance to saile vnto the Rhine, changed his course in the night; and sailing downe the streame, he was set downe before Hulst in Brabant, ere the Spaniards had knowledge what was become of him. So this Towne he also tooke, before the Spanish armie could returne. Lastly, the Spanish armie was no sooner arrived in Brabant, than the Prince Maurice, well attended by his good fleet, hauing fortified Hulst, set saile againe, and presented himselfe before Nymegen in Gelders, a Citie of notable importance, and maltred it.

And to say the truth; it is impossible for any maritime Countie, not hauing the coasts admirably fortified, to defend it selfe against a powerfull enemy, that is master of the Sea. Hereof I had rather, that Spain than England should be an example. Let it therefore be supposed, that King Philip the second, had fully resolved to hinder Sir Iohn Norris in the year 1589. from presenting Dow Antonio, King of Portugale, before the gates of Lysborne; and that he would haue kept off the English, by power of his land-forces; as being too weak at Sea, through the great ouerthrow of his mightie Armada, by the fleet of Queene Elizabeth, in the year foregoing. Surely, it had not bene hard for him, to prepare an Armie, that should be able to resist our eleuen thousand. But where should this his Armie haue bene bestowed? If about Lysborne; then would it haue bene easie vnto the English, to take, ransack, and burne the Towne of Groine; and to waste the Countie round about it. For the great and threatening preparations, of the Earle of Altemira, the Marquess of Serabia, and others, did not hinder them from performing all this. Neither did the halfe leaue of eight thousand, vnder the Earle of Andrada, serue to more effect, than the increase of honour to Sir Iohn Norris, and his Associates: considering, that the English charged these, at Puente de Burgo, and passing the great Bridge, behind which they lay, that was flanked with shot, and barricadoed at the further end, routed them; tooke their campe; tooke their Generalls standard with the Kings Armes, and pursued them ouer all the Countie, which they fired. If a roiall Armie, and not (as this was) a Companie of priuate aduenturers, had thus begonne begunne the warre in Galicie; I thinke it would haue made the Spaniards to quit the guard of Portugale, and make haite to the defence of their S. Iago, whose Temple was not farre from the danger. But, had they held their first resolution; as knowing, that Sir Iohn Norris his maine intent was, to bring Don Antonio, with an Armie, into his Kingdome, whither coming strong, he expected to be readily and joyfully welcomed: could they haue hindered his landing in Portugale? Did not he land at Peniche, and march ouer the Countrie to Lyborno, fixe daies journee? Did not he (when all Don Antonio his promises failed) passe along by the Riuer of Lyborno, to Cascale, and there, hauing wonne the Fort, quietly imbarque his men, and depart?

But these, though no more than an handfull, yet were they English-men. Let vs consider of the matter it selfe; what an other Nation might doe, euen against England, in landing an Armie, by aduantage of a fleet, if we had none. This question, Whether an invading Armie may be resisted at their landing vpon the coast of England, were there no fleet of ours at the Sea to impeach it; is already handled by a learned Gentleman of our Nation, in his obseruations vpon Cæsars Commentaries, that maintains the affirmatiue. This he holds only vpon supposition; in absence of our shipping: and comparatiuely; as, that it is a more safe and easie course, to defend all the coast of England, than to suffer an enemy to land, and afterwards to fight with him. Surely, I hold with him, that it is the best way, to keepe our enemy from treading vpon our ground: wherein, if we faile, then must we seek to make him wish, that he had staid at his owne home. In such a case, if it should happen, our iudgements are to weigh many particular circumstances, that belong not vnto this discourse. But making the question generally, and positiue, Whether England, without helpe of her fleet, be able to debarre an enemy from landing; I hold that it is vnable so to doe: and therefore I thinke it most dangerous to make the adventure. For the encouragement of a first victorie to an enemy, and the discouragement of being beaten to the invaded, may draw after it a most perilous consequence.

It is true, that the Marshall Mentius, in his Commentaries, doth greatly complaine, that by his wanting forces, wherewith to haue kept the frontier of Guienne, so they of the Protestant religion; after the battaile of Moncouster, entred that Countie, and gathered great strength and reliefe thence; for if the King (saith he) would haue giuen me but reasonable means, je eusse bien garde a Monsieur l'Admiral, de faire boire ses Cheuaux en la Garonne; I would haue kept the Admiral from watering his horses in the Riuer of Garonne. Monsieur de Langey, on the contrarie side, prefers the not fighting vpon a frontier with an invading enemy, and commends the delay; which coulde the Constable of France held, against the Emperour Charles, when he invaded Prouence. Great difference I know there is, and a diuerse consideration to be had, betwene such a Countie as France is, strengthened with many fortified places; and this of ours, where our Rampars are but of the bodies of men. And it was of inualions vpon firme land, that these great Captaines spake: whose entrances cannot be vnertaine. But our question is, of an Armie to be transported ouer Sea, and to be landed againe in an enemies Countie, and the place left to the choice of the Invader. Hercunto I say, That such an Armie cannot be resisted on the coast of England, without a fleet to impeach it; no, nor on the coast of France, or any other Countie: except euery Creeke, Port, or sandie Bay, had a powerfull Armie in each of them to make opposition. For let his whole supposition be granted; That Kent is able to furnish twelve thousand foot; and that those twelve thousand be laid in the three best landing places within that Countie, to wit, three thousand at Margat, three thousand at the Nesse, and fixe thousand at Foulkston, that is somewhat equally distant from them both; as also that two of these troupes (vnlesse some other order be thought more fit) be directed to strengthen the third, when they shall see the enemies fleet to bend towards it: I say, that notwithstanding this prouision, if the enemy, setting saile from the Isle of Wight, in the first first watch of the night, and towing their long boats at these sternes, shall arrive by dawne of day at the Nesse, and thrust their Armie on thore there; it will be hard for those three thousand that are at Margat (twenty and foure long miles from thence) to come time enough to re-enforce their fellows at the Nesse. Nay, how shall they at Foulkston be able to doe it, who are nearer by more than halfe the way? Seeing that the enemy, at his first arrivall, will either make his entrance by force, with three or foure hundred shot of great Artillerie, and quickly put the first three thousand, that were intrenched at the Nesse, to runne; or else giue them so much to doe, that they shall be glad to send for helpe to Foulkston, and perhaps to Margat: wherby those places will be left bare. Now let vs suppose, that all the twelve thousand Kentish Souldiers arrive at the Nesse, ere the enemy can be readie to disimbarque his Armie, so that he shall finde it vnfaile, to land in the face of so many, prepared to withstand him; yet must we beleue, that he will play the best of his owne game; and (hauing libertie to goe which way he list) vnder couert of the night, set saile towards the East, where what shall hinder him to take ground, either at Margat, the Dunnet, or elsewhere, before they at the Nesse can be well aware of his departure? Certainly, there is nothing more ealie than to doe it. Yea the like may be said of Weymouth, Portbeck, Poole, and of all landing places on the South coast. For there is no man ignorant, that ships, without putting themselves out of breath, will easily out-runne the Souldiers that coast them. Les Armees ne valent point en course; Armes neither flee, nor runne poist, saith a Marshall of France. And I know it to be true, that a fleet of ships may be seene at Sunne-set, and after it, at the Lizard; yet by the next morning they may recouer Portland, whereas an Armie of foot shall not be able to march it in fixe daies. Again, when those troupes, lodged on the Sea-shores, shall be forced to runne from place to place, in vaine, after a fleet of ships; they will at length sit downe in the mid-way, and leaue all at adventure. But say it were otherwise; That the invading enemy will offer to land in some such place, where there shall be an Armie of ours readie to receiue him; yet it cannot be doubted, but that when the choice of all our trained bands, and the choice of our Commanders and Capaines, shall be drawne together (as they were at Tiherie in the year 1588) to attend the person of the Prince, and for the defence of the Citie of London: they that remaine to guard the coast, can be of no such force, as to encounter an Armie like vnto that, wherewith it was intended that the Prince of Parma should haue landed in England.

The Ile of Tercera hath taught vs by experience, what to thinke in such a case. There are not many Ilands in the world, better fenced by nature, and strengthened by art: it being euery where hard of access; hauing no good harbour wherinto to shelter a Naue of friends; and vpon euery coue or watering place a Fort erected, to forbid the approach of an enemies boat. Yet when Emanuel de Sylus, and Monsieur de Chatter, that held it to the vse of Don Antonio, with fixe or fixe thousand men, thought to haue kept the Marquesse of Santa Cruz, from setting foot on ground therein; the Marquesse hauing shewed himselfe in the Roade of Auera, did set saile, ere any was aware of it, and arrived at the Port des Moles, farre distant from thence, where hee wanted a Fort, and landed, ere Monsieur de Chatter, running thither in vaine, could come to hinder him. The example of Philip Stroffie, flaine the year before, without all regard of his worth, and of three hundred French prisoners murdered in cold blood, had instructed de Chatter and his followers, what they might expect at that Marquesse his hands: Therefore it is not like, that they were slow in carrying reliefe to Port des Moles. Whether our English would be persuaded to make such diligent haste, from Margat to the Nesse, and back againe, it may be doubted. Sure I am, that it were a greater march than all the length of Tercera; wherof the French-men had not measured the one halfe, when they found themselves preuented by the more nimble ships of Spain.

This may suffice to proue, that a strong Armie, in a good fleet, which neither foot, nor horse, is able to follow, cannot be denied to land where it list, in England.

H h h h

France, or elsewhere, unless it be hindered, encountered, and shuffled together, by a fleet of equall, or answerable strength.

The difficult landing of our English, at Fayal, in the yeare 1597, is alleged against this: which example moues me no way to thinke, that a large coast may be defended against a strong fleet. I landed those English in Fayal, my selfe, and therefore ought to take notice of this instance. For whereas I finde an action of mineited, with omission of my name; I may, by a ciuill interpretation, thinke, that there was no purpose to defraud me of any honour; but rather an opinion, that the enterprise was such, or so ill managed, as that no honour could be due vnto it. There were indeede some which were in that voyage, who aduised me not to vndertake it: and I hearkned vnto them, somewhat longer than was requisite, especially, whilst they desired me, to refuse the title of such an exploit (though it were not great) for a greater person. But when they began to tell me of difficultie: I gaue them to vnderstand, the same which I now maintaine, that it was more difficult to defend a coast, than to invade it. The truth is, that I could haue landed my men with more ease than I did; yea without finding any resistance, if I would haue rowed to another place; yea euen there where I landed, if I would haue taken more companie to helpe me. But, without fearing any imputation of rashnesse, I may say, that I had more regard of reputation, in that businesse, than of safetie. For I thought it to be long vnto the honor of our Prince & Nation, that a few Islanders should not thinke to any aduantage great enough, against a fleet set forth by Q. Elizabeth: and further, I was vnwilling, that some Low-Country Captaines, and others, not of mine owne squadron, whose assistance I had refused, should please themselves with a sweet conceipt (though it would haue been short, when I had landed in some other place) that for want of their helpe I was driven to turne taile. Therefore I tooke with me none, but men assured, Commanders of mine owne squadron, with some of their followers, and a few other Gentlemen, voluntaries, whom I could not refuse; as, Sir William Brooke, Sir William Harney, Sir Arthur Gorges, Sir Iohn Skot, Sir Thomas Ridgeway, Sir Henrie Thiane, Sir Charles Morgan, Sir Walter Chute, Marcellus Throckmorton, Captaine Laurence Kemis, Captaine William Morgan, and others, such as well vnderstood themselves and the enemy: by whose helpe, with Gods fauour, I made good the enterprise I vnderooke. As for the working of the Sea, the steepnesse of the Cliffe, and other troubles, that were not new to vs, we ouercame them well enough. And these (notwithstanding) made five or sixe Companies of the enemies, that fought to impeach our landing, abandon the wall, whercon their Musketers lay on the rest for vs, and wonne the place of them without any great losse. This I could haue done with lesse danger, so that it should not haue serued for example of a rule, that failed euen in this example: but the reasons before alleaged, (together with other reasons well knowne to some of the Gentlemen aboue named, though more private, than to be here laid downe) made me rather follow the way of brauerie, and take the shorter course; hauing it still in mine owne power to fall off, when I should thinke it meet. It is easily said, that the Enemy was more than a Coward; (which yet was more than we knew) neither will I magnifie such a small peccet of seruice, by seeking to proue him better: whom had I thought equall to mine owne followers, I would otherwise haue dealt with. But for so much as concerns the Proposition in hand; he that becheld this, may well remember, that the same enemy troubled vs more in our march towards Fayal, than in our taking the shore; that he fought how to stop vs in place of his aduantage; that many of our men were slaine or hurt by him, among whom Sir Arthur Gorges was shot in that march; and that such, as (thinking all danger to bee past, when wee had wonne good footing, would needs follow ou vs to the Towne, were driven by him, to forsake the pace of a man of warre, and betake themselves to an halting trot.

For end of this digression, I hope that this question shall neuer come to triall; his Majesties many moueable Forts will forbid the experience. And although the English will no lesse disdain, than any Nation vnder heauen can doe, to be beaten vpon vpon their owne ground, or elsewhere, by a forraigne enemy; yet to entertaine those that shall assaile vs, with their owne beefe in their bellies, and before they eate of our Kentish Capons, I take to be the wisest way. To doe which, his Majestic, after God, will imploy his good ships on the Sea, and not trust to any intrenchment vpon the shore.

X.

How the Romans attempt againe to get the mastery of the Seas. The victory of Cæcilius the Roman Consul at Panormus. The siege of Lilybeum. How a Rhodian Gallie entred Lilybeum at pleasure, in despite of the Roman fleet. That it is a matter of great difficultie to stop the passage of good ships. The Romans, by reason of grievous losses received, vnder CLAVDIUS and VNIUS their Consuls, abandon the Sea againe.

Men, without a strong Naue, the Romans found it altogether impossible, either to keepe what they had already gotten in Sicily, or to enlarge their Dominions in Africa, or elsewhere, they refused once againe, notwithstanding their late misadventures, to strengthen their fleet and ships of warre. So causing fittie new Gallies to be built, and the old to be repaired, they gaue them in charge (together with certaine Legions of Souldiers) to the new Consuls, C. Afranius, and L. Manlius. On the other side, Afranius perceiving that the Romans, partly by reason of the shipwrack which they had lately suffered, partly by reason of the ouerthrow which they received by Xanthippus in Africa, were lesse daring than they had beene in the beginning of the warre; and withall, that one of the Consuls was returned into Italy, with the one halfe of the Armie; and that Cæcilius, with only the other halfe, remained at Panormus: he removed with the Carthaginian forces from Lilybeum towards it, hoping to prouoke Cæcilius to fight. But the Consull was better aduised. For when Afranius had made his approches somewhat neare the Towne, Cæcilius caused a deepe trench to be cut, a good distance without the ditch of the Citie: betweene which and his trench he left ground sufficient, to embattaille a Legion of his Souldiers. To these he gaue order that they should aduance themselves, and passe ouer the new trench, till such time as the African Elephants were thrust vpon them. From those beats he commanded them to retire, by slow degrees, till they had drawne on the Elephants to the brinke of the new trench, which they could by no means passe. This they performed accordingly. For when the Elephants were at a stand, they were so gawled and beaten, both by those Souldiers that were on the inside of the trench, and by those that lay in the trench it selfe, that being enraged by their many wounds, they brake back furiously vpon their owne foot-men, and vtterly disordered them. Cæcilius, espying this aduantage, sallied with all the force he had; and charging the other troups, that stood embattailed, he vtterly brake them, and put them to their heels, making a great slaughter of them, and taking all their Elephants.

The report of this victory being brought to Rome, the whole state, filled with courage, prepared a new fleet of two hundred saile, which they sent into Sicily, to giue end to that warre, that had now lasted foureteen years. With this fleet and armie the Romans resolute to attempt Lilybeum, the only place of importance: which the Carthaginians held in Sicily; and all (indeed) saue Drepanum, that was neare lying. They set downe before it, and possessed themselves of all the places of aduantage neare vnto it, especially of such as command the haue, which had a very difficult entrance. They also beat to the ground fix towres of defence; & by forceable engines weaken so many other parts of the Citie, as the defendants began to despair.

H h h h h      Y c c

Yet Himilco, Commander of the Place, faileth not in all that belongs to a man of Warre. All that is broken, he repaireth with admirable diligence; he maketh many furious sallies, and giueth to the Romans all the affronts that possibly could be made. He hath in Garrison (besides the Citizens) ten thousand Souldiers; among which there are certaine Lieutenants, and other petty Officers, that conspire to render and betray the Towne. But the matter is reuealed by an Achaean, called Alexon, who had formerly, in danger of the like treason, saved Agriusentum. Himilco vseth the helpe of Alexon, to allure the hired Souldiers; and imploieith Himilco to appease the troups of the Gauls, which did wauer, and had sent their agents to the enemy. All promise constancie and truth; so that the Traitors, being vnable to performe what they had vnderaken, are faine to liue in the Roman campe as fugitiues, that had wrought no good whereby to deserue their bread. In the meane while, a supply of ten thousand Souldiers is sent from Carthage to their relief, hauing Hannibal, the sonne of Amilcar, for their Conductor: who, in despite of all resistance, entred the Port and Citie, to the incredible joy of the besieged. The old Souldiers, together with the new Companies, (thereto perswaded by Himilco with hope of great reward) resolute to set vpon the Romans in their Trenches, and either force them to abandon the siege, or (at least) to take from them, or set on fire, their engines of batterie. The attempt is presently made, and pursued to the vttermost, with great slaughter on both sides. But the Romans, being more in number, 20 and hauing the advantage of the ground, hold still their places, and with extreme difficultie defend their engines.

They of Carthage desire greatly to vnderstand the state of things at Lilybæum, but know not how to send into the Towne. A certaine Rhodian vnderakes the seruice; and hauing recieued his dispatch, sailes with one Gallie to Ægusa, a little Island neere Lilybæum. Thence, taking his time, he steered directly with the Port; and hauing a passing swift Gallie, he past through the best of the Channell, and recovered the water-gate, ere any of those, which the Romans had to guard the Port, could thrust from the shores on either side.

The next day, neither attending the couert of the darke night, nor dreading to 30
 be boarded by the Roman Gallies, who waited his returne, he set saile, and shipping his Oares (his Gallie being exceeding quick of sterage, and himselfe expert in all parts of the channell) recovered the Hauens mouth, and the Sea, in despite of all the pursuit made after him. Then, finding himselfe out of danger of being incompassed by many, he turned againe towards the mouth of the Hauen, challenging any one, if any one durst come forth, to vnderake him. This enterprise, and the well performing of it, was very remarkable, and much wondered at in those dayes:
 and yet, where there was no great Artillerie, nor any other weapons of fire, to kill a-farre-off, the aduerture which this Rhodian made, was not greatly hazardous.
 For in this Age, a valiant and judicious man of warre will not feare to passe by the 40 best appointed Fort of Europe, with the helpe of a good Tide, and a leading gale of winde: no, though fortie peeces of great Artillerie open their mouths against him, and threaten to tear him in peeces.

In the beginning of our late Queenes time, when Denmarke and Sweden were at Warre; our East-land fleet, bound for Leif-land, was forbidden by the King of Den- marke to trade with the subjects of his enemies, and he threatened to sink their ships if they came through the freights of Ellenour. Notwithstanding this, our Merchants (hauing a ship of her Majesties, called the Minion, to defend them) made the aduerture; and, sustaining some Volleys of shot, kept on their course. The King made all the prouision he could, to stop them, or sink them, at their returne. But 50 the Minion, commanded (as I take it) by William Burroughs, being the way, did not only passe out with little losse, but did beat downe, with artillerie, a great part of the Fort of Ellenour; which at that time was not so well rampard, as now perhaps it is: and the fleet of Merchants that followed him, went through without any wound wound recieued. Neither was it long since, that the Duke of Parma, besieging Antwerp, and finding no possibilitie to master it, otherwise than by famine, laid his Cannon on the banke of the Riuer, so well to purpose, and so euen with the face of the water, that he thought it impossible for the least boat to passe by. Yet the Hol- landers and Zelanders, not blowne vpon by any winde of glorie, but coming to finde a good market for their Butter and Cheefe, euen the poore men, attending their profit when all things were extreme deare in Antwerp, passed in boats of ten or twelue Tonnes, by the mouth of the Dukes Cannon, in despite of it, when a strong Westerly winde, and a Tide of flood fauoured them; as also with a contrarie 10 winde, and an ebbing water, they turned back againe: so as he was forced, in the end, to build his Stockado onerthwart the Riuer, to his meruailous trouble and charge.

The Fort St. Philip terrified not vs in the yeare 1566, when we entred the Port of Caliz; neither did the Fort at Puntal, when we were entred, beat vs from our anchoring by it; though it plaied vpon vs with foure Demi-cannons within point blanke, from fixe in the morning till twelue at noone. The siege of Offend, and of many other places, may be giuen for proofe, how hard a matter it is to stop the passage of a good ship, without another as good to encounter it. Yet this is true, that where a Fort is so set, as that of Angrain Terceira, that theris no passage alond beside it, or that the ships are driuen to turne vpon a bow line towards it, wanting all 20 helpe of winde and tide; there, and in such places, is it of great vfe, and fearefull:
 otherwise not.

But to returne to our aduenturous Rhodian: He arriues in safetie at Carthage, and makes them know the estate of Lilybæum. Others also, after this, take vpon them to doe the like, and performe it with the same success. The Romans therefore labour to choke the channell; and, for that purpose, fill many Merchants ships with great stones, and linke them therein. The force of the Tides cleares it againe in part: but they grounded so many of those great-bellied boats in the best of the entrance, as at last it made a manifeit riling and heape, like a ragged land, in the pas-30 sage. Hereby it came to passe, that a Carthaginian Gallie, taking her course by night, and not suspecting any such impediment, ranne her selfe a-ground thereon, and was taken. Now comes the braue Rhodian, thinking to enter, as he had done before:
 but this Carthaginian Gallie, a little before taken, gaue him chase, and gathered vpon him; he findes what shee is, both by her forme, and by her swiftnesse: and being not able to runne from her, resolved to fight with her: But shee is too well manned for him, so that he is beaten and taken.

Lilybæum, after this, is greatly distressed; the Souldiers being worne with labour and watching. But in this despaire there rose so violent a tempest, as some of the Romans wooden Towers, by which they ouer-top the walls of Lilybæum, were 40 ouer-turned. A Greek Souldier vnderakes to fire those that were fallen, and per-formes it: for the fire was no sooner kindled, but being blowne vnto by the bel-lowes of a tempest, it increased so fast, as it became resistlesse, and in the end burned all to ashes, and melted the brazen heads of the battering Rammes. Hereupon, despaire and wearinesse hinder the Romans from repairing their Engines: so that they resolute, by a long siege, to sterue the Defendants.

Vpon relation of what had past, a supply of ten thousand Souldiers is sent from Rome, vnder M. Claudius, the Consull. He arriues at Messina, and marcheth ouer land to Lilybæum: where hauing re-inforced the Armie, and supplied the Gallies with new Rowers, he propounds the surpris of Drepanum, a Citie on the other 50 side of the Bay of Lilybæum. This seruice the Captaines and Souldiers willingly embrace. So the Consull imbarques his troups, and arriues on the sudden in the mouth of the Port. Adherbal is Gouernour of the Towne, a valiant and prudent man of warre, who being ignorant of the new supply arrived at Lilybæum, was at first amazed at their sudden approach; but hauing recoured his spirits, he per-H h h h h 3

swades the Souldiers, rather to fight abroad, than to be inclosed. Herewithall hee promifeth great rewards to fuch, as by their valour fhall deferue them; offering to leadeth himfelfe, and to fight in the head of his fleet. Having fufficiently encouraged his men, he thrufts into the Sea towards the Romans. The Confull, de- ceived of his expectation, calls back the foremolt Gallies, that he might now mar- fhall them for defence. Hereupon fome row backward, fome forward, in great confufion. Adherbal findes and follows his advantage, and forceth the Confull into a Bay at hand, wherein he rangeth himfelfe, having the land on his back: ho- ping thereby to keepe himfelfe from being incompaſſed. But he was thereby, and for want of Sea-roume, fo ſtreightened, as he could not turne himfelfe any way 10 from his enemies, nor range himfelfe in any order. Therefore when he found no hope of reſiſtance, keeping the ſhore on his left hand, he thruſt out of the Bay with thirtie Gallies, beſides his owne, and ſo fled away: all the reſt of his fleet, to the number of ninetie and foure ſhips, were taken or funke by the Carthaginians. Adherbal for this ſervice is greatly honoured at Carthage; and Claudius, for his indi- cation and flight, as much diſgraced at Rome.

The Romans, notwithstanding this great loſſe, arme threeſcore Gallies, with which they ſend away L. Iunius, their Confull, to take charge of their buſineſſe in Sicily. Iunius arrives at Mefſana, where he meets with the whole remainder of the Roman fleet, thoſe excepted which rode in the Port of Lilybaeum. One hundred and twentie Gallies he had; and beſides theſe, he had gotten together almoſt eight hundred ſhips of burthen, which were laden with all neceſſary provisions for the Armie. With this great fleet he arrives at Syracufe, where he ſtaies a while; partly to take in corne; partly, to wait for ſome, that were too ſlow of ſaile, to keepe com- panie with him along from Mefſana. In the meane time, he diſpatcheth away to- wards Lilybaeum, his Queſters or Treafurers; to whom he commits the one halfe of his victuallers, with ſome Gallies for their conuoy.

Adherbal was not careleſſe, after his late victorie: but ſtudied how to uſe it to the beſt advantage. The ſhips and priſoners that he had taken, he ſent to Carthage. 30 Of his owne Gallies he deliuered thirtie to Carthalo, who had threeſcore and ten more vnder his owne charge; and ſent him to trie, what good might be done againſt the Roman fleet, in the Haven of Lilybaeum. According to this direction, Carthalo ſuddenly enters the mouth of that Haven, where he findes the Romans, more atten- tive to the keeping in of the beſieged Carthaginians, than to the defence of their owne againſt another fleet. So he chargeth them, boords and takes ſome, and fires the reſt. The Roman Campe takes alarme, and haſtens to the rescue. But Himilco, Governour of the Towne, is not behind hand; who ſallies out at the ſame time, and putting the Romans in great diſtreſſe, gives Carthalo good leiſure to goe through with his enterprize.

After this exploit, Carthalo ranne all along the South coaſt of Sicily, deuiling how 40 to worke miſchiefe to the enemy: wherein Fortune preſented him with a faire oc- caſion, which he wiſely managed. He was aduerted by his Scouts, that they had deſcried, neare at hand, a great fleet, conſiſting of all manner of Veſſells. Theſe were the victuallers, which the Confull Iunius, more haſtily than providently, had ſent before him towards Lilybaeum. Carthalo was glad to heare of their coming: for he and his men were full of courage, by reaſon of their late victories. Accom- pting therefore the great multitude of Roman Hulks approaching, to be rather a prey, than a fleet, likely to make ſtrong oppoſition, he haſtens to encounter them. It fell out according to his expectation. The Romans had no minde to fight: but were glad to ſeek ſhelter in an open Road, full of rocks, vnder cower of a poore Towne, 50 belonging to their partie, that could helpe to ſaue them only from the preſent dan- ger, by lending them engines and other aide, wherewith to beat off the Carthagi- nians that aſſailed them. Carthalo therefore, hauing taken a few of them, lay wait- ing for the reſt, that could not long ride vnder thoſe rocks, but would be forced, by

by any great change of winde, either to put out into the deepe, or to ſaue their men, how they could, by taking land, with the loſſe of all their ſhipping. Whilſt he was buſied in this care; the Confull Iunius drew neare, and was diſcovered. Againſt him Carthalo makes out, and findes him altogether vnprepared to fight, as being wholly ignorant of that which had happened. The Confull had neither meanes to flee, nor ability to fight. Therefore he likewiſe ran into a very dangerous Creeke; thinking no danger ſo great, as that of the enemy. The Carthaginian, ſeeing this, betakes himſelfe to a Station betweene the two Roman fleets; where he watcheth, to ſee which of them would firſt ſtirre, with a reſolution to aſſault that, which 15 ſhould firſt dare to put it ſelfe into the Sea. So as now all the three fleets were on the South coaſt of Sicily, betweene the Promontorie of Pachinus and Lilybaeum; a Tract exceeding dangerous, when the winde ſtormed at South. The Carthagini- ans, who knew the times of tempeſt, and their ſigns, finding belike ſome ſwelling billow (for ſo we doe in the Weſt of England, before a Southerly ſtorme) haſted to double the Cape of Pachinus, thereby to couer themſelves from the rage at hand. But the Romans, who knew better how to fight, than how to Nauigate, and neuer found any foule weather in the entrailes of their beaſts, their Soothſayers being all land-prophets, were ſuddenly ouertaken with a boiſterous South winde, and all their Gallies forced againſt the rocks, and vterly wrackt.

20 This calamitic diſcouraged the Romans, that they reſolued againe to forſake the Seas, and truſt only to the ſervice of their Legions vpon firme ground. But ſuch a reſolution cannot long hold. Either they muſt be ſtrong at Sea, or elſe they muſt not make warre in an Iland, againſt thoſe that haue a mightie fleet. Yet are they to be excuſed, in regard of the many great calamities which they had ſuffered, through their want of ſkill. Here I cannot forbear to commend the patient ver- tue of the Spaniards. We ſeldome or neuer finde, that any Nation hath endured ſo many miſadventures and miſeries, as the Spaniards haue done, in their Indian Diſco- ueries. Yet perſiſting in their enterprizes, with an invincible conſtance, they haue annexed to their Kingdome ſo many goodly Prouinces, as burie the remembrance 30 of all dangers paſt. Tempeſts and ſhipwracks, famine, ouerthrowes, mutinies, heat and cold, peſtilence, and all manner of diſeaſes, both old and new, together with extreme povertie, and want of all things needfull, haue bene the enemies, wherewith euerie one of their moſt noble Diſcoverers, at one time or other, hath encountered. Many yeares haue paſſed over ſome of their heads, in the ſearch of not ſo many leagues: yea more then one or two, haue ſpent their labour, their wealth, and their liues, in ſearch of a golden Kingdome, without getting further notice of it, than what they had at their firſt ſetting forth. All which notwithstanding, the third, fourth, and ſiſt vnder-takers, haue not bene diſheartned. Surely, they are worthily rewarded with thoſe Treafuries, and Paradies, which they en- 40 joy; and well they deſerue to hold them quietly, if they hinder not the like vertue in others, which (perhaps) will not be found.

§. XI.

The Citie of Eryx is surprized by the Romans, and recovered by AMILCAR, who stoutly holds warre with them five yeares. The Romans having emptied their common tresurie, build a new fleet, at the charges of private men. The great victorie at Sea of LVCTATIVS the Consul, whereby the Carthaginians are forced to crave peace. The conditions of the peace betwene Rome and Carthage.

THe Romans were carefull, to supply with all industrie, by land, the want of strength at Sea. Therefore they continue the siege of Lilybeum, and seeke to make sure to themselves all places, whither the enemies ships could not bring reliefe. The Consul Iunius, to cure the wound of dishonour, which hee had received, bethought him what enterprize to vndertake. In the end he resolved to attempt the Mountayne and Citie of Eryx, with the Temple of Venus Erycina: which was the fairest and richest of all the land; and of these, by cunning or treason, he got possession. Eryx was commodiously seated betwene Drepanum and Panormus; so that it seemed a fit place for a Garrison, that should restrain the Carthaginians from making roads into the Countrey. Wherefore Iunius fortified both the top of the Mountaine, and the first entrance of the passage from the bottome, (both which places were very defensible) with a good strength of men. But shortly after, in the tenth yeare of this warre, the Carthaginians sent forth Amilcar, surnamed Breac, Father of the great Hannibal, with a fleet and armie, who sailing to the coasts of Italy, did thoroughly repay the spoiles which the Romans made in Africa. For he first of all waited and destroyed the Territories of the Locrines, and of the Brutians, that were dependants of Rome. Then entred he into Sicily; and finding there no walled Citie in the Carthaginians power, that served fitly to insult the Romans; he occupied a peece of ground of great advantage, and lodged his Armie thereon; so that as well the Romans, that were in Panormus, as those that kept about Eryx, putting himselfe betwene both Armies with admirable resolution.

The place that Amilcar had seized vpon, was not only very strong by situation, but had the command of a Port: whereby it gaue him oportunitie, to scoure all the coast of Italy with his fleet, waiting all along as farre as to Cuma. In the Ile of Sicily he held the Romans to hard worke: lying neare vnto Panormus, wherein three yeares abode he did many notable acts, though not of much consequence, for that the enemy could neuer be drawne to hazard the maine chance. Having wearied himselfe and the Romans long enough about Panormus, he vndertooke a strange peece of worke at Eryx. The Roman Garrisons, placed there by Iunius, on the top, and at the bottome of the Mountaine, were very strongly lodged. Nevertheless Amilcar found a way, lying towards the Sea-side, by which he conveyed his men into the Citie of Eryx, that was about the middle of the ascent, ere the enemy knew of it. By this it came to passe, that the Romans which kept the top of the Mountaine, were freightly held (as it were) besieged. And no lesse was Amilcar himselfe restrained, by both of these Garrisons, and such as came to relieue them. There he found them pastime about two yeares more; hoping still to wearie out those that lay ouer his head, as they on the contrary did their best, to thrust him out of those quarters.

At this time, all the care, both of the Romans and of the Carthaginians, was bent vnto the prosecuting of this businesse at Eryx. Wherein it seemest true (as Hannibal in Lib. 3. l. 10. ad. in Line, spake vnto Scipio) that the affaires of Carthage neuer stood in better termes, since the beginning of the warre, than now they did. For whereas the Romans man: had vterly forsaken the Seas, partly by reason of their great losses; partly vpon confidence of their land-forces, which they held resistlesse; Amilcar, with a small Armie, had so well acquitted himselfe, to the honour of his Countrey, that by the triall of five yeares warre, the Carthaginian Souldier was judged equall, if not superiour, to the Roman. Finally, when all, that might be, had beene deuised and done, for the dislodging of this obdurate Warriour: no way seemed better to the Senate of Rome, than once againe to build a fleet; whereby, if the maiestie of the Sea could once be gotten, it was likely that Amilcar, for lack of supply, should not long be able to hold out. But in performing this, extreme difficultie was found. The common tresurie was exhausted: and the cost was not little, that was requisite vnto such an enterprize. Wherefore there was none other way left, than to lay the burden vpon private purses. Diuers of the principall Citizens vndertooke to build (each at his owne charges) one Quinquereme; which example wrought so well, that they, whose abilitie would not serue to doe the like, joynd with some others, and laying their monie together, concurred two or three of them, in building of another: with condition to be repaid, when the warre was finished. By this voluntarie contribution, they made and furnished two hundred new Quinqueremes: taking for their patterne, that excellent swift rowing Gallie which they had gotten from the Rhodesians, in the Port of Lilybeum, as was shewed before. The charge of this fleet was committed to C. Lucilius Catulus; who past with the same into Sicily, the Spring following, and entred the Port of Drepanum: endeavouring by all means to haue forced the Citie. But being aduertised that the Carthaginian fleet was at hand, and being mindfull of the late losses which his Predecessours had received; he was careful to put himselfe in order, against their arrival.

Hanno was Admirall of the Carthaginian fleet; a man (as his actions declare him) wise in picture, exceedingly formall, and skilfull in the arte of seeming reuerend. How his reputation was first bred, I doe not finde; but it was vp-held by a factious contradiction, of things vndertaken by men more worthy than himselfe. This qualitie procured vnto him (as it hath done to many others) both good liking among the ancient sort, whose cold temper is averse from new enterprizes, and therewithall an opinion of great foresight, confirmed by every losse received. More particularly, he was gracious among the people, for that he was one of the most grievous oppressors of their subiect Prouinces; whereby he procured vnto the Carthaginians much wealth, but therewithall such hatred, as turned it all to their great losse. He had ere this bene imploied against the Numidians, and wild Africans, that were more like to Rovers, than to Souldiers, in making Warre. Of those fugitive Nations, he learned to neglect more many enemies, to his owne great dishonour, and to the great hurt of Carthage; which lost not more by his bad conduct, than by his malicious counsaile, when, hauing shewed himselfe an unworthy Captaine, he betooke himselfe to the long Robe. Yet is he much commended in Roman Histories, as a temperate man, and one that studied how to preferre the League betwene Carthage and Rome. In which regard, how well hee deserved of his owne Countrey, it will appeare hereafter: how beneficiall hee was to the Romans, it will appeare, both hereafter, and in his present voyage; wherein he reduced the Carthaginians to a miserable necessitie of accepting, vpon hard conditions, that peace which he thenceforth commended.

Hanno had very well furnished his Nauie, with all needfull prouisions for the Souldiers at Eryx: (for dexteritie in making preparation was the best of his qualities) but he had neither bene careful in traying his Mariners, to the practise of Sea-fight, nor in manning his Gallies with stout fellows. Hee thought, that the same of a Carthaginian fleet was enough, to make the vnexpert Romans give way: forgetting, that rather the resistlesse force of tempests, than any other strength of opposition, had made them to forsake the Seas. Yet in one thing hee had either concurred conceiued a-right, or else was sent forth well instructed. It was his purpose, first of all to saile to Eryx, and there to discharge his ships of their lading: and hauing thus lightened himselfe, he meant to take aboard some part of the Land-armie, together with Amilear himselfe, by whose helpe he doubted not, but that he should be able to make the enimie repent of his new aduenture to Sea. This was a good counsell, if it could haue bene performed. But Catulus vsed all possible diligence, to prevent the execution of this designe: not because he was informed of the enimies purpose, but for that he knew it to be the best for them, and for that feared no danger so greatly, as to encounter with Amilear. Wherefore although the weather was very rough, and the Seas went high, when the Carthaginian fleet was desired; yet he rather chose to fight with the enimie, that had the winde of him, than to suffer this conuoy to pulle along to Eryx, vpon vnlikely hope of better opportunitie in the future. All that Hanno should haue done, Catulus had performed. Hee had carefully exercised his men in Rowing; hee had lightened his Gallies of all vnnecessarie burthen; and hee had taken aboard the choice men of the Roman Land-souldiers. The Carthaginians therefore, at the first encounter, were vterly broken and defeated; hauing loste of their Gallies flemmed and sunke, and seuentie taken, wherein were few lesse than ten thousand men, that were all made prisoners: the rest, by a sudden change of winde, escaping to the Ile of Hieroneſu.

The state of Carthage, vterly discouraged by this change of fortune, knew not whereon to resolue. Meanes to repaire their fleet in any time there were none left; their best men of warre by Sea were confumed; and Amilear, vpon whose valour and iudgement the honour and safetie of the Common-weale rested, was now surrounded by his enemies in Sicill, where he could not be relieved. In this extremitie, they make a dispatch vnto Amilear himselfe, and authorize him to take what course should seeme best vnto his excellent wisdom; leaving all conclusions to his election and sole counsaile.

Amilear, whom no aduersitie, accompanied with the least hope or possibilitie of recouerie, had euer vanquished, looking ouer euery promise, true or false, that the present time could make him, (for to attend any thing from the future he was not able) resolute to make triall, whether his necessitie might be compounded vpon any reasonable termes. He therefore sent to Lucilius the Consull an Ouer-ture of peace: who considering it well, gathered so many arguments from the present pouertie of the Roman State, waited beyond expectation in the former warre, that he willingly hearkened vnto it. So, in conclusion, an accord was made, but with prouision, That it should hold none otherwise, than if the Senate and People of Rome would ratifie it with their allowance.

The conditions were: First, that the Carthaginians should clearely abandon the Ile of Sicill. Secondly, that they should neuer undertake vpon Hieron King of Syracuse, nor invade any part of his Territories, nor the Territories of any of his Friends and Allies. Thirdly, that they should set at libertie, and send back into Italie, all the Romans, whom they hold prisoners, without ranfome. Lastly, that they should pay vnto the Romans two thousand and two hundred talents; which make, as the French reckon the talent, thirtene hundred and twentie thousand crownes: the same to be deliuered within twentie yeares next following.

These Articles were sent to Rome, where they were not thoroughly approued: but ten Commissioners were sent into Sicill, to make perfect the agreement. These Commissioners added a thousand talents to the former summe; and required a shorter time of payment. Further also, they tooke order, that the Carthaginians should not only depart out of Sicill it selfe, but should also with-draw their Companies out of all the other Ilands betweene it and Italie, renouncing their whole interest therein.

Such

Such was the end of the first Punick Warre, that had lasted about twentie foure yeares without intermission; in which time the Romans had lost, by fight or shipwrack, about seuen hundred Quinqueremes; and the Carthaginians, about fives hundred: the greatnesse of which losses, doth serue to proue the greatnesse both of these two Cities, and of the Warre it selfe; wherein I hold good the iudgement of Polybius, That the Romans, in general, did shew themselves the braver Nation; and Amilear, the most worthie Captaine.

CHAP. II.

Of diuers actions passing betweene the first and second Punick Warres.

§. I.

Of the cruell warre begunne betweene the Carthaginians and their owne Mercenaries.

THE Romans, hauing partly by force, and partly by composition, thrust the Carthaginians out of Sicill, and all the little Ilands thereunto adjacent, gaue them rather meanes and leisure to helpe themselves in a following warre, than cause to hold themselves contented with the present peace. It is a true rule, Quod leges à victoribus dicuntur, accipiuntur à victis; That lawes are giuen by the Conquerors, and receiued of the conquered. But the Romans had either forgotten the answer that was made vnto them, by one of the Priuernates; or else had forgotten to follow it, in this waightie business.

For when one of Priuernum, after a rebellion, to the Senate the cause of his Citie, was demanded by a Senator, What peace the Romans might hope for, or assure themselves of, if they quitted their present aduantage ouer them; he answered in these wordes, Si bonam dederitis, & fidem & perpetuam; si malam, haud diuturnam; If the peace be good and faithfull that you giue vs, it will be perpetuall; if it be ill, then of little continuance. To this answer, the Senate, at that time, gaue such approbation, that it was said, Viri & liberi vocem audiam; an credi posse, vllum populum, aut hominem deniq; in ea condicione, cuius cum paniteat, diutius quam necesse sit mansurum; That it was the speech of a manly, and a free man; for who could beleue, that any people, or indeede any one man, would continue longer in an ouer-burdened estate, than mere necessity did enforce? Now if the Romans themselves could make this iudgement, of those Nations, who had little else, besides their manly resolution, to defend their libertie; surely, they grossly flattered themselves, in presuming, that the Carthaginians, who neither in power nor in pride, were any way inferior vnto themselves, would sit downe any longer by the losse and dishonour receiued than vntill they could recover their legs, and the strength, which had a while failed them, to take reuenge. But Occasion, by whom (while well entertained) not only priuate men, but Kings and publique States, haue more preailed, than by any proper prowesse or vertue; with-

with-held the tempest from the Romans for a time, and turned it most fearefully vpon Africa, and the Carthaginians themselves.

For after that the first Punicke Warre was ended; Amilcar, leaving Eryx, went to Lilybæum, from whence most conveniently the Armie might bee transported into Africa: the care of which businesse he committed vnto Gelsco, to whom, as to a man of approved sufficiencie, he deliuered ouer his charge. Gelsco had an especial consideration of the great summes, wherein Carthage was indebted vnto these Mercenaries; and, withall, of the great disabilitye to make payment. Therefore he thought it the wisest way, to send them ouer (as it were) by handfulls, a few at a time; that so the first might haue their dispatch, and be gone, ere the second or third Companies arrived. Herein hee dealt prouidently. For it had not bene hard to persuade any small number, lodged within so great a Citie as Carthage, vnto some such reasonable composition, as the present emptinesse of the common Treasurie did require: so that the first might haue bene friendly discharged, and a good president left vnto the second and third, whilst their disunction had made them vnable to recouer their whole due by force. But the Carthaginians were of a contrarie opinion. They thought to finde, in the whole Armie, some that would be contented to gratifie the Publique state, by remitting a great part of their owne due: and for by such an example, to draw all the multitude to the like agreement and satisfaction. So they detayned the first and second companies, telling them, that they would make an euen reckoning with all together. Thus euery day the number increased, and many disorders (a thing incident among Souldiers) were committed; which much disquieted the Citie, not accustomed vnto the like. In this regard it was thought fit, to remove them all to some other place where they might be lesse trouble some. This must be done by some colourable wordes of perswasion: for their number was already so great, that it was not safe to offend them too farre. Wherefore it is deuised, that they should all attend the coming of their fellows, at Sicca: receiuing euery one a peece of gold, to beare his charges in the meane while. This motion is accepted, and the Souldiers beginne to dislodge; leaving behinde them their wiues, their children, and all their baggage, as meaning shortly to fetch away all, when they came back for their pay. But the Carthaginians haue no fancie to their returning into the Towne; and therefore compell them to trusse vp their fardells, that they might haue none occasion left, to make any errands thither. So to Sicca they removed, with all their goods; and there lay waiting for newes of their fellows arrival, and their owne pay. Businesse they had none to doe, and therefore might easily be drawne to mutinie: the whole argument of their discourse inclining them to nothing else. Their daily talke was, how rich they should be, when all their monie came in; how much would fall to euery single souldier; and for how long time the Citie was behinde hand with them in reckoning. They were all growne Arithmeticians; and he was thought a man of worth, that could finde most reason to increase their demands, to the very highest, euen beyond their due. No part of their long seruice was forgotten; but the comfortable wordes and promises of their Captaines, leading them forth to any dangerous fight, were called to minde, as so many obligations, not to be cancelled, without satisfying their expectation by some vnordinarie largesse.

Thus the time passeth away; vntill the whole Armie being arrived, and lodged in Sicca, Hanno comes thither to cleare the accompt. Now is the day come, wherein they shall all be made rich; especially if they can hold together, in maintaining stoutly the common cause. So thinke they all; and assemble themselves to heare what good newes this messenger had brought: with a full resolution to helpe his memorie in case he should happen to forget any part of the many promises made vnto them; all which were to be considered in their Donatiue. Hanno begins a verie formall Oration; wherein he bewailes the pauerie of Carthage; tells them, how great a summe of mony is to be paid vnto the Romans; reckons vp the excessive charges, whereat the common-wealth had bene in the late warre; and finally desires them to hold themselves contented with part of their pay, and out of the love which they bare vnto the citie, to remit the rest. Few of them vnderstood his discourse: for the Carthaginian Armie was composed of sundry Nations, as Greekes, Africans, Gules, Ligurians, Spaniards, and others, all of different languages. Yet they stared vpon him, and were (as I thinke) little pleased with his very gesture. But when such, as conceived the whole tenour of his speech, had informed the rest what cold comfort hee brought; they were all enraged, and fared like mad men: so that nothing would serue to appease them. Hanno would faine haue allwaged their furie, but he knew not how: for hee lesse vnderstood their dissonant lowde noises, than they did his Oration. An Armie collected out of many countries, that haue no one language common to all, or to the greater part of them, is neither easily stirred vp to mutinie, nor easily pacified, when once it is broken into outrage. I he best that Hanno can doe, is to vse the helpe of Interpreters, and messengers. But these Interpreters mistake his meaning; some, for want of skill; others, of set purpose; and such as deliuer his errands in the worst sense, are best beleued. Finally, they thinke themselves much abused, by the Carthaginians, and reioice to demand their owne, in peremptorie termes, at a nearer distance. In this moode they leaue Sicca, and march as farre as Tunis, that is within a litle of Carthage, and there they incampe.

Now begin the Carthaginians to finde their owne error: It is a good rule,

Fortibus & maioris:*

Haue speciall care, that valiant pauerie
Be not oppress'd with too great iniurie.

But this proude citie, hauing neglected the rule, hath also bene careless in providing to secure her selfe against the inconuenience that might followe. She had suffered the whole multitude, whereunto there was like to giue cause of discontent, to ioine it selfe into one bodie, when the seuerall troupes might easily haue bene dispersed: shee hath turned out of her gates the wiues, children, and goods of these poore men, which had beene retained in shewe of kindnesse, these might haue vled them, as Hollages, for her owne safetie; and by employing a miserable pennie-father, in her negotiation with men of warre, shee hath weakened the reputation of her brauest Captaines, that might best haue serued to free her from the threatening danger. Yet likely enough it is, that Amilcar had no desire to be vled as an instrument in defrauding his owne souldiours of their wages: especially considering, that as he best could beare witness of their merits, so was hee not ignorant, that to meane to content them were not wanting, if the Citizens had bene willing therunto. Here to may be added a probable coniecture, that Hanno, with his complices, who at this very time was a bitter enemy to Amilcar, had the boldnesse to impose the blame of his owne wretched counsaile, vpon the liberal promises made by the Captaines Amilcar therefore did wisely, in suffering those that maligned him, to haue the managing of their own plot, and to deale the cards which themselves had shuffled. This they continue to doe as foolishly, as they had at first begunne. They furnish a market at Tunis, for the souldiours; whom they suffer to buy what they list, and at what price they list. They send euer and anon some of their Senators into the Campe, who promise to satisfie all demands, as farre forth as it should be possible. And thus, by shifting from one extreme to another, they make the souldiours vnderstand, into what feare the city was driuen; which cannot but adde much insolencie to the passions already stirred vp.

This sudden change of weather, and the true cause of it, is quickly found by the

Armie,

Armie. which thereupon growes wife, and finding the season fit, labours to make a great Barnett. Monie mult be had, and without any abatement. This is granted. Many haue lost their horses, in publique seruice of the late. The late shall pay for them. They had liued some yeares, by making hard shift, without receiving their allowance of victuals from Carthage. If they had liued, they wanted not meat; therefore what was this to the Carthaginians? Was it not all one, whether the ships did bring in prouision; or their Captaine directed them where to fetch it? But this would not serue. They said that they had bene sometimes driuen to buy; and that (since they could not remember, how much, or at what rate they bought) they would be paid for their prouision, during the whole time, and according to the dearest price that wheat had borne, whilest the warre lasted. Such are now the demands of these Mutiniers; who might easily haue bene satisfied with faire lesse charges, and farre more honour, by receiving their due at the first. But now they make none end of crauing. For whilest the Carthaginians are perplexed, about this corne-monie; the Souldiers haue deuised many more tricks, whereby to extort a greater summe of monie, without all regard of shame. Since therefore no good end could bee found of these controuersies, which daily did multiply, it was thought conuenient, that one of the Carthaginians, which had commanded in Skil, should be chosen by the Souldiers, to reconcile all differences. Hereunto the Armie consented, and made choice of Geseo: partly out of good liking to him, who had shewed himselfe at all times a friendly man to them; and careful of their good, especially when they were to be transported into Africk: partly out of dislike which they had conceived of Anibear, for that hee had not visited them in all this buile time. So Geseo comes among them; and, to please them the better, comes not without monie: which might giue better countenance to his proceedings, than barren eloquence had done to the negotiation of Hanno. Hee calles vnto him first of all, the Captaines, and then, the seuerall Nations apart; rebuking them gently for that which had passed; aduising them temperately concerning the present; and exhorting them to continue their loue vnto the State, which had long entertained them, and would alwaies be mindfull of their good seruices. After this he beganne to put hand to his purse: offering to giue them their whole paie in hand; and then after to consider of other reckonings, at a more conuenient time. This had bene well accepted, and might haue serued to bring all to a quiet passe; if two seditious ring-leaders of the multitude had not stood against it.

There was in the Campe one Spendius, a turdie fellowe, and audacious, but a flauie; that in the late warre had fled from a Roman whome hee serued, and therefore stood in feare, lest hee should be deliuered backe to his Master; at whose hands hee could expect no lesse, than to be whipt and crucified. This wretch could finde no better way to prolong his owne life, than by raising such troubles, as might serue to withdraw men from care of priuate matters, and make his owne restitution impossible, were his Master neuer so importunate. With Spendius there associated himselfe one Matbo, an hate-headed man, that had bene so forward in stirring vp the tumult, as hee could not chooe but feare, lest his owne death should bee made an example, to deterre others from the like seditious behauiour. This Matbo deals with his countymen, the Africans; telling them, that they were in farre worse condition, than either the Gauls, the Greekes, the Spaniards, or any forreigne mercenaries. For (saith he) these our companions haue no more to doe, than to receive their wages, and so get them gone: but wee, that are to stay behinde in Africk, shall bee called to another manner of account, when wee are left alone; so that wee shall haue cause to wissh, that wee had returned home beggars, rather than laden with the monie, which little thought he shall breake our backs. Yee are not ignorant, how tyrannically these our haughty Masters of CARTHAGE doe reigne ouer vs. They thinke it reasonable, that our liues and goods should bee at their disposition, which they haue at other times bene accustomed to take away from vs, even without apparent cause, as it were to declare their Soueraintie: what will they now doe, seeing that we haue demeaned our selues as free men, and bene bold to set a good face on the matter, demanding our owne, as others haue done? Ye all doe knowe, that it were a very shame for vs, if hauing bene as forward in euery danger of warre, as any other men, we should now stand quaking like flauies, and not dare to open our mouthes, when others take libertie to require their due. This notwithstanding yee may assure your selues, that we are like to be taught better manners, as some as our fellows are gone: in regard of whom they are contented to shadow their indignation with a good, but a forced countenance. Let vs therefore be wife, and consider, that they hate and feare vs. Their hatred will shew it selfe, when their feare is once past: unless wee now take our time, and whilst we are the stronger, enfeeble them so greatly, that their hatred shall not be able to doe vs wrong. All their strength consisteth in monie, wherein will they haue liued others against vs, and vs against others. At the present they haue neither monie nor friends. The best Armie that euer serued them, whereof wee are no small part, lies at their gates, ready to helpe vs if we men. A better opportunitie cannot be expected: for were our swords once drawne, all AFRICK would rise on our side. As for the CARTHAGINIANS, whether can they send for helpe? The case is selfe euill: but we must quickly resolute. Either we must prevent the diligence of Geseo, by incensing these GAULES and SPANIARDES, and procuring them to draw blood; or else it behoueth vs to please our good masters, by ioyning with them against our fellows, yea by offering to serue vnto them all our wages, if so (per aduicere) they may bee wonne to forgive vs, or not over-cruely to punish our faults already committed. He is worthy a wretched flauie, that neither hath care to winne his Masters loue, nor courage to attempt his owne libertie.

By such persuasions Matbo winnes the African souldiers to his owne purpose. They are not now lo greddie of monie, as of quarell; which hee that seeks will not misse to finde. When Geseo therefore offered to pay them their whole stipend presently, but referred their other demands, for horses and victuals, to some other more conuenient time; they brake into great outrage, and say that they will haue all, euen all at once, and that out of hand. In this tumult, the whole Armie flocke together about Matbo and Spendius; whose diligence is not wanting, to adde more fuel to the fire already blazing. Matbo and Spendius are the onlie men to whom the souldiours will hearken: if any other stand vp to make a speech, a shewre of stones, flying about his eares, puts him to silence, that hee shall neuer afterwards speake word more. Neither stay they to consider what it is that any man would say: enough hath bene saide already by these good spoken men; so that no other word (though perhaps to the same purpose) can be heard; faue onely throne, throne.

Now the Rebellion begins to take forme. Matbo and Spendius are chosen Captaines; who, followed by a desperate crew of Ruffians, will suffer no man to make his owne peace, but pursue their owne ends, vnder faire pretence of the common cause. All which notwithstanding, Geseo is not wanting to the good of his countrie, but aduentures himselfe vpon their furie. One while hee deals with the Captaines, and other principall men; taking them by the hand, and giuing gentle wordes: another while hee works with the seuerall Nations; putting them all in hope of their owne hearts desire, if any reason would content them. None of them are so follen, as the Africans: indeed none of them had so good cause. They require him preemtorily, to giue them their owne, and not to feed them with wordes. The truth is, that they are not so couctous as they seeme: but will be more glad of an ill answer, than of a good payment. This is more then Geseo knowes: hee sees not that Matbo hath any more than bare wordes, to bestow vpon them. Wherefore, as rebuking their inconsiderate heat, hee telles them, That they may doe well, if they stand in want of monie, to seeke it of their Captaine, Matbo. This is enough. Shall hee both defend them and deride them? They stay no longer, but lay violent hands vpon the treasure that he had brought yea vpon him also, and all that are with him:

as intending to take this in part of payment, and, for the rest, to take another course. Matho and Spendius are glad of this. It had little pleased them to see their fellows beginne to grow calme, by his faire language: wherefore they cast into bonds both him, and all the Carthaginians that they can finde; that so the Armie may be freed from danger of good admonition, which they call Treason. After this follows open warre. Matho sollicites all Affrick; and his Embassadors are euerie where well entertained. Neither is it needfull to vs<sup>e</sup> perswasion: the verie fame of this rebellion sufficeth to drawe the whole cuntry into it. Now must the Carthaginians bee plagued for those oppressions, with which they haue plagued others. It is true that aduersitie hath neuer bene vtold of her errors: and as the is euer assured to heare her owne, so commonly with her owne shee vndergoes those of other men. The Africans, finding the Carthaginians hang vnder the wheele, tell them boldly, that their Impositions were mercilesse; that they tooke from them the one halfe of their corne, that they doubled their tributes in all things else; and that they inflicted vpon their vassals the greatest punishments for the least offences. These cruelties the Carthaginians themselves haue forgotten: but the people, that haue suffered so much, retaine all in perfect memorie. Wherefore not onely such as can beare armes, are ready to doe seruice in this great Commotion; but the verie women bring forth their jewels, and other ornaments, offering all to sale for maintenance of so iust a quarrell. By this great forwardnesse, and liberall contribution, Matho and Spendius are supplied with a strong aide of three score and tenne thousand Africans: and are moreouer furnished with monie, not onely to satisfie the present appetite of their men, but sufficient to continue the warre begunne, though it should bee of long endurance.

§. II.

†. I.

Here let vs rest awhile, as in a conuenient breathing place: whence wee may take prospect of the subiect, ouer which wee trauaile. Behold a tyrannicall Citie, persecuted by her owne mercenaries with a deadly warre. It is a common thing, as being almost necessarie, that a tyrannic should bee vpheld by mercinarie forces: it is common that mercenaries should be false: and it is common, that all warre, made against Tyrants, should be exceeding full of hate and crueltie. Yet wee seldom heare, that the ruine of a Tyrannie is procured or sought, by those that were hired to maintaine the power of it: and seldom or neuer doe we reade of any warre, that hath bene prosecuted with such inexorable hatred, as this that is now in hand.

That which wee properly call Tyrannie, is A violent forme of government, not respecting the good of the subiect, but onely the pleasure of the Commander. I purposely forbore to say, that it is the vnjust rule of one ouer many: for verie truly doth Cleom in Thucydides tell the Athenians, that their dominion ouer their subiects, was none other than a mere tyrannie; though it were so, that they themselves were

were a great Citie, and a Popular estate. Neither is it peradventure greatly needfull, that I should call this forme of commanding, violent: since it may well and easily bee conceiued, that no man willingly performs obedience, to one regardless of his life and welfare; vnlesse himselfe bee either a mad man, or (which is little better) wholly possessed with some extreme passion of loue. The practice of tyrannie, is not alwaies of a like extremite: for some Lords are more gentle, than others, to their very slaves; and he that is most cruell to some, is milde enough towards others, though it be but for his owne aduantage. Neuertheless, in large Dominions, wherein the Rulers discretion cannot extend it selfe, vnto notice of the difference which might bee found betweene the worth of seuerall men; it is commonly seene, that the taste of sweetnesse, drawne out of oppression, hath so good a relish, as continually inflames the Tyrants appetite, and will not suffer it to be restrained with any limits of respect. Why should hee seeke out bounds, to prescribe vnto his desires, who cannot endure the face of one so honest, as may put him in remembrance of any moderation? It is much that hee hath gotten, by extorting from some few: by sparing none, hee should haue riches in goodly abundance. He hath taken a great deale from euery one: but euery one could haue spared more. He hath wrung all their purses, and now hee hath enough: but (as Cæcilius is neuer fatished) he thinks that all this is too little for a flock, though it were inuade a good yearly income. Therefore hee deuileth new tricks of robbery, and is not better pleased with the gaine, than with the Art of getting. He is hated for this; and he knowes it well: but hee thinks by crueltie to change hatred into feare. So he makes it his exercise, to torment and murder all, whom he suspecteth: in which course, if he suspect none vnjustly, he may be said to deale craftily; but if Innocencie be not safe, how can all this make any Conspirator to stand in feare, since the Traitor is no worse rewarded, than the quiet man? Wherefore hee can thinke vpon none other securitie, than to disarm all his Subjects; to fortifie himselfe within some strong place; and for defence of his Person and state, to hire as many lustie Souldiers as shall bee thought sufficient. These must not bee of his owne Cuntry: for if not euery one, yet some one or other, might chance to haue a liking of the publique miserie. This considered, he allures vnto him a desperate rabble of strangers, the most vn timerly that can bee found; such as haue neither wealth nor credit at home, and will therefore be carefull to support him, by whose only fauour they are maintayned. Now lest any of these, either by detestation of his wickednesse, or (which in wicked men is most likely) by promise of greater reward, than he doth giue, should bee drawne to turne his sword against the Tyrant himselfe: they shall all be permitted to doe as hee doth; to robbe, to ransome, to murder, and to satisfie their owne appetites, in most outrageous manner; being thought so much the more assured to their Master, by how much the more hee sees them grow haterfull to all men else. Considering in what Age, and in what Language I write; I must be faine to say, that these are not dreames: though some English man perhaps, that were vnacquainted with Historie, lighting vpon this lease, might suppose this discourse to be little better. This is to show, both how tyrannie growes to stand in neede of mercinarie Souldiers, and how those Mercenaries are, by mutuall obligation, firmly assured vnto the Tyrant.

†. I. I.

That the tyrannie of a Citie over her Subjects is worse, than the tyrannie of one man : and that a tyrannicall Citie must likewise vse mercinarie Souldiers.

NOW concerning the tyrannie, wherewith a Citie or State oppresseth her Subjects, it may appeare some waies to be more moderate, than that of one man : but in many things it is more intolerable. A Citie is jealous of her Dominion ; but not (as is one man) fearful of her life : the lesse neede hath shee therefore, to secure her selfe by crueltie. A Citie is not luxurious in consuming her treasures ; and therefore needes the lesse, to pluck from her Subjects. If warre, or any other great occasion, driue her to necessitie, of taking from her Subjects more than ordinarie summes of monie : the same necessitie makes either the contribution easie, or the taking excusable. Indeede, no wrongs are so grievous and hateful, as those that are insolent. Remember (saith Caligula the Emperour, to his Grand-mother Antonia) that I may doe what I list, and to whom I list : these wordes were accounted horrible, though he did her no harme. And Juvenal reckons it, as the complement of all torments, inflicted by a cruell Roman Dame vpon her slaves ; that whilst shee was whipping them, shee painted her face, talked with her Gossips, and vsed all signes of 20 neglecting what those wretches felt. Now seeing that the greatest grievances, wherewith a domineering State offendeth her Subjects, are free from all sense of indignitie : likely it is, that they will not extremely hate her, although desire of libertie make them wearie of her Empire. In these respects it is not needfull, that shee should keepe a Guard of licentious cut-throats, and maintaine them in all villanie, as a Dionysius or Agathocles must doe : her owne Citizens are able to terrifie, and to hold perforce in obedience, all male-contents. These things, considered alone by themselves, may serue to proue, That a Citie is scarce able to deserue the name of a Tyrannesse, in the proper signification.

All this notwithstanding, it shall appeare, That the miseries, wherewith a Tyrant lodeth his people, are not so heauie, as the burdens imposed by a cruell Citie. Not without some apparence of truth, it may bee said, that Lust, and many other priuate passions, are no way incident to a Citie or Corporation. But to makethis good, wee shall haue neede to vse the helpe of such distinctions, as the Argument in hand doth not require. Was not Rome lasciuious, when Cato was faine to rise and leaue the Theater, to the end, that the reuerend regard of his grauitie, might not hinder the people, from calling for a shew of naked Courtians. that were to be brought vpon the open stage ? By common practise, and generall approved custome, we are to censure the quality of a whole State ; not by the priuate vertue or vice, of any one man ; not by metaphysicall abstraction, of the winner, fall from the singular, 40 or of the Corporation, from those of whom it is compounded. I say therefore (as I haue said elsewhere) That it were better to liue vnder one pernicious Tyrant, than vnder many thousands. The reasons, prouing this, are too many to set downe : but few may suffice. The desires of one man, how inordinate soeuer, if they cannot be satisfied, yet they may be wearied ; hee is not able to search all corners ; his humour may be found, and soothed ; age, or good aduice, yea, or some vnexpected accident, may reforme him : all which failing, yet is there hope, that his Successeur may proue better. Many Tyrants haue bene changed into wortheie Kings : and many haue ill vsed their ill-gotten Dominion, which becomming hereditarie to their posteritie, hath growne into the most excellent forme of Government, euen 50 a lawfull Monarchie. But they that liue vnder a tyrannicall Citie, haue no such hope : their Mistresse is immortall, and will not slacken the reins, vnill they bee pulled out of her hands ; and her owne mouth receiue the bridle of a more mightie Chariotier. This is wofull : yet their present sufferings make them lesse mindfull of

of the future. New flies, and hungrie ones, fall vpon the same sore, out of which, others had already sucked their fill. A new Gouvernour comes yearly among them, attended by all his poore kindred and friends, who meane not to returne home empty to their hiues, without a good lading of waxe and honie. These flies into all quarters, and are quickly acquainted with euery mans wealth, or whatsoeuer else, in all the Prouince, is worthe to be desired. They know all a mans enemics, and all his feares : becomming themselves, within a little space, the enemies that he feareth most. To grow into acquaintance with these matterfull guests, in hope to win their friendship, were an endlesse labour (yet it must be vnder-gone) and such as euery one hath not meane to goe about : but were this effected, what availeth it ? The loue of one Gouvernour is purchased with gifts : the Succellour of this man, he is more louing than could be wished, in respect of a faire Wife or Daughter : then comes the third, perhaps of the contrarie faction at home, a bitter enemy to both his fore goers, who seekes the ruine of all that haue bene inward with them. So the miseries of this tyrannie are not simple ; but interlaced (as it were) with the calamities of ciuill warre. The Romans had a Law De Repetundis, or Of Recouerie, against extorting Magistrates : yet wee finde, that it serued not wholly to reitrate their Prouinciall Gouvernours ; who presuming on the fauour of their owne Citizens, and of their kindred and friends at home, were bold in their Prouinces, to worke all these enormities rehearsed ; though somewhat the more sparingly, for 20 feare of judgement. If the subjects of Rome groned vnder such oppressions ; what mult we thinke of those, that were vassalls vnto Carthage ? The Romans imposed no burthen some tributes ; they loued not to heare, that their Empire was grievous ; they condemned many noble Citizens, for hauing bene ill Gouvernours. At Carthage all went quite contrarie : the rapines newly deuised by one Magistrate, serued as presidents to instruct another ; euery man resolu'd to doe the like, when it should fall to his turne ; and he was held a notable statesman, whose robberies had bene such, as might afford a good share to the common treasure. Particular examples of this Carthaginian practise, are not extant : the gouernment of Verrus the Roman, 30 in Sicill, that is lately set out by Tulius, may serue to informe vs, what was the demerour of these Tunick Rulers, who stood in feare of no such condemnation, as Verrus vnder-went. By prosecuting this discourse, I might inferre a more generall Proposition ; That a Citie cannot gouerne her subject Prouinces so mildly, as a King : but it is enough to haue shewed, That the tyrannie of a Citie is farre more intolerable, than that of any one most wicked man.

Sutable to the crueltie of such Lords, is the hatred of their subjects : and againe, suitable to the hatred of the subjects, is the jealousy of their Lords. Hence it followed, that, in warres abroad, the Carthaginians durst vse the seruice of African souldiers ; in Africk it selfe, they had rather bee beholding to others, that were farther 40 kitch. For the same purpose did Hannibal, in the second Tunick warre, thrust his mercenaries out of their owne Countries ; Vt Afrin Hispania, Hispani in Africâ, melior praeli ab domo futurus uesteris, miles, velut mutuis pignoris obligati stipendia recerent. Lin. Dec. 3. li. That the Africans might serue in Spain, the Spaniards in Africk, being each of them like to proue the better Souldiers, the farther they were from home, as if they were obliged by mutual pledges. It is disputable, I confesse, whether these African, and Spanish hirelings, could properly be termed Mercenaries : for they were subject vnto Carthage, and carried into the field, not only by rewarde, but by dutie. Yet seeing their dutie was no better than enforced, and that it was not any loue to the State, but meer desire of gaine, that made them fight ; I will not nicely stand vpon propriety of a word, but 50 hold them, as Polybius also doth, no better than Mercenaries.

THE extremedanger, growing from the imployment of such Souldiers, is well observed by Machiavel: who sheweth, that they are more terrible to those whom they serue, than to those against whom they serue. They are seditious, vnfaithfull, disobedient, deuourers, and destroyers of all places and countries, where into they are drawne; as being held by no other bond, than their owne commo-
10 dity. Yea, that which is most fearefull among such hirelings, is, that they haue often, and in time of greatest extremitie, not only refused to fight, in their defence, who haue entertained them, but revolted vnto the contrarie part; to the vtter ruine of those Princes and States, that haue trusted them. These Mercinaries (saith Machiavel) which filled all Italie, when Charles the eighth of France did passe the Alpes, were the cause that the said French King wonne the Realme of Naples, with his Buckler without a sword. Notable was the example of Sforza, the Father of Francis Sforza, Duke of Millan; who being entertained by Queene Iane of Naples, abandoned her seruice on the sudden; and forced her to put her selfe into the hands of the King of Aragon. Like vnto his father was Francis Sforza, the first 20 of that race Duke of Millan: who, being entertained by the Milanese, forced them to become his slaues; euen with the same Armie which themselves had leuied for their owne defence. But Lodowick Sforza, the sonne of this Francis, by the iust judgement of God, was made a memorable example vnto posteritie, in loosing his whole estate by the treacherie of such faithlesse Mercinaries, as his owne father had beene. For, hauing waded an Armie of Switzers, and committed his Duchie, together with his person, into their hands; he was by them deliuered vp vnto his enemy the French King, by whom he was inclosed in the Castle of Loches to his dying day.

The like inconuenience is found, in vsing the help of forraigne Auxiliaries. We see, that when the Emperor of Constantinople had hired ten thousand Turkes, against his Neighbour Princes; he could neuer, either by perswasion or force, set them againe ouer Sea vpon Asia side: which gaue beginning to the Christian scruitude, that loone after followed. Alexander, the sonne of Cassander, sought aide of the great Demetrius: but Demetrius, being entred into his Kingdome, slue the same Alexander who had invited him, and made himselfe King of Macedon. Syracus the Turke was called into Egypt by Sanar the Soldan, against his Opposite: but this Turke did settle himselfe so surely in Egypt, that Saladine his Successour became Lord thereof; and of all the hely Land, loone after. What neede we looke about for examples of this kinde? Every Kingdome, in effect, can furnish vs. The Brittaines drew the Saxons into this our Countrey; and Mac Murrough drew the English into Ireland: but the one and the other loone became Lords of those two Kingdomes.

Against all this may be all eaged, the good successe of the vnited Prouinces of the Netherlands, vsing none other than such kinde of Souldiers, in their late warre. In deede these Low Countries haue many goodly and strong Cities, filled with Inhabitants that are wealthie, industrious, and valliant in their kinde. They are stout Sea men, and therein is their excellencie; neither are they bad, at the defence of a place well fortified: but in open field they haue feldome beene able to stand against the Spaniard. Necessitie therefore compelled them to seeke helpe abroad: and the like 50 necessitie made them forbear to arme any great numbers of their owne. For, with monie raised by their Trade, they maintayned the warre: and therefore could ill spare, vnto the Pike and Musket, those hands, that were of more vse in helping to fill the common purse. Yet what of this? they sped well. Surely they sped as ill as might

might be, whilst they had none other than mercinarie Souldiers. Many fruitlesse attempts, made by the Prince of Orange, can witness it: and that braue Commander, Count Lodowick of Nassau, felt it to his grieft, in his retreat from Groeninghen; when in the very instant, that required their seruice in fight, his mercinaries cried out aloud for monie, and so ranne away. This was not the only time, when the hired souldiers of the States, haue either sought to hide their cowardize vnder a shew of greedinesse; or at least, by meere countousnesse, haue ruined in one houre the labour of many monthes. I will not stand to proue this by many examples: for they themselves will not denie it. Neither would I touch the honour of Monseur
10 the Duke of Anjou, brother to the French King; saue that it is folle to conceale what all the world knowes. He that would lay open the danger of forraigne Auxiliaries, needeth no better patterne. It is commonly found, that such Aiders make themselves Lords ouer those, to whom they lend their succour: but where shall we meet with such another as this Monseur, who, for his protection promised, being rewarded with the Lordship of the Countrie, made it his first worke, to thrust by violence a galling yoke vpon the peoples neck? Well, he liued to repeat it, with grieft enough. Euen whilst he was counterfeiting vnto those about him, that were ignorant of his plot, an imaginarie sorrow for the poore Burghers of Antuerpe, as verily beleecuing the Towne to be surprisid and wonne; the death of the Count
20 St. Agnan, who fell ouer the wall, and the Cannon of the Citie, discharged against his owne troups, informed him better what had hapned; shewing that they were his owne French, who stood in neede of pittie. Then was his fained passion changed, into a very bitter anguish of minde; wherein, faunting his brest, and wringing his hands, he exclaimed, He las, mon Dieu, que vens tu faire de moy; Als, my God, what wilt thou doe with me? So the affaires of the Netherlands will not serue to proue, that there is litle danger in vsing mercinarie souldiers, or the helpe of forraigne Auxiliaries. This notwithstanding they were obedient vnto necessitie, and sought helpe of the English, Scots, and French: wherein they did wisely, and prospered. For when there was in France a King, partaker with them in the same danger; when the Queen
30 of England refused to accept the Soueraignty of their Countrie, which they offered, yet being prouoked by the Spaniard their enemy, pursued him with continuall warre; when the heire of England reigned in Scotland, a King too iust and wise (though not ingaged in any quarrell) either to make profit of his Neighbours miseries, or to helpe those that had attempted the conquest of his owne inheritance: then might the Netherlanders very safely repose confidence, in the forces of these their Neighbour-Countries. The souldiers that came vnto them from hence, were (to omit many other commendations) not only regardfull of the pay that they should receiue; but well affected vnto the cause that they tooke in hand: or if any were cold in his deuotion, to the side whereon he fought; yet was he kept in order, 40 by remembrance of his owne home, where the English would haue rewarded him with death, if his faith had beene corrupted by the Spaniard. They were therefore trusted with the custodie of Cities; they were held as friends, and patrons; the necessitie of the poorer sort was relieved, before the pay-day came, with lendings, and other helps, as well as the abilitie of the States could permit. When three such Princes, reigning at one time, shall agree so well, to maintaine against the power of a fourth, in iurious (or at least so seeming) to them all, a Neighbour-Country, of the same Religion, and to which they all are louingly affected: then may such a Countrey be secure of her Auxiliaries, and quietly intend her Trade, or other business in hope of like successe. But these circumstances meet so feldome, as it may
50 well hold true in generall. That mercinaries, and forraigne auxilinarie forces, are no lesse dangerous, than the enemy, against whom they are entertained.

†. IIII.

That the moderate government of the Romans gaue them assurance to vse the seruice of their owne subjects in their warres. That in mans nature there is an affection breacing tyrannic, which hindreth the vse and benefit of the like moderation.

Here may it be demanded, whether also the Romans were not compelled to vse seruice of other souldiours in their many great warres, but performed all by their owne citizens? for if we see their manner to arme their owne subjects; how happened it, that they feared no rebellion? if strangers; how then could they auoide the inconueniences about rehearsed? The answer is; That their Armies were compounded vnuallie of their owne citizens, and of the Latines, in equall number: to which they added, as occasion required, some companies of the Campanes, Hetrurians, Samnites, or other of their subjects, as were either interested in the quarrell, or might best be trusted. They had, about these times, (though seldome they did imple to many,) tenne Roman Legions; a good strength, if all other helpe had bene wanting: which serue to keepe in good order their subjects, that were alwaies fewer in the Armie than themselves. As for the Latines, if consanguinitie were not a sufficient obligation; yet many priuiledges and immunities, which they enjoyed, made them assured vnto the State of Rome: vnder which they liued almost at libertie, as being bound to little else, than to serue it in warre. It is true, that a yoke, how easie soeuer, scemes troublesome to the necke that hath bene accustomed to freedome. Therefore many people of Italie haue taken occasion of seuerall aduantages, to deliuer themselves from the Roman subiection. But still they haue bene reclaimed by warre; the Authors of rebellion haue sharply punished; and the people, by degrees, haue obtained such libertie, as made them esteeme none otherwise of Rome, than as the common cite of all Italie. Yea, in proceesse of time it was granted vnto many cities, and those farre off remooued, euen to Tarusin in Cilicia, where Saint Paul was borne. That all the Burgeses should bee free of Rome it false. This fauour was conferred absolūtly vpon some; vpon some, with restraint of giuing voice in election of Magistrates, or with other such limitation, as was thought fit. Hereunto may be added, that it was their manner, after a great conquest, to release vnto their new subjects halfe of their tribute which they had bene wont to pay vnto their former Lords, which was a readie way, to bring the multitude into good liking of their present conditions; when the reuiue of harder times past, should rather teach them to feare a clasp, than to hope for better in the future, by seeking innouation. Neither would it be forgotten, as a speciall note of the Romans good government, That when some, for their well-deseruing, haue had the offer to be made citizens of Rome; they haue refused it, and held themselves better contented with their owne present estate. Wherefore it is no maruaile, that Tetullian, a cite of the Britons in Italie, chose rather to endure all extremitie of warre, than, vpon any condition, to forsake the Romans; euen when the Romans themselves had confessed, that they were vnable to helpe these their subjects, and therefore willed them to looke to their owne good, as hauing bene faithfull to the utmost. Such loue purchased these milde Gouvernours, without impairing their Maiestie thereby. The summe of all is: They had, of their owne, a strong Armie; they doubled it, by adioyning thereunto the Latines; and they further increased it, as neede required, with other helpe of their owne subjects; all or the most of their followers, accounting the proferitie of Rome to be the common good.

The moderate vse of soueraigne power being so effectually, in assuring the people vnto their Lords, and consequently, in the establishment or enlargement of Dominion: it may seeme strange, that the practise of tyrannic, whole discards are contrarie, hath bene so common in all ages. The like, I knowe, may bee saide, of all Vice, and and irregularitie whatsoeuer. For it is lesse difficult (whosoever thinke otherwise) and more saie, to keepe the way of Iustice and Honesty, than to turne aside from it; yet commonly our passions lead vs into by-patthes. But where Lust, Anger, Feare, or any the like Affection, seduceth our reason; the same vnrule appetite either bringeth with it an excuse, or at least wile taketh away all cause of wonder. In tyrannic it is not so: for as much as we can hardly deserie the passion, that is of force to insinuate it selfe into the whole tenour of a Government. It must be confessed, that lawlesse desires haue bred many Tyrants: yet so, that these desires haue seldome bene hereditarie, or long-lasting; but haue ended commonly with the Tyrants life, sometimes before his death; by which meanes the Government hath bene reduced to a better forme. In such cases, the saying of Aristotle holds, That Tyrannies are of short continuance. But this doth not satisfie the question in hand. Why did the Carthaginians exercise Tyrannic? why did the Athenians? why haue many other Cities done the like? If in respect of their generall good; how could they be ignorant, that this was an ill course for the safetie of the Weale publique? If they were led herunto by any affection; what was that affection, wherein so many thousand citizens, diuided and subdiuided within themselves by factions, did all concur, notwithstanding the much diuersitie of temper, and the vehemencie of private hatred among them? Doubtles, we must be saie to say, That Tyrannic is, by it selfe, a Vice distinct from others. A Man, we knowe, is Animal politicum, apt, euen by Nature, to command, or to obey; eury one in his proper degree. Other desires of Mankind, are common likewise vnto bruite beastes; and some of them, to bodies wanting sense: but the desire of rule belongeth vnto the nobler part of reason; whereunto is also answerable an aptnesse to yeeld obedience. Now as hunger and thirst are giuen by nature, not only to Man and Beast, but vnto all sorts of Vegetables, for the sustentation of their life: as Feare, Anger, Lust, and other Affections are likewise naturall, in conuenient measure, both vnto mankind, and to all creatures that haue sense, for the shunning or repelling of harme, and seeking after that which is requisite: euen so is this desire of ruling or obeying, engrated by Nature in the race of Man and in Man only as a reasonable creature, for the ordering of his life, in a ciuile forme of iustice. All these in-bred qualities are good and vsfull. Neuertheless, Hunger and Thirst are the Parents of Gluttonie and Drunkenness, which, in reproach, are called beastlike, by an vnproper terme: since they grow from appetites, found in lesse worthe creatures than beastes, and are yet not common in beastes, as in men. The effects of Anger, and of such other Passions as descend no lower than vnto bruite beastes, are held lesse vile; and perhaps not without good reason: yet are they more horrible, and punished more grieuouly, by sharper Lawes, as being in generall more pernicious. But as no corruption is worse, than of that which is best; there is not any Passion, that nourisheth a vice more hurtfull vnto Mankind, than that which issueth from the most noble roote, euen the depraued Affection of ruling. Hence arise those two great mischiefs, of which hath bene an old question in dispute, whether bee the worse; That all thin; or That nothing, should be lawfull. Of these, a dull spirit, and ouer-laden by fortune, with power, whereof it is not capable, occasioneth the one; the other proceedeth from a contrarie distemper, whose vehemencie the bounds of Reason cannot limit. Vnder the extremitie of either, no countrie is able to subsist: yet the defectiue dulnesse that permitte anything will also permit the execution of Law, to which, meere necessity doth enforce the ordinarie Magistrate; whereas Tyrannic is more active, and pleaseth it selfe in the excess, with a false colour of iustice. Examples of this vicioussitie, and vnaptnes to rule, are not very frequent, though such natures are eury where found: for this quality troubles not it selfe in seeking Empire; or if by some error of fortune, it encounter therewithall, (as when Claudius, hiding himselfe in a corner, found the Empire of Rome) some friend or else a wife, is it not wanting to supply the defect, which also cruelitie doth helpe to shadow. Therefore this Vice, as a thing vnknown, is without a name. Tyrannie is more bold, and feareth not to be knownen, but would be reputed honourable: for it is propter & falsis scelus, a fortunate mischance, as long as it can last. There is no reward or honour (saith PETER CHARRON) assigned to those, that knowe how to incase, or to preserve humane nature: all honours, greatnesse, riches, dignities, empires, triumphs, trophies, are appointed for those, that knowe how to afflict, trouble, or destroy it. CAESAR, and ALEXANDER, haue vn-mad and slaine, each of them, more than a million of men: but they made none, nor left none behinde them. Such is the error of Mans iudgement, in valuing things according to common opinion. But the true name of Tyrannie, when it growes to ripenesse, is none other, than Feritie: the same that Aristotle saith to be worse than any vice. It exceedeth indeed all other vices, issuing from the Passions incident both to Man, and Beast; no lesse than Perurie, Murder, Treason, and the like horrible crimes, exceede in villanie, the faults of Cluttonie and drunkennesse, that grow from more ignoble appetites. Hereof Sciron, Procrustes, and Pitycampes, that vied their bodily force to the destruction of Mankind, are not better examples, than Phalaris, Lionsius and Agathodes, whose milcheious heades were afflicted by the hands of detestable Ruffians. The same barbarous desire of Lordship, transported those old examples of Feritie, and these latter Tyrants, beyond the bounds of reason: neither of them knew the vse of Rule, nor the difference between Freemen, and slaues.

The rule of the husband ouer the wife, and of parents ouer their children, is natural, and appointed by God himselfe; so that it is alwaies, and simple, allowable and good. The former of these, is, as the dominion of Reason ouer Appetite; the latter is the whole authoritie, which one free man can haue ouer another. The rule of a King is no more, nor none other, than of a common Father ouer his whole countrie: which hee that knows what the power of a Father is, or ought to bee, knows to be enough. But there is a greater, and more Masterlie rule, which God gaue vnto Adam, when he said: Haue dominion ouer the fish of the Sea, and ouer the fowle of the aire, and ouer euerie living thing that moueth vpon the earth: which also he confirmed vnto Noah, and his children, laying, The feare of you, and the dread of you, shal be vpon euerie beast of the earth, and vpon euerie fowle of the aire, vpon all that moueth vpon the earth, and vpon all the fishes of the Sea; into your hands are they deliuered. Hee who gaue this dominion to Man, gaue also an aptitude to vse it. The execution of this power hath since extended it selfe, ouer a great part of Mankind. There are indeed no small numbers of men, whose disability to gouerne themselves, proueth them, according vnto Aristotles doctrine, to be naturall slaues.

Yet finde I not in Scripture any warrant, to oppress men with bondage: vnlesse the lawfulness thereof be sufficientlie intimated, where it is said, That a man shall not be punished for the death of a seruunt, whom he hath slaine by correction, if the seruant liue a day or two, because he is his monie, or else by the captiuitie of a Missionis girtles, which were made bondslaues, and the Sanctuary had a part of them for the Loretribute. Doubtlesse the custome hath bene very ancient: for Nabab laid this curse vnto Canaan, that he should be a seruant of seruants; and Abraham had of Pharoh, among other gifts, men-seruants, and maid-seruants, which were none other: than slaues. Christian Religion is said to haue abrogated this olde kinde of seruilitie: but surleie, they are deceived, that thinke so. Saint Paul desired the libertie of Onesimus, whome he had wonne vnto Christ: yet wrote hee for this vnto Philemon, by way of request, craving it as a benefite, not vrging it as a due. Agreeable hereto is the direction, which the same Saint Paul giueth vnto seruants: Let euery man shew in the same calling wherein hee was called: art thou called, being a seruant? care not for it, but if thou shalt be made free, use it rather. It is true, that Christian Religion hath procured libertie vnto many; not onely in regard of pictie, but for that the Christian Masters stood in feare, of being discouered by their flanes, vnto the persecuters of religion. Mahomet likewise by giuing libertie to his followers, drew many many vnto his impietie: but whether he forbad it, as vnlawfull, vnto his sectatours, to hold one another of them in bondage, I cannot tell; saue that by the practice of the Turks and Moores, it seemes he did not. In England we had many bond-seruants, vntill the times of our last ciuile warres: and I thinke that the Lawes concerning Vilainage are still in force, of which the latest are the sharpest. And now, since slaues were made free, which were of great vfe and seruice, there are growne vp a rabble of Rogues, Cutpurfes, and other the like Trades; slaues in Nature, though not in Lawe.

But whether this kind of dominion be lawfull, or not; Aristotle hath well proposed, that it is naturall. And certainly we finde not such a latitude of difference, in any creature, as in the nature of man: wherein (to omit the infinite distance in estate, of the clest & reprobate) the wisest excell the most foolish, by far greater degree, than the most foolish of men doth surpass the wisest of beasts. Therefore when Commiseration hath giuen way to Reason; we shall finde, that Nature is the ground euen of Masterly power, and of seruile obedience, which is thereto correspondent. But it may be truly said, that some countries haue sublied long, without the vse of any seruilitie: as also it is true, that some countries haue not the vse of any tame cattails. Indeede the affections which vphold ciuile rule, are (though more noble) not so simple needfull, vnto the sustentation either of our kinde, as are Lust, and the like; or of euerie one, as are hunger and thirst; which notwithstanding are the lowest in degree. But where most vile, and seruile dispositions, haue libertie to shew themselves begging in the streets; there may wee more iustly wonder, how the dangerous toile of sea-faring men can finde enough to vndertake them, than how the swarme of idle vagabonds should increase, by accesse of those, that are wearie of their owne more painefull condition. This may suffice to proue, that in Mankind there is found, ingrafted euen by Nature, a desire of absolute dominion: whereunto the generall custome of Nations doth subscribe; together with the pleasure which most men take in flatteries, that are the basest of slaues.

This being so, we finde no cause to meruaile, how Tyrannie hath bene so ripe in all ages, and practised, not onely in the single rule of some vicious Prince, but euery by consent of whole Cities and Estates: since, other vices haue likewise gotten head, and borne a generall sway; notwithstanding that the way of vertue be more honourable, and commodious. Few there are that haue vsed well the inferior Passions: how then can we expect, that the most noble affections should not bee disordered? In the government of wife and children, some are vtterlie carelesse, and corrupt all by their dull commiencie: others, by masterlie rigour, hold their owne blood vnder condition of slauerie. To be a good Governour is a rare commendation; and to preferre the Weale publicke aboue all respects whatsoever, is the Vertue iustly termed Herculeall. Of this Vertue, many ages asford not many examples. Victor is named by Aristotle, as one of them; and desecruded, if this praise be due to extraordinarie height of fortitude, vfed in defence of a mans owne countrie. But if we consider, that a loue of the generall good cannot be perfect, without reference vnto the fountainne of all goodnesse: wee shall finde, that no Morall vertue, how great soeuer, can, by it selfe, deserue the commendation of more than Vertue, as the Herculeall doth. Why therefore we must search the Scriptures, for patterns herof; such, as Dauid, Iosaphat, and Iosias were. Of Christian Kings if there were many such, the world would soone be happie. It is not my purpose to wrong the worth of any, by denying the praise where it is due; or by preferring a lesse excellent. But he that can finde a King, religious, and zealous in Gods cause, without enforcement so either of aduersitie, or of some regard of state; a procurer of the generall peace and quiet; who not onely vseth his authoritie, but addes the traualle of his eloquence, in admonishing his Iudges to doe iustice; by the vigorous influence of whose Government, ciuilitie is infused, euen into those places, that had bene the dennes of sauge Robbers and Cutthrotes; one that hath quite abolished a slauish Brethon Law,

Law, by which an whole Nation of his subjects were held in bondage; and one, whose higher vertue and wisdom doth make the prayle, not onely of Nobilitie and other ornaments, but of abstinence from the blood, the wifes, and the goods, of those that are vnder his power, together with a world of chiefe commendations belonging vnto some good Princes, to appeare lesse regardable: he, I say, that can finde such a King, findeth an example, worthie to adde vnto vertue an honourable title, if it were formerly wanting. Vnder such a King, it is likeley by Gods blessing, that a land shall flourish, with increase of Trade, in countries before vnknown; that Ciuitie and Religion shall be propagated, into barbarous and heathen countries; and that the happinesse of his subjects, shall cause the Nations farre off remoued, to wilh him their Soueraigne. I neede not adde herunto, that all the actions of such a King, euen his bodilie exercises, doe partake of vertue: since all things tending to the preleruation of his life and health, or to the mollifying of his cares, (who, fixing his contemplation vpon God, seeketh how to imitate the vnspokeable goodnesse, rather than the inaccessible maiestie, with both of which himselfe is indued, as farre as humane nature is capable) doe also belong to the furtherance of that common good, which hee procureth. Least any man should thinke mee transported with admiration, or other affection, beyond the Bonds of reason; I adde herunto, that such a King is neuertheless a man must die, and may erre: yet wisdom and fame shall fer him free, from error, and from death, both with and without the helpe of time. One thing I may not omit, as a singular benefite (though there be many other besides) redounding vnto this King, as the fruite of his goodnesse. The people that liue vnder a pleasant yoke, are not onely louing to their Soueraigne Lord, but free of courage, and no greater in mulier of men, than of stout fighters, if neede require: whereas on the contrarie, he that ruleth as ouer flauces, shall be attended, in time of necessitie, by flauish mindes, neither louing his person, nor regarding his or their owne honour. Cowards may be furious, and flauces outrageous, for a time: but among spirits that haue once yeelded vnto slauerie, vniuersallie it is found true, that Homer saith, God bereaue a man of halfe his vertue, that day when hee doeth him into bondage.

Homo. Odysse. l. 17.

Of these things, I might perhaps more seasonable haue spoken, in the generall discourse of Government: but where so liuelie an example, of the calamitie following a tyrannical rule, and the vse of Mercenaries, thereupon depending, did offer it selfe, as is this present businesse of the Carthaginians; I thought that the note would be more effectuall, than being barelie deliuered, as out of a common place.

§. III.

How the warre against the Mercenarie was diuersly managed by HANNO and AMILCAR, with variable successe. The bloodie counsailes of the Mercenaries; and their final destruction.

BEING now to returne vnto those Mercenaries, from whence I haue thus farre digressed, I cannot readilie finde, by what name henceforth I should call them. They are no longer in pay with the Carthaginians; neither care they to pretend, that they seeke their wages alreadie due: so that they are neither Mercenaries, nor Mutiners. Had they all become subjects vnto Carthage, then might they iustly haue become termed Rebels: but Spendius, and others, that were the principall part of them, ought none allegiance to that State, which they endeouored to subuert. Wherefore I will borrowe the name of their late occupation, and still call them Mercenaries, as Polybius also doth.

These

These vpon the aduantage of their present strength, besieged * Phica, and Hippagreta, Cities of great importance, as being seated vpon the westerne Hauens of Carthage, where it is diuided by a necke of land; Hippagreta standing inwards vpon the great Lake * Phica further out vpon the Sea. Neither was the Campe at Tunes abandoned, which lay flicly to hinder the Carthaginians, from passing vp into the countrie: for Matho and Spendius wanted not men, to followe the warre in all parts at once.

How the Carthaginians were amazed with this vnexpected perill, any man may conceiue. But the businesse it selfe awakes them halitic. They are hardly prest on all sides; and therefore trauailed their braines to the vttermost, how to shake off these furious dogges from their shoulders, who sometimes by night, sometimes by day, came vnto the very walles of their Citie. In this exigent Hanno was made their Generall: who failed not in his accustomed diligence of making all good preparation: but had gotten together whatsoever was needefull, as well to reherce Towne besieged, as to batter and assaile any place defended against him. With these piousions, and with an hundred Elephants, he came to Phica; so suddelic vnto a rising peece of woody ground, where they might be safe against the violence of the bealts. Hanno, thinking that he had to doe with Numidians, whose custome was, after any losse, to flie two or three whole daies iourne off: presently entred the Towne; to shew himselfe, after this his victory. But these good fellows, against whom he was to warre, had learned of Amilcar, to retire and to fight againe, many times in one day, as neede required. Therefore as soone as they perceived, that he knewe not how to vse a victorie; they assailed their owne Campe, and with great slaughter, drave the Carthaginians out of it, forcing them to hide themselves with in Phica; and got possession of all the store, that Hanno had brought for the reliefe of the Towne. This bad beginning Hanno followed with succable indifferencie: looting the benefite of many faire opportunities, and suffering the enemies to take possession, of all the entrance from Carthage to the firme land.

The Carthaginians, perceiving this, were exceedingly troubled, and did therefore let fall their there anchor, sending to the field their great Captaine, Amilcar, whom they furnished with ten thousand foote of supply, and seuentie Elephants. Amilcar had worke enough to doe, before he should be able to meet with the enemy vpon equal ground. For besides other places of aduantage that the Mercenaries had occupied, Hanno had sufered them to winne the onely Bridge, by which the Riuer Macar, or Bagradas, was passable vnto those, that were to trauaile into the Continent. This Riuer had not many foords, nor those easie for a single man to get ouer: but vpon them all was kept such guard, as gaue to Amilcar little hope of preuailing in seeking way by force. As for the Bridge it selfe, Matho & his followers were there lodged: and had there built a Towne, wherein to lie commodiously, intention onely to the custodie thereof. But Amilcar had obserued, that the very mouth of Bagradas vied to be sometimes cloyed with sand and grauell, that was driuen in by certaine customarie windes, and could not be driuen out againe, by force of that slow Riuer, till the wind falling, or changing, suilered the weight of the waters, to disburden their channell. Hereof he made vse; and taking his opportunitee, passed the Riuer; contrarie to all expectation, either of the enemy, or of his owne Citizens.

There was no neede to bid Spendius looke about him, when once it was heard, that Amilcar was come out Bagradas: all the Mercenaries were troubled with the news; knowing that they were no longer to deale with the imprudent graunty of Hanno, but with an able spirit, euen with their owne Matter in the Art of Warre; whom they admired, though they hated him. But this feare was soone changed into presumption; when more than fiftene thousand of their owne societie, were come from Phica; and other ten thousand from the gard of the Bridge. Their

Armie was farre greater, than that of Amilcar; and they were, in their owne judgement, the better men, vpon which confidence, they resolu'd to charge him on all sides, and beate him downe, in despite of his worth and reputation. With this resolution they attend'd vpon him; watching for some aduantage; and still exhorting one another to play the men, and giue the onser. Especiallie they that followed him in the Rere, had a great minde to begin the fight; whereunto their promptnesse was such, as tooke from them their former circumspection: Amilcar held his way towards the Bridge, keeping himselfe on plaine grounds, that were fitt for the seruice of his Elephants, which hee placed in front of his Armie. Neither made hee shewe of any desire to fight, but suffered the rashnesse of his enemies to increase, till it should breake into some disorder. At length perceiuing, that with more boldnesse than good heed, they followed him so neare, as would bee little for their good, if hee should turne vpon them, he hastened his march, euen to such a pace, as made a shewe little differing from plaine flight. The Mercinaries presently fell vpon his skirts; beleecuing, that for feare of them he was readie to runne away. But whilst they confusedly, as in sudden opinion of victorie, were driuing at the heeles of those that had the Rere; Amilcar wheeled about, and met them in the face, charging them hotely, but in very good order, so that amazed with the apprehension of unexpected danger, they fled without making any resistance. In this ouerthrowe, there were six thousand of the Mercinaries slaine, and about two thousand taken; the rest fled some to the Campe at Nica; others to the Towne at the Bridge; whither Amilcar followed them so fast, that he wanne the place easily: the enemies being thence also fled vnto Tunes, as not hauing recollected their spirits to make it good.

The fame of this victorie, together with the diligence of Amilcar in pursuing it, caused many Townes revolted, partly by feare, partly by force, to returne to their former obedience. Yet was not Matbo wanting to himselfe, in this dangerous time. He sent about Numidia and Africk, for new supplies; admonishing the people, now or neuer to doe their best, for the recouerie of their freedom; hee perswaded Spendius, and Autaritus that was Captaine of the Gaulles, to wait vpon Amilcar, and alwaies to keepe the higher grounds, or at least the foot of some hill, where they might be safe from the Elephants; and hee himselfe continued to presse the Towne of Hippagreta with an hard siege. It was necessarie for Amilcar, in passing from place to place, as his businesse required, to take such waies as there were: for all the countrie lay not leuell. Therefore Spendius, who still coasted him, had once gotten a notable aduantage of ground: the Carthaginians lying in a Plaine, surrounded with hilles, that were occupied by the Mercinaries, with their Numidian and African succours. In this difficultie, the fame of Amilcar his personall worth did greatly benefit his countrie. For Naransus, a young gentleman commanding ouer the Numidians, was glad of this occasion seruing to get the acquaintance & loue of so braue a man, which he much desired: and therefore came vnto Amilcar, signifying his good affection to him, with offer to doe him all seruice. Amilcar joyfully entertained this friend; promised vnto him his owne daughter in marriage; and so wanne from the enemies two thousand horse, that following Naransus turned vnto the Carthaginians side. With this helpe hee gaue battaile vnto Spendius: wherein the Numidian laboured to approue his owne valour, to his new friend. So the victorie was great: for there were slaine ten thousand of Spendius his fellows, and foure thousand taken prisoners, but Spendius himselfe, with Autaritus the Gaulle, escaped to doe more mischief. Amilcar dealt very gently with his prisoners: pardoning all offences past, and dismissing as many, as were vnwilling to become his followers; yet with condition, that they should neuer more beare armes against the Carthaginians; threatening to take sharpe reuenge vpon all, that should breake this Couenant.

This humanitie was vehemently suspected by Matbo, Spendius, and Autaritus, as

tending to winne from them, the hearts of their souldiers. Wherefore they resolu'd to take such order, that not a man among them should dare, to trust in the good nature of Amilcar, nor to hope for any safetie, whilst Carthage was able to doe him hurt. They counterfeited letters of aduertisement, wherein was contained, that some of their companie, respectiue onely of their priuate benefit, and careless of the generall good, had a purpose to betraie them all vnto the Carthaginians, with whom they held intelligence; and that it was needfull, to looke well vnto Geseo, and his companions, whom these traitours had a purpose to enlarge. Vpon this Theme Spendius makes an Oration to the souldiours, exhorting them to fidelitie; and shewing with many words, that the seeming humanitie of Amilcar, toward iome, was none other then a baite, wherewith to entrap them all at once together; as also telling them, what a dangerous enemy Geseo would proue, if hee might escape their hands. While hee is yet in the midst of his tale; were letters come, to the same purpose. Then steps forth Autaritus, and speaks his minde plainly: saying, that it were the best, yea the onely way, for the common fafete, to cut off all hope of reconciliation with Carthage; that if some were desiring to make their owne peace, it would goe hard with those, that had a care of the warre; that it were better to make an end of Geseo his life, than to trouble themselves with looking to his custodie; that by such a course euerie one should be engaged in the present Action, as hauing none other hope left, than in victorie alone; finally, that such as would speake here against, were worthe to bee reputed Traitors. This Autaritus was in great credit with the souldiours, and could speake sundrie languages, in such sort that he was vnderstood by all. According to his motion therefore it was agreed, that Geseo, and all the other prisoners, should forthwith be put to horrible death, by torments. Neuerthelesse there were some, that for loue of Geseo, sought to alter this intended crueltie; but they were forthwith sloned to death, as a Document vnto others; and so the Decree was put in execution. Neither were they herewithall contented; but further ordained, that all Carthaginian prisoners which they tooke, should be slued in like sort: and that the subjects or friends of Carthage, should loose their hands, and so be sent home: which rule they obserued euer afterwards.

Of this crueltie I need say no more, then that it was most execrable feticie. As for the counsaile of vsing it, it was like vnto the counsaile of Acheliomel; All Israel shall beare, that thou art abhorred of thy father; then shalt the hands of all that are with thee, be strong. Such are the fruits of desperation. He that is past all hope of pardon, is afraid of his owne fellowes, if they bee more innocent; and to auoid the punishment of lesse offences, committeeth greater. The cowardize of offenders, and the reuengefull spirits of those that haue bene wronged, are breeders of this desperation: to which may be added, some deficiency of Lawes, in distinguishing the punishments of malefactors, according to their decree of the feuerall crimes. A coward thinks all prouision too little, for his owne securitie. If Phocas as hee conu'd (saide the Emperour Mavritius) then is hee murderous. To be sedfast and sure, in taking reuenge; is thought a point of honour, and a defence against new iniuries. But wrongfully: for it is oposite to the rule of Christianitie; and such a qualitie discovered, makes them deadly enemies, who otherwise would haue repented, and sought to make amends, for the wrong done in passion. This was it, which wrought so much woe to the Carthaginians; teaching Matbo, and his African, to suspect euen their gentleness, as the introduction to extreme rigour. Like vnto the errors of Princes and Gouernours, are the errors of Lawes. Where one and the same punishment, is awarded vnto the lesse offence, and vnto the greater, he that hath aduentured to robbe a man, is easily tempted to kill him, for his owne securitie.

Against these inconueniences, Mercie and Seueritie, vsed with due respect, are the best remedies. In neither of which Amilcar failed. For as long as these his owne souldiours were any way likely to bee reclaimed, by gentle courtes; his humanitie

was ready to inuite them. But when they were transported with beaſtly outrage, beyond all regard of honeſtie and ſhame, he rewarded their villanie with anſwerable vengeance; caſting them vnto wilde beaſts, to be deuoured.

Vntill this time Hanno, with the Armie vnder his command, had kept himſelfe apart from Amilcar, and done little, as may ſeeme, for that nothing is remembered of him, ſince his late loſſes. Neither was Amilcar ſorie to want his helpe; as being able to doe better without him. But when the warre grew to ſuch extremitie, as threatened viter ruine to the one or the other ſide: then was Hanno ſent for, and came to Amilcar, with whom hee ioyned his forces. By this accell of ſtrength Amilcar was not enabled, to doe more than in former times: rather he could now performe nothing; ſuch was the hatred betwene him and his vnworthie Colleague. The Townes of Vitea and Hippagreta, that had ſtood alwaies firme on the Carthaginian partie, did now reuolt vnto the enemye, murdering all the ſouldiours that they had in Garrifon, and caſting their bodies forth, without ſuffering them to be buried. The prouiſions brought by ſea, for maintenance of the Armie, were loſt in foule weather: and Carthage it ſelfe ſtood in danger of being beſieged, about which Matho and Spencius conſulted, whiſt one of the Carthaginian Generals did (as it were) binde the others hands.

If hath in all Ages bene vſed, as the ſafeſt courſe, to ſend forth in great Expeditions, two Generals of one Armie. This was the common practice of thoſe two mighty Cities, Athens and Rome; which other States and Princes haue often imitated; perſwading themſelves, that great Armies are not ſo well conducted by one, as by two: who out of emulation to excell each other, will vſe the greater diligence. They haue alſo ioyned two chiefe Commanders in equall commiſſion, vpon this further conſideration; the better to reſtraine the ambition of any one, that ſhould be truſted with ſo great a ſtrength. For hereof all Common-weales haue bene iealous, hauing bene taught by their examples, that haue made themſelues Tyrants ouer thoſe Cities and States that haue employed them. In this point, the Venetians haue bene ſo circumspect, as they haue, for the moſt part, truſted ſtrangers, and not their owne, in all the warres which they haue made. It is true, that the equall authoritie of two commanding in chiefe, ſerueth well to bridle the ambition of one or both, from turning vpon the Prince or State that hath giuen them truſt: but in manning the warre it ſelfe, it is commonly the cauſe of ill ſucceſſe. In warres made neare vnto Rome it ſelfe, when two good friends were Conſuls, or ſuch two at leaſt, as concurred in one deſire of Triumph; which honor (the greateſt of any that Rome could giue) was to be obtained by that one yeeres ſeruiſe; it is no meruaile, though each of the Conſuls did his beſt, and referred all his thoughts vnto none other end than victorie. Yet in all dangerous caſes, when the Conſuls proceeded otherwiſe than was deſired, one Liſſitor was appointed, whoſe power was neither hindered by any partner, nor by any great limitation. Neither was it indeede the manner, to ſend forth both the Conſuls to one warre; but each went, whither his lot called him, to his owne Prouince; vntleſſe one buſineſſe ſeemed to require them both, and they alſo ſeemed fit to be ioyned in the adminiſtration. Now although it was ſo, that the Romans did many times peruaile with their ioyned Generals: yet was this neuer or ſeldome, without as much concord, as any other vertue of the Commanders. For their modeltie hath often bene ſuch, that the leſſe able Captaine, though of equall authoritie, hath willingly ſubmitted himſelfe to the other, and obeyed his directions. This notwithstanding, they haue many times, by ordaining two Commanders of one Armie, receiued great and moſt dangerous ouerthrowes; whereof in the ſecond Punick warre we ſhall finde examples. On the contrary ſide, in their warres moſt remote, that were alwayes managed by one, they ſeldome failed to winne exceeding honour, as hereafter ſhall appeare. Now of thoſe tenne Generals, which ſerued the Athenians at the Battaille of Marathon, it may truly be ſaid, that had not their temper bene better, than the iudgment of the people that ſent them forth, and had not they ſubmitted themſelves to the conduction of Miltiades; their affaires had found the ſame ſucceſſe which they found at other times, when they coupled Nicias and Alcibiades together in Sicily: the one being ſo ouer-warie, and the other ſo haſtie, as all came to nought that they vnderooke; whereas Cimon alone, as alſo Ariſtides, and others, hauing ſole charge of it, did their Countrie and Common-weale moſt remarkable ſeruiſe. For it is hard to finde two great Captaines, of equall diſcretion and valour; but that the one hath more of turie than of iudgement, and ſo the contrarye, by which the beſt occasions are as often ouerſlipt, as at other times many actions are vnſeaſonably vnderaken. I remember it well, that when the Prince of Condy was ſlaine after the Battaille of Iarnus, (which Prince, together with the Admirall Chaffillon, had the conduction of the Proteſtant Armie) the Proteſtants did greatly bewaile the loſſe of the ſaid Prince, in reſpect of his Religion, perſon, and birth; yet comforting themſelves, they thought it rather an aduancement, than an hinderance to their affaires. For ſo much did the valour of the one, outreach the aduſedneſſe of the other, as whatſoeuer the Admirall intended to winne by attending the aduantage, the Prince adu ventured to looſe, by being ouer-confident in his owne courage.

But we need no better example, than of the Carthaginians in this preſent buſineſſe: who, though they were ſtill ſicke of their ill grounded loue to Hanno, and were willing to diſgrace him; yet ſeeing that all ranne towards ruine, through the diſcord of the Generals, committed the deciſion of their controuerſies, vnto the Armie that ſerued vnder them. The iudgement of the Armie was, that Hanno ſhould depart the Campe: which he did; and Hannibal was ſent in his ſtead, one that would be directed by Amilcar; and that was enough.

After this, the affaires of Carthage began to proper ſomewhat better. Matho and Spencius had brought their Armie neare vnto the Citie; and lay before it, as in a ſiege. They might well be bold, to hope and adventure much, hauing in their Campe about ſittie thouſand, beſides thoſe that lay abroad in Garrifons. Neuertheleſſe, the Citie was too ſtrong for them to winne by aſſault: and the entrance of victualles they could not hinder, if any ſhould bee ſent in by friends from abroad.

Hieron, King of Syracule, though during the warres in Sicily he aſſiſted the Romans, and ſtill continued in their Alliance, yet now ſent ſuccours to the Carthaginians: fearing their fall, and conſequently his owne; becauſe if no other State gaue the Romans ſomewhat to trouble their digeſtion, the Principalltie of Syracule would ſoone be deuoured by them. The Roman alſo gaue them ſome ſmaller aſſiſtance, and for the preſent reſuſed good offers made vnto them by the Mercenaries. This they did, to ſhew a kinde of noble diſpoſition; which was indeede but counterſeit, as the ſequels manifeſtly proued.

Whileſt Matho and his followers were buſily preſſing the Citie, Amilcar was as diligent, in waiting at their backes, and cutting off all that came to their ſupply: ſo that finding themſelves more ſtraightly beſieged by him, than Carthage was by them, they purpoſed to deſiſt from their vaine attempt, and try ſome other courſe. Hereupon they iſſue into the field: where Spencius, and one Zarcas an African Captaine aſſiſting the rebellion, take vpon them to finde Amilcar worke; leauing Matho in Tunis, to negotiate with their friends, and take a generall care of the buſineſſe. The Elephants of Carthage, and horſe of Naransus, made Spencius fearefull to deſcend into the Plaines. Wherefore hee betooke himſelfe to his former method of warre; keeping the mountaines, and rough grounds, or occupying the ſtraighteſt paſſages, wherein the deſperate courage of his men might ſhew it ſelfe, with little diſaduantage. But Amilcar had more ſkill in this Art, than could bee matched by the labour of Spencius. Hee drew the enemy to many ſkirmiſhes; in all which the ſucceſſe was ſuch, as added courage to his owne men, and abated the ſtrength and ſpirit of the Rebels. Thus he continued, prouoking them night and day:

day : still intrapping some of them , and sometimes giuing them the overthrow in plaine battaile : vntill at length he got them into a straight, whence ere they should get out, he meant to take of them a good account. Their iudgement was enough, to perceiue their owne disadvantage : and therefore they had the lesse stomach to fight; but awaited for helpe from Tunis. Amilcar prudently foreseeing, that necessitie might teach them to dare impossibilities, vsed the benefit of their present feare, and shut them close vp with Trench and Rampart. There they waited miserably for succour, that came not : and hauing spent all their victuales , were so pinched with hunger, that they fed vpon the bodies of their prisoners. This they suffered patiently , as knowing that they had not deserved any fauour from Carthage; and hoping, that their friends at Tunis would not be vnmindfull of them. But when they were driuen to such extremitie, that they were faine to deuoure their owne companions, and yet saw none appearance or likelihood of reliefe: their obstinacie was broken; and they threatned their Captaines with what they had deserved, vnlesse they would goe forth to Amilcar, and seeke such peace as might be gotten. So Spendius, Zorax, and Antaricus, fell to consultation, wherein it was resolved, to obey the multitude, and yeeld themselves, if it were so required, vnto the death, rather than to perish by the hands of their owne companions. Hereupon they send to craue parle, which is granted; and these three come forth to talke with Amilcar in person. What they could say vnto him, it is hard to coniecture: yet by the conditions which Amilcar granted, it seems that they tooke the blame vpon themselves, and craued pardon for the multitude. The conditions were, that the Carthaginians should chooseth, out of the whole number of these enemies, any ten whom they pleased, to remaine at their discretion; and that the rest should all be dismissed, each in his shirt, or in one single coate. When the peace was thus concluded; Amilcar told these Ringleaders, that he chooseth them presently, as part of the ten, and so commanded to lay hands on them: the rest hee forthwith went to fetch, with his whole Armie in order. The Rebels, who knew not that peace was concluded vpon so gentle articles, thought themselves betrayed: and therefore amazedly ranne to armes. But they wanted Captaines to order them; and the same attonishment, that made them breake the Couenants of peace, whereof they were ignorant, gaue vnto Amilcar both colour of iustice, in accomplishing reuenge, and ease in doing the execution. They were all slaine: being fortie thousand, or more, in number.

This was a famous exploit: and the newes thereof, exceeding welcome to Carthage; and terrible to the revolted Cities of Africk. Henceforward Amilcar, with his Narusus and Hannibal, carried the warre from Towne to Towne, and found all places ready to yeeld: Frica, and Hippagreta, onely standing out, vpon feare of deserved vengeance; and Tunes, being held by Matho, with the remainder of his Armie. It was thought fit to begin with Tunes, wherein lay the chief strength of the enemies. Coming before this Towne, they brought forth Spendius, with his fellows, in view of the defendants, and crucified them vnder the walles; to terrifie those of his olde companions, that were still in armes. With this rigour the seige began; as if speedie victorie had beene assured. Hannibal quartered on that part of Tunes which lay towards Carthage; Amilcar on the opposite side: too farre asunder to helpe one another in sudden accidents; and therefore it behoued each, to be the more circumspect.

Matho from the walles beheld his owne destinie, in the miserie of his companions, and knew not how to auoide it otherwise, than by a cast at dice with fortune. So he brake out vpon that part of the Carthaginian Armie, that lay secure, as if all danger were past, vnder the command of Hannibal: and with so great and unexpected furie he filled, that after an exceeding slaughter, he tooke Hannibal prisoners; on whom, and thirte the most noble of the Carthagian prisoners, he presently reuenged the death of Spendius by the same torture. Of this Amilcar knew nothing till till it was too late; neither had he strength enough remaining, after this great losse, to continue the seige; but was faine to breake it vp, and remoue vnto the mouth of the Riuer Bagradas, where he incamped.

The terrour was no lesse within Carthage, vpon the fame of this losse; than had beene the ioy of the late great victorie. All that could beare armes, were sent into the field, vnder Hanno; whom, it seems, they thought the most able of their Captaines (suruiuing the late accidents of Warre). If there were any Law among them, forbidding the employment of one sole Generall, neare vnto their Citie (for they are knowne to haue trusted one man abroad) the time did not permit, in this haste exigent, to deuiſe about repealing it. But thirte principall men are chosen by the Senate, to bring Hanno to Amilcar's campe, and by all good perswasions to reconcile them. This could not be effected in one day. It nearly touched Amilcar in his honour, that the carelesnesse of Hannibal seemed to be imputed vnto him, by sending his enemy to moderate his proceedings. Neuertheless after many conferences the authoritie of the Senators prevailed; Amilcar and Hanno were made friends; and thenceforth, whilst this warre lasted, Hanno tooke warning by Hannibal's calamities, to followe good directions, though afterwards hee returned to his old and deadly hatred.

In the meane season Matho was come abroad; as meaning to vse the reputation of this late successe, whilst it gaue some life vnto his businesse. He had reason to doe as he did: but he wanted skill to deale with Amilcar. The skirmishes, and light exercises of warre, wherein Amilcar trained his Carthaginians, did so farre abate the strength, and withall diminish the credit of Matho, that he refused to trie the fortune of one battaile: wherein either his desires should be accomplished, or his cares ended. To this conclusion the Carthaginians were no lesse prone, than Matho: as being wearie of these long troubles, and insupportable expences; confident in the valour of their owne men, which had approued it selfe in many trials; and well assured of Amilcar his great worth, whereunto the enemy had not what to oppose. According to this determination, each part was diligent in making prouision: inuiting their friends to helpe; and drawing forth into the field, all that lay in Garrison.

The issue of this Battaille might haue beene foretold, without helpe of witchcraft. Matho, and his followers, had nothing whercon to presume, save their daring spirits, which had beene well cooled by the many late skirmishes, wherein they had learned how to runne away. The Carthaginians had reason to dare, as hauing often beene victorious: and in all points else they had the better of their enemies; especially (which is worth all the rest) they had such a commander, as was not easily to be matched in that Age. Neither was it likely, that the desire of libertie should worke so much, in men accustomed to seruitude, as the honour of their State would, in Citizens, whose future and present good lay all at once ingaged in that aduenture. So the Carthaginians wanne a great victorie, wherein most of the Africans their enemies were slaine; the rest fled into a Towne, which was not to be defended, and therefore they all yeilded; and Matho himselfe was taken alive. Immediately vpon this victorie, all the Africans that had rebelled, made submission to their old masters: Frica onely, and Hippagreta stood out, as knowing how little they deserved of fauour. But they were soone forced, to take what conditions best pleased the victours. Matho and his fellows were led to Carthage in triumph; where they suffered all torments that could be deuised, in recompence of the mischiefs which they had wrought in this warre. The warre had lasted three yeeres, and about foure months, when it came to this good end: which the Carthaginians whose subjects did not loue them, should with lesse expence, by contenting their Mercenaries, haue preuented in the beginning.

§. IIII.

How the Mercenaries of the Carthaginians, that were in Sardinia, rebelled: and were afterwards driven out by the Ilanders. The faithlesse dealing of the Romans with the Carthaginians, in taking from them Sardinia, contrarie to the peace.

WHilest Matbo and Spendius were making this terrible combustion in Affric; other Mercenaries of the Carthaginians had kindled the like fire in Sardinia: where murdering Boglar the Gouvernour, and other Carthaginians, they were in hope to get, and hold that Iland to their own vyle. Against these one Hanno was sent with a small Armie, (such as could be spared in that busie time) consisting likewise of Mercenaries, leuied on the sudden. But these companions that followed Hanno, finding it more for their safety, and present profit, to ioyne themselves with those that were already reuolted, than to indanger themselves by battaile, for the good of that commonweale, of which they had no care; began to enter into practise with the Sardinian Rebels; offering to runne one course of fortune with them in their enterprise. This their offer was kindly taken; but their faith was suspected. Wherefore, to take away all ialousie and distrust, they resolved to hang vp their Commander Hanno, and performed it. A common practise it hath beene in all Ages, with those that haue undertaken the quarrell of an vnjust warre, to enioyne the performance of some notorious and villanous act, to those that come into them as seconds, with offer to partake, and to assit the impious purposes which they haue in hand. It is indeed the best pawning, that desperate men can deliuer to each other, to performe some such Actions, as are equally vnpardonable to all.

By such a kind of crueltie did the vngratefull Mantineans murder a Garrison of Achaïans, sent vnto them for their defence against the Lacedæmonians, by Aratus, who, when hee had formerly posselt himselfe of their Citie, by right of warre, did not onely spare the sacke and spoile thereof, but gaue them equall freedom with the rest of the Cities vntied. These Reuolts are also common in our Court-warres; where, in the conquests of newe fortunes, and making of newe parties, and factions, without the depression or destruction of olde friends, we cannot be receiued and trusted by old enemies. Ces sont les coups de double escrime. These, (say the French) be the blowes of the old art of fencing.

These Mercenaries in Sardinia were no whit lesse violent in their purpose, than were Spendius, and his associates: onely they wanted a Matbo among them, to negotiate with the inhabitants of the Prouince. The Ilanders were no lesse glad, than the souldiours, that the Carthaginians were expelled the Countrey: but they could not agree about the profit of the victorie. The Sardinians thought that it was enough, if they rewarded the souldiours for their paines taken. Contrariwise, the souldiours were of opinion, that the title of the Carthaginians to that Ile, was deuolued vnto themselves, by right of conquest. The same quarrell would (in likelihood) haue risen, betwene Spendius with his Mercenaries, and their African friends; if the common desire of both had once taken effect: vnlesse the riches of Carthage had serued to content them all. But in Sardinia, where there was none other valuer but reward, than possession and rule of the Countrey, the matter was not easily taken vp. So they fell to blowes, which how they were dealt I know not; but finally, the Mercenaries were driuen out, and compelled to saue themselves in Italy. Before their departure out of Sardinia, they had inuited the Romans into it, with as good right, as the Mantineans had called them into Sicily. Yet this offer was refused, vpon reasons that follow.

the Carthaginians tooke almost fise hundred, and held them in prison. Hercof was made a great complaint: so that the Romans sent Embassadors to Carthage, requiring satisfaction. It was no time for the Carthaginians to dispute: they quickly yielded to release them all. This was so kindly taken, that they forbade all their Merchants, to trade thenceforth with the Rebels; admonishing them to come all prouisions to Carthage. And vpon the same reason, did they forbear to meddle with Sardinia, or to accept the Citie of Viua, offering it selfe vnto their subiection. This might haue serued, as a notable example of the Roman faith, to all posteritie: had not the issue proved, that it was mere regard of greater profit, which kept them so temperate, no longer than the hope lasted of thriving better thereby, than they should haue done by open breach of faith. The whole estate of Carthage depended, at that time, vpon the vertue of Amilcar: who had bee once ouerthrown by Spendius or Matbo, in one maine battaile, that mightie Citie must either haue fallen into the barbarous hands of merciles villaines, or haue humbled her selfe vnder protection of the Romans, with whom shee had lately shinen for superiortie. That extreame necessitie, whereinto Matbo reduced the Citie, by the fortune of one sallie made out of Tunis, is enough to proue, that Carthage was not farre from such a miserable choice. Wherefore it was not wisely done of the Romans, to make such demonstration of kindnesse, and honorable dealing, as might inuite a rich, and sinking shippe, to runne her selfe aground vpon their shore. But when all was well ended in Affric; and the Carthaginians began to prepare for the recouerie of Sardinia: then did Ambition put off her goodly vizour. The Romans perceiving that Carthage, beyond their hope, had recovered her feete againe; began to strike at her head. They entertained the proffer of those Mercenaries, that were fled out of Sardinia, and they denounced warre against this enfeebled and impoucrished Citie, vnder a shamelesse pretence, that the preparations made for Sardinia, were made indeed against Rome it selfe. The Carthaginians knew themselves vnable to resist; and therefore yielded to the Romans demand; renouncing vnto them all their right in Sardinia. But this was not enough. They would haue twelue hundred talents, in recompence belike (for I see not what reason they could alleage) of the great feare which they had endured, of an inuasion from Carthage. It is indeed plaine, that they impudently sought occasion of warre. But necessitie taught the Carthaginians patience; and the monie was paid, how hardly I ouer it was raised. From this time forward, let not Rome complain of the Punic faith, in breach of Couenants: the her selfe hath broken the peace already, which Amilcar purposeth to make her dearly repent; but what Amilcar liues not to performe, shall bee accomplished by Hannibal his renowned sonne.

§. V.

THe iniurious dealing of the Romans, expressing their desire to picke a quarrell; serued to instruct the Carthaginians in a necessarie lesson. That either they must make themselves the stronger, or else resolute to be obedient vnto those that were more mightie. In a Citie long accustomed to rule, the brauer determination easilie tooke place: and the best meanes were thought vpon, for the increase of puissance and Empire. The strength, and the ialousie of the Romans, forbade all attempts vpon the Mediterranean seas; but the riches of Spainne, that lay vpon the Ocean, were vnknown to Rome: wherefore that Prouince might serue, both to exercise the Carthaginians in warre, and to repaire their decayed forces, with all needfull supplies. Of this Spanish Expedition, the charge and soueraigne trust was committed vnto Amilcar: vpon whom whom his Countrie did wholly repose it selfe; in hope to recouer strength by his means, that had faued it from ruine.

Hanno, with some other enuious men, that were of his faction, tooke little pleasure in the generall loue and honour, which daily increased towards Amilcar and his friends. Yet could they not denie him to bee the most wortheie of command in all the Citie: onely they commended peace and quietnesse; aduising men to beware of prouoking the Romans, in whose amitie they said, that the felicitie of Carthage did consist. By such discourses, harsh to the eares of good Citizens, who had feeling of the wrong done to their Commonweale; they got none other reputation, than of singularitie: which the ignorant fort suspected to be wisdom.

But the glorie of Amilcar was continually vpheld and enlarged, by many notable seruices that he did, to the singular benefit of his Countrie. He passed the Streights of Iherules, (now called the Streights of Gibraltar) and landed on the westerne coast of Spaines, in which Countrie, during nine yeares that he liued there, he subiected vnto the State of Carthage the better part of all those Prouinces. But finally, in a battaile that he fought with a Nation in Portugale, called the Pettones, (defending himselfe a long time with an admirable resolution) hee was inuironed and slaine: carrying with him to the graue the same great honour and fame, by which in many signall victories, he had acquired the name of a second Mars.

After the death of Amilcar, Asdrubal his sonne in law was made Generall of the Carthaginian forces in Spain. This was a good man of warre; but farre better in practise and cunning, than in deedes of armes. By his notable dexteritie in matter of negotiation, he greatly enlarged the Dominion of Carthage: adding to many subiects and confederates thereunto, that the Romans began to growe jealous againe of this hastic increase. He built a goodly Citie, vpon a commodious Hauē, in the Kingdome of Granado, oppolite to that of Oran in Africa, and gaue it the name of New Carthage, which to this day it nearly retaineth, being called now Carthagena. With this successe of the Carthaginians in Spain, the Romans were not a little troubled; but begin to cause their owne negligence. For whereas they had formerly taken so much paines to beate them out of the Ile of Sicill, as suspecting their neighbourhood there; they had now, by cumbering themselves in a warre of farre lesse importance, (whereof I shall speake anon) giuen them leysure, without interruption, to recouer vpon their owne Continent, a Dominion by farre exceeding, both in the bodies of men and in reuenue, that which the Romans had taken from them. But how to helpe this, at the present they knew not; for they daily expected to be inuaded by the Gauls, their ancient enemies, and neare neighbours to the West. But hee needeth little helpe of force, that knoweth himselfe to be feared: it is enough if hee request; since his request shall haue the vertue of a command.

Yet were the Romans utterly destitute of all good colours that might helpe them to intermeddle in Spain. The Spaniards were then vnacquainted with Rome, whereof (in probability) they scarce had heard the name: so that there were no Memorieties, nor other such Reminds, to call in Roman succours. But in the enterprise of Sardinia, the Romans had learned an impudent pretence, that might also serue their turne in Spain. For though it were apparent, that the Spanish affaires had no relation to the peace between these two Cities; and though it were nothing likely, that Asdrubal had any purpose, to extend his victories vnto the gates of Rome, or to any of the Roman frontiers: yet (as if some such matter had bene suspected) they sent vnto him, requiring that hee should forbear to proceed any further, than to the Riuer of Iherus. In addressing their messengers, rather to Asdrubal, than to the Citie of Carthage; they seeme to haue hoped, that howsoever the generalitie of the Carthaginians had sweetly swallowed many bitter pilles, to auoide all occasion of warre with Rome: yet the brauerie of one man might proue more fastidious, and, refusing the iniurie, returne such answer, as would intangle his whole Countrie in the quarrell, quarrell, that they so much desired; and might embrace at leasure, when once they had found apparent cause. But Asdrubal finely deluded their expectation. He pretended no manner of dislike at all: and whereas they would haue this insolent covenant inserted into the articles of peace; he tooke vpon him to doe it, of his owne power, with such appearance of conformance to their will, that they went their wayes contented, and fought no further.

If it had bene so, that the State of Carthage, thereunto pressed by the Romans, forsake of present warre, had ratified this new composition made by Asdrubal; yet should it not haue stood bound in honour, to obserue the same carefully, vntill 10 an oath had also bene extorted, to make all sure. But since all passed quietly, vnder the bare authoritie of Asdrubal; this Capitulation was none other in effect, than a second breach of peace; whereof the Romans might be accused more iustly, than they could accuse the Carthaginians of periuire, (as they after day) for refusing to stand to it.

By this Treatie with Asdrubal, the Romans wanne some reputation in Spain. For when it was once conceived by the Spaniards, that the Citie which would needs be mistress ouer them, stood in feare her selfe, of receiving blowes from a flouter Dame; there were soone found some, that by offering themselves to the protection of Rome, became (as they thought) fellow-servants with Carthage. But the Carthaginians will shortly teach them another lesson. The Saguntines, a people on the South side of Iherus, entred into confederacie with the Romans, and were gladly accepted. Surely it was lawfull vnto the Romans, to admit the Saguntines, or any other people (neither subiect, nor open enemy in warre to the Carthaginians) into their societie: and vnlawfull it was vnto the Carthaginians, to vse violence towards any that should thus once become confederate with Rome. Nevertheless, if wee consider the late agreement made with Asdrubal; wee shall finde that the Romans could haue none other honest colour of requiring it, than an implicit covenant of making the Riuer Iherus a bound, ouer which they themselves would not passe, in any Discouerie or Conquest by them intended to be made vpon Spain: in which regard, they might haue some honest pretence to require the like of the Carthaginians; though Rome as yet had no foote, on the one side of Iherus, whereas Carthage, on the other side of that Riuer, held almost all the Countrie. Howsoever it were; this indignitie was not so easily digested, as former iniuries had bene. For it was a matter of ill consequence, that the Nations which had heard of no greater power than the Carthaginian, should behold Saguntum resting securely among them, vpon confidence of helpe from a more mightie Citie. Wherefore either in this respect; or for that the sense is most feeling of the latest iniuries; or rather for that now the Carthaginians were of power to doe themselves right: warre against Saguntum was generally thought vpon, let the Romans take it how they list. In such 40 termes were the Carthaginians, when Asdrubal died, after hee had commanded in Spain eight yeeres: (being slaine by a slau, whose master hee had put to death) and the Great Hannibal, sonne of the Great Amilcar, was chosen Generall in his stead.

p. VI.

The estate of Greece from the death of PYRRHVS, to the raigne of PHILIP the sonne of DEMETRIVS
in Macedon.

IN the long terme of the first Punic warre, and the vacation following, betweene it and the second; the estate of Greece, after the death of Pyrrhus, was growne somewhat like vnto that, wherein Philip of Macedon had found it; though farre weaker, as in an after-spring. The whole cōtrie had recouered, by degrees, a forme of libertie: the pettie tyrannies (bred of those inferior Captaines, which in the times of generall combustion, had seized each vpon such Townes as he could get) were, by force or accident, extirpated and reformed; and some States were risen to such greatnesse, as not onely secured to defend themselves, but to giue protection to others. This conuersion to the better, proceeded from the like dissensions and tumults in Macedon, as had beene in Greece, when Philip first began to inroch vpon it. For after many quarrels and great warres, about the Kingdome of Macedon, betweene Antigonus the elder, Cassander, Demetrius, Lysimachus, Seleucus, Pyrrhus, and the Gauls: Antigonus, the sonne of Demetrius, finally got and held it, reigning fixe and thirtie yoerres; yet so, that hee was diuers times thence expelled, not onely by the Gauls, and by Pyrrhus, as hath bene already shewed, but by Alexander the sonne of Pyrrhus the Epirot, from whose father he had hardly wonne it. This happened vnto him by the reuolt of his fouldiours, euen at such time, as hauing ouerthrowne with great slaughter an Armie of the Gauls, hee was conuerting his forces against the Athenians, whom hee compelled to receiue his Garrisons. But his young sonne Demetrius raised an Armie, wherewith he chased Alexander, not onely out of Macedon, but out of his owne Epirus, and restored his father to the Kingdome.

By the helpe of this young Prince Demetrius (though in another kinde) Antigonus got into his possession the Citadell of Corinth; which was iustly termed the fetter of Greece. This Citadell called Acracorinthus, stood vpon a steep rockie hill on the North side of the towne; and was by nature and art so strong, that it seemed impregnable. It commanded the towne, which was of much importance, as occupying the whole breadth of the Isthmus, that running betweene the Aegean and Ionique Seas, ioyneth Peloponnesus to the Maîne of Greece. Wherefore he that held possession of this Castle, was able to cut off all passage by land, from one halfe of Greece vnto the other; besides the commoditie of the two Seas, vpon both of which, this rich and goodly Citie had commodious hauens. Alexander, the sonne of Polyperchon; and after his death, Cratesipolis his wife, had gotten Corinth in the great shuffling of Prouinces and Townes, that was made betweene Alexander Princes. Afterwards it passed from hand to hand, vntill it came, I know not how, to one Alexander, of whom I finde nothing else, than that he was thought to bee poisoned by this Antigonus, who deceived his wife Nicea thereof, and got it from her by a trick. The device was this. Antigonus sent his young Demetrius to Corinth, willing him to court Nicea, and seeke her marriage. The foolish olde widdowe perceiued not how vnfit a match she was for the young Prince, but entertained the fancie of marriage; whereto the old King was euen as readie to consent, as was his sonne to desire it, and came thither in person to solemnize it. Hereupon all Corinth was filled with sacrifices, feasts, plaies, and all sorts of games: in the midst of which, Antigonus watched his time, and got into the Castle, beguiling the poore Ladie, whose iacobin had bene exceeding diligent in keeping it. Of this purchase he was so glad, that he could not containe himselfe within the grauitie bebecoming his old age. But as hee had stolen it, so was it againe stolen from him: neither liued he to recuenge the losse of it, being already spent with age.

Demetrius,

Demetrius, the sonne of this Antigonus, succeeding vnto his father, reigned ten yeeres. He made greater proofe of his vertue before he was King, than after. The Dardanians, Atolians, and Acheans, held him continually busied in warre; wherein his fortune was variable, and for the more part ill. About these times the power of the Macedonians began to decay: and the Grecians to cast off their yoke.

Philip, the onely sonne of Demetrius, was a young child when his father died; and therefore Antigonus, his vnckle, had the charge of the Kingdome, during the minority of the Prince; but he assumed the name and power of a King, though he respected Philip as his owne sonne, to whom he left the Crowne at his death. This Antigonus was called the Tutor, in regard of his Protectorship; and was also called Doson, that is as much as Will-giue, because he was slow in his liberaltie. He respected the Dardanians, and Thessalians, which molested his Kingdome, in the beginning of his raigne. Vpon confidence of this good seruice, hee tooke state vpon him, as one that rather were King in his owne right, than onely a Protector. Hereupon the people fell to mutinie; but were soone appeased by faire words, and a seeming vnwillingnesse of his to meddle any more with the Government. The Achaïans tooke from him the Citie of Athens, soone after Demetrius his death; and likely they were to haue wrought him out of all or most that hee held in Greece, if their owne estate had not bene endangered by a nearer enemy. But ciuile dissention, which had ouerthrowne the power of Greece, when it flourished most, ouerthrew it eailly now againe, when it had scarcely recovered ierlength after a long sickness; and gaue to this Antigonus no lesse authoritie therein, than Philip, the father of Alexander, got by the like aduantage.

These Achaïans, from small beginnings, had increased in short time to great strength and fame: so that they grew the most redoubted Nation of all the Grecques. By the equalitie of their Lawes, and by their clemencie (notwithstanding that they were a long time held vnder by the Macedonians and Spartans) they did not onely draw all others by their loue and alliance, but induced, through their example, the rest of the Cities of Peloponnesus, to bee gouerned by one Lawe, and to vse one and the same sort of waights, measure, and monie.

Aratus, the Sicyonian, was the first that vnited them againe; and gaue them courage, after that they had bene by the Macedonian Captaines diuided into many Principalities. In elder times they were gouerned by Kings, as most of the great Cities of Greece were; to which kind of rule they first subiected themselves, after the descent of the Heraclidae, when Tisamenus the sonne of Orestes possesst the Territorie of Achaia. In this estate they continued to the time of Gyges; after whome, when his sonnes sought to change the Legall gouernment of their Predecessors into Tyrannie, they expelled them, and made their State popular; as seeming most equall. This forme of Commonweale had continuance, with some small changes according to the diuersitie of times, till the reigne of Philip and Alexander Kings of Macedon: who tempest-like ouerturned all things in that part of the world. For those twelue Cities, called the Cities of alliance, wherof Helice, and Bura or Olenus, the Sea had eaten vp a little before the Battaille of Leuctres, were; by disturbance of the Macedonians, diuided from each other, and trained into a warre, no lesse foolish than cruell, among themselves. But in the one hundred and foure and twentieth Olympiad, in which, or neare it, Polonius the sonne of Lagus; Lysimachus, Seleucus, and Plolomies Ceraunus, left the world; two of the ten remaining Cities and people, namely, the Patrenses and the Dinai, vnited themselves, and laid the foundation of that generall accord, and re-vnion, which after followed. For hauing bene, some of them Partisans with sundrie Macedonian Captaines, and others hauing bene gouerned by pettie Kings; they began to fasten themselves in a strong league of amitie, partly, in the Olympiad before spoken of, and partly, at such time as Pyrrhus made his first voyage into Italie. Now after the vnting of the Patrenses and Dinai, to whom also the Cities of Tritaea, and Phara, ioyned themselves,

Agira chased out her Garrisons: and the Burians, killing their Kings, entred with the Cerconians into the same Confederacie. These Cities, for twentie and five yeares, vied the same forme of Governement with the Achaïans; who by a Senatorie and two Prætors, ordered all things in their Commonweale; and some after, by one Prætor, or Commander: of which, Marcus Cerynenis was the first, and Aratus the second.

This Aratus was a noble young Gentleman of Sicyon, who liuing at Argos in exile, whilest his Countrey was oppressed by Tyrants, found meanes, through the helpe of other banished men, to enter their owne Citie by night, with ladders; whence they chased the Tyrant, and restored the people to libertie. This was in the time of Antigonus Gonatas King of Macedon, a Prince more buile in watching what to get among the Greekes, than wise in looking to his owne. For feare of Antigonus, the Sicyonians entred into the Achaian league: which though at that time it receiued more increase, by their accession, than it added strength to them; yet the benefit of this conjunction serued well enough against Antigonus, whose subletie was somewhat greater than his valour. As the industrie and counsaile of Aratus deliuered his Countrey from bondage, and fortified it by the Achaian league: so further, by his great liberalitie, with rise exceeding great cooll of one hundred and fiftie talents, he pacified the inexplicable controuersies, betweene the banished Sicyonians, which returned with him, and the other Citizens: that had possession of the same Lands; as also with the same money he drew many others to assit him in those enterprises following, that redounded to the singular good of all Achaia. The monie he obtained of Ptolemie Euergetes King of Egypt; who partly had a desire to hold some strong and sure friendship in Greece, partly was delighted with the conuersation of Aratus himselfe, that made a dangerous voyage to him into Egypt, and fed his pleasure in goodly pictures, with the gift of many curious peeces, wherein the workemen of Sicyon excelled.

The first of Aratus his great attempts, was the surprize of the Acrocorinthus or Citadell of Corinth; which he wan by night, being thereinto guided by some theues that he had hired for the purpose, who liuing in the place, had practised to rob Antigonus his treasure, passing in and out by a secret path among the rocks. Yet was he faine to fight for it, ere hee could get it: though indeede Antigonus his Souldiers were rather ouer-come by their owne feare, than by any force of the assailants; as mistrusting lest the Achaïans were more in number, than in truth they were, and hauing lost the aduantages of the place already, vpon which they had presumed, before they were aware of any enemy.

In these kind of night-seruices, ambushments, surprisies, and practises, Aratus was very cunning, aduenturous, and valiant: in open field, and plaine battaile, hee was as timorous. By this strange mixture of cowardize and courage, he ministred argument of disputation, to Philosophers and others; Whether a valiant man (as he was esteemed, and in some cases approued) might looke pale and tremble, when he beganne battaile; and whether the vertue of Fortitude were diuersified, by the sundrie natures of men, and in a manner confined, vnto severall sorts of action. In resolving which doubts it may be said; that all vertue is perfected in men by exercise, wherein they are trained by occasion: though a naturall inclination standeth in neede of little practise; whereas the defect hereof must be supplied with much instruction, vnto good successe, and other helpe, yet hardly shall grow absolute in generall. Such was Aratus in matter of Warre. In sincere affection to his Countrey he was vnreproueable, and so acknowledged: as his following actions will testifie.

When Acrocorinthus was taken, and ioyned vnto the Common-wealth of Achaia, the Megarians revolted soone after from Antigonus, and entred into the same Corporation. So did the Træzenians, and the Epidaurians: whereby this new erected State grew so powerful, that it aduentured to take Atheni, from the Macedonians; and Argos, and Megalopolis, from Tyrants that held them. The enterprise vpon Atheni was of none effect. For though Aratus wasted the Ile of Salamis, to shew his strength, and sent home the Athenian prisoners, without ranfome, to allure the Citie by shew of loue; yet the Athenians stirred neither against him, nor for him, as being now growne honest slaves to the Macedonians. Vpon Argos the aduenture was carried more strongly. The Achaïans came sometimes to the gates of the Citie, but the people stirred not: once they entred it, and might haue wonne it, if the Citizens would haue lent any helpe to the recouerie of their owne freedome; sundrie times, and with diuerse euent, they fought with the Tyrants (who rose vpon one after another in Argos) in open field, and slue one of them in battaile; but all sufficed not: vntill at length Aristomachus the Tyrant was so terrified, perfwaded, and hired, by Aratus, that he consented to religne his estate. The like did Xenon the Tyrant of Hermonie, and Cleonymus that had oppressed the Phliasians. Whilest this businesse with the Argiues was on foot, Lysias the Tyrant of Megalopolis was so well handled by Aratus, that, without compulsion, he gaue libertie to his Citie, and annexed it to the Councell of Achaia: whereby he got such credit, that hee was chosen General of their forces (which was a yearly Office, and might not be held two yeares together by one man) euery second yeare, for a certaine while. Hee and Aratus succeeding one another by turnes. But these late Tyrants, and new Citizens, Lysias and Aristomachus, were carried with private passion, from care of the generall good; in which courses they opposed Aratus, to the great hurt of Achaia, as shall appeare in due time.

The Achaïans hauing obtayned so much puissance and reputation, that Ptolemie King of Egypt was become Patron of their Alliance, and (in title of honour) General of their forces by Sea and Land; made open Warre vpon Demetrius the Sonne of Antigonus Gonatas, for the libertie of Atheni. It is strange and worthe of noting, That when Aratus in this quarrell had lost a battaile, the Athenians were Garlands, in signe of ioy, to flatter their good Lords the Macedonians, that had wonne the victorie. Such were now the Athenians become; in whom the rule was verified, that holds true in generall of the multitude, Aut humiliter scriuit, aut superbe dominatur. It is either base in seruice, or insolent in command. Neuerthelesse when Demetrius was dead, Aratus performed that by monie which he could not by force; and corrupting the Captaine of the Macedonian Garrison, purchased libertie to the Athenians, who thenceforth held good correspondence with the Achaïans, louing them, and speaking well of them, which was all that they could doe: but into their Corporation they entred not, scorning it belike, in regard of their owne out-worne glorie.

Now as the Common-wealth of Achaia daily increased within Peloponnesus, by iustice and honestie; so did the Ætolians, in the vnter part of Greece, yea and within Peloponnesus it selfe, waxe very powerful, by sturdinesse of bodie, and rude courage in fight, without helpe of any other vertue. They had stoutly defended themselves against Antipater and Craterus; partly by daring to doe and suffer much; partly by the naturall strength and fastnesse of their Countrey; but especially by the benefit of the time, which called away these famous Captaines to other businesse, as hath bene related. They had molested Cassander, in fauour of Antigonus; and were themselves as much plagued by him, and by the Acarnanians, a little, but stout Nation, that took his part. Afterwards they had to doe with Demetrius, the sonne of the first Antigonus, and more or lesse, with all the Kings of Macedon succeeding him. They likewise held often Warre with the Acarnanians, Athamanians, Epiriots, and many Cities in Peloponnesus: so that they were hardened with perpetuall traualle, seldom putting off their Armour. But their hardnesse ill deserued the name of valour, seeing they had no regard of honestie or friendship; measuring all things by their owne insolent will, and thinking al people base minded, that were not as fierce and outrageous as themselves.

These Ætolians had lately made great spoiles in Peloponnesus, and occupied a good part of the countrey. They had invaded the friends of the Achaïans; taken and sacked

Palene; where although they were foundly beaten by Aratus, yet their desire of gaine made them greedie of a new voiage thither, as to a Countrey wherein some what was to be gotten. But they were forced to looke another way, by Demetrius the sonne of Antigonus Gomatas: who pressed them so hardly, that they were driuen to seeke helpe of the Acheans; which they obtained. The warre which the Acheans made vpon Demetrius, without Peloponnesus, in Attica, though it tended to expelling the Macedons out of Greece, yet the benefit thereof redounded chiefly vnto the Ætoli-ans, at whose instance it was set on foot: for thereby were the Macedonian forces diuerted from them. Neither was this good turne vnacknowledged; though very basely the Ætoli-ans, giuing thanks in wordes, deuised how to requite the benefit 10 with some great mischief. They saw that the Acheans were desirous, to bring all Peloponnesus into their Alliance and Corporation: of which intent, the Lacedæmoni-ans were very ielous. Wherefore these Ætoli-ans laboured earnestly, to set the Lacedæmoni-ans and Acheans together by the eares: hoping that if this might come to passe, they themselves should be called into helpe (it skilled not on what side) and to get not small share, both in bootie and Territorie. Neither did they forbear to communicate this their deuce vnto Antigonus, offering to make him partaker of their gaine, whom they knew to be offended with the many losses, that his Kingdom had sustained by the Acheans. Of this plot Aratus was aware: who therefore deter- 20 mined to suffer many indignities, rather than to giue the Lacedæmoni-ans cause to take armes. But this resolution was taken somewhat too late: and not altogether in his owne power to hold. He had bene meddling with the Aræadians, that were dependants of Lacedæmon: and thereby had provoked the Lacedæmoni-ans to looke about them; seeing that all Peloponnesus, excepting themselves, the Eleans, and a few Aræadians their friends (who also were attempted) was already become Achean.

The Citie of Sparta was in ill case about these times; and subiect to the injuries of any stronger Neighbour. Pyrrhus had greatly weakened it; The Ætoli-ans entring Laconia with an Armie, had carried away fiftie thousand slaves; and, which was worse, their discipline was corrupted, Avarice and Luxurie reigned among them, the poore was oppressed by the rich, and the generositie of spirit, that had sometime 30 beene their generall vertue, was hardly now to be found among the best of them. There were left in Sparta no more than seuen hundred naturall Citizens; of whom not about one hundred had lands: all the rest were needie people, and desirous of innouation. Hercupon followed intestine sedition, which endangered the Citie most of all. Agis a good King, who sought to reforme the disorders of the State, exhorted the people to a strict obseruation of Lycurgus his lawes. To which purpose he caused them to passe an Act, for the abolishing of all debts, and equall diuision of lands. All the younger, and the poorer sort were glad of this: but the rich men op- 40 posed it. These had recourse vnto Leonidas the other King, (for in Sparta were two Kings), who tooke their part: being himselfe a dissolute man, as one trained vp in the Court of Syria, whence also he had his wife. In this contention Leonidas was expelled the Citie, and a new King chosen in his stead. But Agis his friends and Counsaillors in this enterprise, abused his good meaning to their owne priuate commoditie. They were halfe to take away all debts, and cancell bonds, for they them- selves were deeply indebted: but the diuision of lands they afterwards hindered, be- cause their owne possessions were great. Hence arose a tumult in Sparta, which these men increased, by their foule oppression of the poorer Citizens. So that in fine Leo- nidas was brought home, and restored to his Kingdome, and the two aduerser Kings driuen to take Sanctuaries: out of which, Cleombrotus, the late-made King, was dis- 50 missed into exile: but Agis was trained forth, drawne into prison, and there by his enemies condemned and strangled, together with his Mother, and his old Grand- mother. The like to this was neuer knowne in Sparta: and (which is the more o- dious) this crueltie proceeded from the Ephori, Magistrates that should haue giuen Patronage to the lawes, vising their power, and more power than to them belonged, against a King, that had proceeded orderly in reforming the Citie, as the lawes required.

The death of Agis was much lamented by all good Citizens; and serued to esta- blish the impotent rule of a few tyrannicall oppressors. In which case Aratus might well hope, to adioyne Lacedæmon to the Achean Common-wealth: though it were great iniustice to take such aduantages, and attempt by force, that which would haue redounded to the generall good of Peloponnesus, and to the benefit of Sparta it selfe, if it could haue bene wrought by perswasion.

But the same man who redressed the disorders of Sparta, and reuenged the death 10 of Agis, did also requite the iniust attempts of the Acheans, euen in their owne kinde; obtruding vpon them by force, an vnion of all Peloponnesus; though little to their good liking, for that the Lacedæmoni-ans and their King, should haue bene the prin- cipall; not they and their Prætor. Leonidas hauing thus caused Agis to be slaine, tooke his wife that was very rich and beautifull, and gaue her in marriage (perforce) to his owne sonne Cleomenes. This yong Prince fell greatly enamoured on his wife, and sought to winne her affection, as well as he had her person. He discouered much with her about the purpose of her former husband Agis, and by pitying his mis- fortune, began to entertaine a desire of accomplishing that, wherein Agis had failed. So comming himselfe to be King, whilst he was very yong, hee gladly embraced all 20 occasions of warre: for that he hoped by strong hand to effect that, which Agis, by proceeding formally, in so corrupt an estate of the Citie, had attempted to his owne ruine. Therefore when the Ephori gaue him in charge, to take and fortifie Athenæum, a Temple on the marches of Laconia, to which both they and the Megopolitans pre- tended title; he readily performed it. Hereof Aratus made no complaint, but sought to take by surprize Tæga and Orchomenus, Cities then confederate with the Lacedæ- moni-ans: wherein, his intelligence failing, he lost the labour of a painefull nights tra- uail, and discouered his enmitie to Sparta; of which Cleomenes was nothing forric. By these degrees the warre began. In the entrance whereto Aratus had discouered 30 the Ætoli-ans practise, and therefore would haue staied the quarrell from proceeding too farre. But Lyfias and Aristomachus would needs fight, and he could doe none other than be ruled by them; especially seeing Cleomenes was so vrgent. Aristoma- chus was at that time General of the Acheans, (He & Lyfias being of great account, since they had abandoned their tyrannic) who sent vnto Aratus, lying then in A- thenæ, and required his assistance in a iourne to be made into Laconia. No dissuasions of Aratus would serue: therefore he came in person, and tooke part of a businesse, lit- tle pleasing him in the present, and lesse in the future. When he met with Cleomenes, he durst not fight; but opposed himselfe against Aristomachus, who desired to giue 40 battaile. Yet had the Acheans twentie thousand foot, and one thousand horse, in their Armie: whereas Cleomenes had no more than fise thousand in all. This gaue repu- tation to the Lacedæmonian, and raised an ill report vpon Aratus; which Lyfias helped to make worse, by accusing his cowardize. Neuertheless the Acheans would not fall out with Aratus their Benefactor, but chose him their Generall the year fol- lowing, against Lyfias his accuser that sued for the place. Being Generall himselfe, it behoued him to confute, with deedes, the slanderous wordes of Lyfias. There- fore he purposed to set vpon the Eleans: but was met withall on the way, neare vnto the Mount Lycau, by Cleomenes; who vanquished him in a great battaile, and draue him to hide himselfe all night for feare, so that he was thought to haue bene slaine. This misadventure Aratus recompensed by a trick of his owne more naturall occu- 50 pation: performing with his broken Armie, that whilst there was no suspicion of any great matter that he could vndertake, he secretly wrought with some of the Mantineans, who did let him into their Citie. The Mantineans had once before ioyined themselves with the Acheans; but shortly vpon feare, or some other passion, they gaue themselves to

Countrie from all further trouble; and withall should have restored vnto the vniuersall state of Greece, that honorable condition, whereof the Macedonians had benefited it. But it is commonly found (which is great pittie) that Vertue hauing risen to honour by degrees, and confirmed it selfe, (as it were) in the seat of Principallitie, by length of time, and successe of many actions; can ill endure the hastic growth of any others reputation, wherewith it fees it selfe likely to bee ouer-topped. Other cause to despise the Lacedemonians there was none; than that they lately had been in dangerous case: neither could any reason be found, why Aratus should prefer Antigonus before Cleomenes, than that he had stood in doubt of the one, when he thought himselfe more mighty than the other. Wherefore he was iustly plagued, when he law his owne honors reuerbered by the insolent Macedonians; and in stead of liuing as a companion with Cleomenes, that was descended of a long race of Kings, the posteritie of Hercules, was faine to doe sacrifice vnto Antigonus, as vnto a God, and was finally poisoned by Philip, whose Nobilitie was but of fiew descents, and whom perhaps he might haue seene his fellows, if he had not made them his Lords. By this incitation to the Macedonians, the loue of Ptolemie was lost: who forthwith tooke part with Cleomenes, though he did not supply him with such liberalitie, as hee had vied to the Achaens; being warned, as may seeme, by their example, to be more warie both in trusting and disbursing. Cleomenes himselfe, whilst this businesse with Antigonus was a foot, passed through Aradia with an Armie, and laboured by all meanes to draw the Achaens to battaile. At the Citie of Dyme in Achaia were assembled all the remaining forces of the Nation; with which it was concluded, to make triall, whether perhaps they might amend their estate, without seeking helpe of the Macedonian. Thither went Cleomenes, and there fought with them; where hee had so great a victorie, that the enemye was no longer able to keepe the open field. The calamitie was such, that Aratus himselfe durst not take vpon him to be their General, when his turne came in the next election. Wherefore the Achaens were compelled to sue for peace; which was granted vpon this calic condition: That they should not arrogate vnto them selues the command of Peloponnesus, but suffer the Lacedemonians (as in former ages) to be their Leaders in Warre. Hereunto if they would condescend, he promised vnto them, that he would presently restore all places taken from them, and all his prisoners ransom-free: also that they should enioy their owne Lawes and Liberties without molestation. This gentle offer of Cleomenes was very pleasing to the Achaens: who desired him to come vnto the Citie of Lerna, where a Parliament should be held, for the conclusion of the Warre.

Now seemed the affaires of Greece likely to bee settled in better order, than they had euer bene since the beginning of the Peloponnesian Warres, yea or since the Persian Inuasion: when God, who had other wise disposed of these matters, hindered all, with a draught of cold water, which Cleomenes dranke in a great heat, and thereupon fell extreme sick, and so could not be present at Lerna, but caused the Parliament to be deferred to another time. Neuertheless he sent home the chiefe of his prisoners, to shew that he meant none other than good faith. By this faire dealing he confirmed the Achaens in their desire of his friendship: who assembled againe at Argos, there to establish the League. But Aratus was violently bent against it; and fought by great wordes, and terrible threats, to make his Countymen afraid of resolving. When all would not serue turne, he betooke himselfe to his cunning; and sent word to Cleomenes, that hee should doe well to leaue his Armie behinde him, and come alone into Argos, receiuing Hostages for safetie of his person. Cleomenes was already farr on his way, when he met with this aduertisement: and tooke it in ill part, that hee should be thus deluded. For it had bene an easie matter, to haue told him so much at the first, and not haue made him come so farr with an Armie, which afterwards he must dismiss. Yet that which chiefly seemes to haue troubled him, was the drift of his oppugners; who fought thereby, either to make him wait without the gates, and deale only with them selues and their Messengers; or if he would adventure himselfe into the Citie, then to deprime him of all Royall shew, that might breed respect of him in the Multitude. This was that indeede which Aratus feared, and for which he fought to hinder his coming thither in person: lest the people, hearing the promises of Cleomenes ratified by his owne mouth, should presently be wonne with his gentle wordes, and finall the bargain without more ado. Therefore Cleomenes wrote vnto the whole Councell, bitterly complaining against these iugling tricks: and Aratus was not farr behinde with him, in as bitter an Oration. So betwene feare of the one, and reuerence of the other, the Assembly knew not how to proceede, but abruptly brake vp, leauing all as it were to fortune. Cleomenes tooke his aduantage of their present weaknesse, and renewed the Warre. Many Cities yielded vnto him willingly; many hee forced; and partly by force, partly by terrour, he wanne Argos, which neuer King of Sparta before him could doe. In this case Aratus sent his owne sonne to Antigonus, entreating him to deferre no time, but come presently to relieue the distressed Achaens. Antigonus gaue as good words as could be wished: saying that he vtterly refused to doe any thing, vnlesse he might first haue Acrocorinthus put into his hand. This demand was somewhat like vnto that of the Hunter, who promised to helpe the Horle against his enemye the Stagge: but with condition, that the Horle should suffer himselfe to be fadled and bridled. Aratus was herewithall contented, but wanted all honest colour to doe it: seeing the Corinthians had no way deferred, so be thus giuen away to the Macedonians. Yet at length an occasion was found; for that the Corinthians, perceiving what he intended, were minded to arrest him. So hee withdrew himselfe out of their Citie, and sent word to Antigonus, that the Cause should bee readie to let him in. The Corinthians on the other side ranne to Cleomenes; who lost no time, but made haste with them to Corinth, where he fought how to get possession of their Castle, or at least to saue it from Antigonus, by surrouding it with Trenches, that none might suffice nor enter without his leaue. Whilst this was in doing, he tooke speciall order, that Aratus his house and goods, within the Towne, should be safely kept for the Owner; to whom hee sent Messenger after Messenger, desiring him to come to agreement, and not to bring in the barbarous Macedonians, and Ilyrians, to Peloponnesus: promising that if he would hearken to these perswasions, then would hee giue him double the same pension, which hee had bene wont to receiue of King Ptolemie. As for the Castle of Corinth, which was the gate of Peloponnesus, and without which none could hold assured soueraigntie of the Countrey; he desired that it might not be committed vnto his owne disposition, but be ioyntly kept by the Lacedemonians and Achaens. All this entreatie serued to no purpose. For Aratus, relieving vtterly the motion, sent his owne sonne as an Hostage to Antigonus; and laboured with the Achaens, to put Acrocorinthus into his hands. Which when Cleomenes vnderstood, he seized vpon the goods of Aratus in Corinth, and wasted all the Countrey of Sicyon, whereof this his Aduersarie was natue.

Antigonus in the meane time drew neare to the Isthmus, hauing passed with his Armie through Euboea, because the Aetolians held the streights of Thermopylae against him. This they did, either in fauour of Cleomenes, which they pretended; or in doubt of the greatnesse, wherunto the Macedonians might attaine by the good successe of this iourne. At his coming thither he found the Lacedemonians readie to forbid his entrance: and that with sufficient strength; yet with no purpose to hazard battaile, but rather to wearie him thence with hunger, against which he came not well provided. Antigonus therefore laboured hard to make his way by force; but he was not able so to doe: hee secretly got into the Corinthian Hauens; but was violently driuen out againe, with great losse of men; finally hee resolved to turne aside, and seek a passage ouer the gulfes of Corinth, to Sicyon, or some other part of Achaia; but this required much time, and great preparation, which was not easily made.

gonus, and no lesse troubled his Enemies. The Achaens were gotten into that Citie, and the Garrison which Cleomenes had left therein, though it was not driuen out of the Citadell, yet was hardly distressed, and stood in neede of present helpe. Argos had alwaies bene enemie to Sparta, and well affected to the Kings of Macedon. When Cleomenes took it, he forbore to chafe out those whom he most suspected; partly, at the entreatie of friends; and partly, for that they all made shew to be glad of his prosperitie. They were glad indeede of Cleomenes his victories, both in Argos and elsewhere, as many as hoped that he would cause all debtors to be discharged from their creditours, as he had lately done in Sparta. But that which Cleomenes had done in Sparta, was agreeable to the Spartan institution: in other places, where it would haue bene tyrannically, he did it not. Thereupon, such as were disappointed of their vniust hopes, beganne to turne good Common-wealths-men; and called him Tyrant for his doings at home, because hee would not doe the like abroad. So they tooke their time; inuited the Achaens; assailed his Garrison; cut in peeces the Rescue that he sent; and compelled him at length, to forsake the defence of Corinth, and looke vnto the enemies that were behinde his back. For whom he vnderstood, by continuall messages, that his men which held the Citadell at Argos, were almost loit; hee beganne to feare, left his labour in guarding the entrie should grow fruitlesse; the Achaens in the meane while spoiling all that lay within. Therefore hee forooke his custodie of the isthmus, and made all haste towards Argos: which if hee could saue, he meant to trust fortune with the reill. And so farre he prevailed at his comming to Argos; that both Argives and Achaens were glad to haue them selfe leaving him Maister of the streets: when the horie-men of Antigonus were discovered a-farre off, halting to relieue the Citizens; and Antigonus himselfe (to whom Corinth was yielded, as is foone as the Spartan had turned his back) following apace with the bodie of his Armie. Cleomenes therefore had no more to doe, than to make a safe retreat. This he did; and got him home into Laconia: loosing in short space all, or mozt, of that which he had bene long in getting.

Antigonus hauing shewed himselfe at Argos, and commended the Citizens, went into Acadiaz, where he wanne such Castles as were held for Cleomenes, and restored them to the old Possessors. This done, he tooke his way to Aegium, where was held a Parliament by the Achaens: to whom he declared the cause of his comming, and spake braue wordes, that filled them with hope. The Achaens were not behinde with him; but made him Captaine Generall ouer them and their Confederates; and further entred into couenant with him; That they should not deale with any Prince or State, either by writing or Embassadour, without his consent. All this while, and somewhat longer, Aratus was the only man, that seemed to rule the Kings heart: carrying him to Steyon, his owne Towne (for Winter was come on) where he not only feasted him as a great Prince, but suffered more than humane honours, as sacrifices and the like, to be done vnto him. This example of Aratus and his Steyonians, was followed by the rest of Achaia: which had made (forsooth) a very vile bargain, if in stead of Cleomenes that would haue bene a King, it had obtained the protection of a God. But this God was poore; and wanting wherewith to pay his Macedonians, imposed the burthen vpon the Achaens. This was hardly taken: yet worse must be endured in hope of better. Neither was Aratus himselfe ouer-carefully respected; when the statues of those Tyrants, which he had throwne downe in Argos, were againe erected by Antigonus; or when the statues, which he had erected, of those that had taken Acrocorinthus with him, were all throwne downe by the same King, and one only left vnto himselfe at his earnest entreatie. It might therefore appeare, that this God was also spightfull. Neuerthelesse in taking reuenge vpon those that offended him, Aratus did satisfie his owne passion by the aide of these Macedonians. For with extreme torments he did put Aristomachus to death, who had bene once Tyrant of Argos; afterwards Generall of the Achaens; and from them reuolting vnto Cleomenes, did fall at length into their hands. In like sort handed hee (though not as yet) the Mantineans, for their ingratitude and crueltie shewed to the Achaens. For hee slue all the principall Citizens, and sold the reit, men, women, and children, all for bond-slaves: diuiding the spoile; two parts to the Macedonians, and the third to the Achaens. The Towne it selfe was giuen by Antigonus to the Argives: who peopled it with a Colonie of their owne; and Aratus hauing charge of this businesse, caused it to be new-named Antigonion. Surely of this crueltie there can bee no better excuse; than euen the flatterie, which Aratus was driuen to vse to Antigonus: forasmuch as it was a token of fruitlesse, wherein they had vrged and brought him; whom he, as in reuenge thereof, did thus requite. But leauing to speake of this change, which the comming in of the Macedonian wrought, in the Ciuill state of the Achaens; Let vs returne vnto his warre against the Lacedemonian.

The next Sommer Antigonus wanne Tegea, Mantineia, Orchomenus, Heræa, and Telphusa. Antigonus hee dispeopled, as was said before; in Orchomenus he placed a Garrison of his Macedonians; the rest he restored to the Achaens: with whom he wintred at Aegium, where they held a Parliament. Once only Cleomenes had met him this yeare; and that was on the borders of Laconia, where hee lay ready to defend his owne Territorie. The reason why he stirred no further, nor followed Antigonus to Mantineia, and to those other Townes that hee wanne, was this: Hee had few Souldiers, and not monie enough to wage more. Ptolemie the Egyptian promised much, but would performe nothing, vntill he might haue Cleomenes his owne Mother, and his children in pledge. These were sent into Egypt; yet the aide came not. For Ptolemie was slow; as dealing in the businesse of Greece, rather for his mindes sake, than vpon any apprehension of necessitie. Cleomenes therefore provided for himselfe, as well as his owne abilitie would ferue. He manumitted all the Heilotes, which were the Lacedemonian slaves: taking monie for their libertie, and arming two thousand of them, after the Macedonian fashion. Hauing thus increased his forces, hee came on the sudden to Megalopolis; that lay secure, as hauing defended it selfe in more dangerous times, and hauing now Antigonus neare at hand in Aegium. The Towne he wanne: but after he was entred, all that were fit to beare armes, rose hastily against him; and though they could not driue him out, yet saued the multitude, to whom they gaue a Port free for their escape. He sent after the Citizens, offering their Towne and goods to them againe, if they would bee of his partie. But they brauely refused his offer: wherfore he sacked and ruined it, carrying with him to Sparta a great bootie that he found therein. These newes astonished the Achaens at Aegium: who thereupon brake vp their Parliament. Antigonus sent hastily for his Macedonians, out of their wintering places: but they were lo long in comming, that Cleomenes was safely gone home. Therefore he returned them back to their lodgings, and went himselfe to Argos, there to passe the rest of this vnluckie winter, somewhat further from the eyes of the grieved Achaens. When hee had laine awhile at Argos, Cleomenes was at the gates; with no great number of men, yet with more than Antigonus had then about him. The Argives perceiving that their Countrie would be spoiled, if Antigonus did not issue into the field; were very earnest with him to goe forth and fight. But he was wiser, than to be moued with their clamours; and suffered them to see their villages burnt; to bid him resigne his Office of Protector, vnto some that were more valiant; and to satisfie their passions with foolish wordes; rather than hee would be ouer-come in fight, and thereby loose more honour than could easily be repaired. By this Cleomenes had his desire, in weakning the reputation of his enemies: though he thereby added neither followers, nor other strength, vnto

Lacedemon.

Afterwards, when the season was more fit for warre, Antigonus gathered together all his troupes; meaning to requite these braudo's of his enemies, with the conquest of Sparta. Cleomenes on the other side, laboured to keepe the warre from his owne gates; and therefore entred vpon the Countrie of Argos, where he made such hauock, as drew Antigonus thither, from his intended inuasion of Laconia. Many great affronts the Macedonian was faine to endure, in coaling the Spartan King; that ranging ouer the Countrey of the Argines, Philiassians, and Orehoemenians, draue a Garrison of his out of Oligyrtus, and did sacrifice, as it were before his face, in the suburbs of Argos, without the Temple of Iuno, that was shut vp; sending vnto him in scorn, to borrow the keyes. These were light things; yet serued to dishearten the Achaean side, and to fill the enemy with courage, which was no matter of light importance. Therefore he concluded to lay apart all other regard, of things abroad, and to put all to hazard; by setting vp his rest, without more delay, vpon Sparta it selfe. He had in his Armie eight and twentie thousand foot, and twelue hundred horse, collected out of sundrie Nations, as Macedonians, Ilyrians, Gauls, Epirots, Boetians, Acarnanians, and others; together with the Achaens, and their friends of Peloponnesus. Cleomenes had of all sorts, twentie thousand, with which he lay at Selasia: fortifying slightly the other passages into Laconia, through which the Macedonians were not likely to seeke entrance. Antigonus coming to Selasia, found his enemy so strongly incamped, vpon and between the hills of Eua and Olympus, that he was constrained to spend much time there, before he could aduancany one foot: neither lay it in his power to come hastily to blowes, which hee greatly desired, without the hazard of his whole Armie, in assailing their well-defenced Campe. But at length (as it happens, when men are wearie both of their hopes and feares) both Kings being resolu'd to make an end one way or other; Antigonus attempted with his Ilyrians, to force that part which lay on the Hill Eua: but his Ilyrians were so ill seconded by the Achaean foot, that the Spartan horse, & light-armed foot, incamped in the freight vallie between those hills, issuing forth, fell vpon their skirts; and not only disordered them, but were like to haue endangered all the rest. If Cleomenes himselfe had stood in that part of the battaile, he would haue made great vse of such a faire beginning. But Eulides, his brother, a more valiant than skilfull Souldier, commanded in that wing: who neither followed this aduantage, nor tooke such benefit as the ground afforded, whereon he lay. Philopamen the Arcadian of Megalopolis, who afterwards proued a famous Captaine, serued then on horse, as a private yong man, among the Achaens. Hee seeing that all was like to goe to rout, if their Ilyrians were driuen to fall back vpon the Armie following them; perswaded the Captaines of the Achaean horse, to breake vpon the Spartan Mercenaries. But they would not: partly despising his youth, and want of charge; partly, for that Antigonus had giuen order, that they should keepe their places, vntill they receiued a signe from him, which was not as yet. Philopamen perceiving them to be more orderly, than well aduised; entreated some of his owne Countreymen to follow him; gaue a charge vpon the Spartans; and forced them not only to leaue the Ilyrians, but seeke how to saue themselves. Being so farre aduanced, he found the place which the Ilyrians had attempted, like enough to bee wonne, through the vnskillfulness of him that held it. Wherefore hee alighted, and perswaded the men at armes his Companions to doe the like: the folly of Eulides being manifest, who kept the top of the Hill, and stirred not to hinder those that ascended, but waited for them in a Plaine, where they might fight vpon euen termes. So he recovered the Hill top; where though he was fore hurt, yet hee made good the place that he had gotten, vntill the whole Armie came vp to him; by which the Lacedaemonians were beaten from it, with great slaughter of them in their descent. This ouerthrow, and death of Eulides, made Cleomenes loose the day: who fighting brauely on the other side, vpon Olympus, against Antigonus himselfe; was like to haue beene surrounded and lost, if he had not withdrawne himselfe with an extraordinary speed. In this battaile, ended the glorie of Lacedaemon; which, as a light readie to goe out, had with a great, but not long blaze, shined more brightly of late, than in many ages past.

Cleomenes fled vnto Sparta: where hee had no desire to stay, finding only two hundred left, of sixe thousand Spartans that hee had led vnto this battaile, and most of his hired Souldiers dead, or gone away. So he perswaded his people to yeld themselves vnto Antigonus; and promising to doe all that should at any time in his owne power, for their good, he halted away to the Sea-side (where he had shipping long before prouided, against all that might happen) and imbarqued himselfe for Aegypt. He was louingly entreated by Ptoleme Euergetes; who vnderooke to restore him to his Kingdomes; and (perhaps) meant no lesse, as being much delighted with his gallant behaviour and qualities. In the meane season hee had a pension allowed him, of foure and twentie talents, yearly. But this Ptoleme died; and his sonne Ptoleme Philopater succeeded him: a vicious yong Prince, wholly gouerned by lewd Women, and base Men, vnmindefull of all vertue, and hating any in whom it was found. When therefore Cleomenes was desirous to returne into Greece, whither the troubles in Peloponnesus did seeme to inuite him; Ptoleme, and his Minions, would neither giue him aide; nor yet dared to dismisle him (as he desired) to trie his owne friends in Greece, because hee was too well acquainted with the weaknesse of Aegypt: nor well knew how to detain him against his will. At length they deuised matter against him, and made him prisoner. The last act of him was; that with thirtie of his Countreymen, hee vnderooke a desperate enterprize: breaking out of the prison, and prouoking the Alexandrians to rebell, and seeke their libertie. In which attempt hee slue some enemies of his that he met; and hauing walked vp and downe the streets, without resistance (no man offering to take his part, or, which is very strange, to fight against him on the Kings behalfe) He, and his Companions, agreed together to bee Ministers of their owne death. Vpon his dead bodie Ptoleme was bold to shew his indignation: and slue his Mother and Children, that had bene sent thither as Hostages, together with the wiues of his Adherents, as many as were there, attending vpon the old Queene. Such was the end of Cleomenes; a generous Prince, but Sonne of Lamides, who had caused Agis, with his Mother and Grand-mother, to come to such a bloudie end, as now befall his owne Wife, Sonne, and Grand-children.

After the Victorie at Selasia, Antigonus without resistance entred Sparta: wherinto neuer the force of any Enemy, before him, could make way. Hee kindly treated the Citizens, and left them to their owne Lawes and Gouernement: tarrying there no longer, than two or three dayes; after which he hastened out of Peloponnesus, and neuer returned. The cause of his speedie departure was, an aduertisement that hee receiued out of Macedon; how the Ilyrians ouer-ran, and destroyed the Countrey. Had these newes come a little sooner; or had Cleomenes either deferred the fight, a few dayes longer, or at least-wit tarried, a few dayes after the fight, in Sparta: the Kingdom of Lacedaemon would haue stood, and perhaps haue extended it selfe ouer all Greece. But God had otherwise determined.

Antigonus fought a great battaile with the Ilyrians, and ouer-came them. Yet therein hee caught his bane: not by any wound, but by ouer-brayning his voice; wherewith hee brake a veine that bled inwardly, and in short space finished his life, who was troubled before with a consumption of the lungs. His Kingdom descended vnto Philip, the sonne of Demetrius, being then a Boy: as also about the same time it was, that Antiochus, surnamed (I know not why) the Great; and Ptoleme Philopater, beganne to raigne in Asia, and Aegypt; Boies all. Of these, Ptoleme, though old enough to loue Harlots, when hee first was King, yet continued a Boy, all the seuentene yeares of his raigne. The vnrpe age of Philip and Antiochus, bred such intestine inconuenience to their Kingdomes, as is vsuall in the minority of Princes: but their elder yeares brought them acquainted with the Romans; vpon which occasion, when it comes, we shall more seasonably speake of them, and of their Kingdomes, more at large.

p. VII.

WHilest things thus passed in Greece; and whilest the Carthaginians were busie in their conquest of Spaine: the Romans had found themselves worke among the Sardinians and Corsicans, that were easily subdued at first, and easily vanquished againe, when they rebelled. They made also warre with the Illyrians, wherein they got much honour with little paine. With the Gauls they had much ado, that lasted not long; being rather, as Lucie saith, a tumult than a warre. So that by all these light exercises, their valour was hardly kept from rust. How they got the Ilands in the Mediterranean Sea; it hath bene the web before: of their dealings with the Illyrians and Gauls, it is not meet to be verily silent.

The Illyrians inhabited the Countrey, now called Slauonia: a troublefome Nation, impatient of rest, and continually making warre for gaine, without other regard of friend or foe. They were invited by Demetrius King of Macedon, to helpe the Mydonians, his friends, that were besieged by the Ætolians, for that they refused to be of their societie. Before the Illyrian succours came, the Mydonians were so farre spent, that the Ætolians contended about the bootie: the old Prætor, or chiefe Magistrate of their Nation, who was going out of his Office, claying to haue the honor of the victorie, and the diuision of the spoile to be referred vnto him; for that he had in a manner brought the siege to an end, and wonne the Towne: others, that were in hope to be chosen into the Office, contradicting this, and desiring that old orders might be kept. It was a prettie strife, and somewhat like to that of the French in later ages, who thought vpon diuiding the prey, before they had wonne the victories, which anon they lost, at Poitiers and at Agincourt. The Ætolians wisely compounded the difference, ordering it thus; That the old, and the new Prætor, should be ioyntly intitled in the victorie, and haue equall authoritie, in distribution of the gettings. But the Illyrians finished the strife much more elegantly, and after another fashion. They arriued, and landed, ere any was aware of them; they fell vpon the Ætolians, and though good resistance was made, yet got the victorie, partly by force of their owne multitude, partly by helpe of the Mydonians, that were no idle in their owne businesse, but stoutly sallied out of the Towne. Many of the Ætolians were slaine, more were taken, their Campe and all their baggage was lost: the Illyrians tooke the spoile, and went their way; the Mydonians erected a Trophie, inscribing the names, both of their old and new Magistrate (for they also chose new Officers at the same time) as the Ætolians had directed them by example.

The successe of this voyage, highly pleased Agron King of the Illyrians: not only in regard of the monie, wherewith Demetrius had hired his assistance; or of the bootie that was gotten; but for that hauing vanquished the stoutest of the Greekes, hee found it not vnease, to enrich himselfe by setting vpon the lesse warlike. For joy of this, he feasted, and dranke so immoderately, that he fell into a pleurisie, which in few daies ended his life. His Kingdome, together with his great hopes, he left vnto Tenta, his wife.

Tenta gaue her people free libertie, to robbe all Nations at Sea, making no difference betweene friend and foe; as if there had bene sole Mistresse of the salt Waters. Shee armed a fleet, and sent it into Greece: willing her Captaines, to make warre warre where they found aduantage, without any further respect. These fell with the western coast of Peloponnesus; where they invaded the Eleans, and Messenians. Afterwards they returned along by Epirus, and slaid at the Citie of Phenice, to take in victualles and other necessaries. There lay in Phenice eight hundred Gauls; that hauing bene Mercenaries of the Carthaginians, went about to betray, first Agriuentum, then Erys, to the Romans; but failing to doe either, they neuertheless reuolued, and were for their misdeedes disarmed, and sent to Sea by the Romans, yet entertained by these Epirots, and trusted to lie in Garrison within their Towne. The Gauls were soone growne acquainted with the Illyrians, to whom they betrayed Phenice, which deserued none other, in trusting them. All Epirus was presently in armes, and hastned to driue out these vnwelcome guests. But whilest the Epirots lay before the Towne, there came newes into their Campe, of another Illyrian Armie, that was marching thitherward by Land, vnder one Sceurdilus; whom Queene Teuta had sent to helpe his fellowes. Vpon this aduertisement, a part of them is sent away towards Antigonis, to make good that Towne, and the freights adioyning, by which these new commers must enter into their Countrey; another part of them remains at Phenice, to continue the siege. Neither the one, nor the other, sped well in their businesse. For Sceurdilus found meanes to ioyne with his fellowes; and they that were besieged within Phenice, sallied out of the towne, and gaue such an ouerthrow to the Epirots, as made them despaire of sauing their Countrey, without great and speedie helpe from abroad. Wherefore Embassadors were sent to the Achaens and Ætolians: crauing their helpe, with very pitifull termes of entreatie. They obtained their suit; neither was it long, before an Armie, sent by these two Nations, was readie in Epirus, to present battaile vnto Sceurdilus. But Sceurdilus was called home, by letters from Teuta the Queene, that signified a rebellion of some Illyrians against her: so that he had no minde to put his forces to hazzard, but offered composition; which was accepted. The agreement was, That the Epirots might ransom their Towne, and all their people that were prisoners; and that the Illyrians should quietly depart, with all their bootie and slaues. Hauing made this profitable and honourable bargain; the Illyrians returned into their owne Countrey by Land, finding their bootie away by Sea.

At their comming home, they found no such great trouble, as that which they brought, or had occasioned in this voyage. For in fulfilling the commandment of their Queene, they had taken many Italian Marchants, whilest they lay at Phenice; and made them good prize. Hereof the complaints, made vnto the Roman Senate, were so frequent, that Embassadors were sent to require of Teuta, that shee should abstaine from doing such injuries. These Embassadors found her very jolly; both for the riches which her fleet had brought in, and for that shee had, in short space, tamed her Rebels, and brought all to good order, saue only the towne of Issa, which her forces held straightly besieged. Swelling with this prosperitie, shee could hardly afford a good looke to the vnmanly Romans; that found fault with her doings; and calling them by a true name, Pyrate, required amends. Yet when their speech was ended, shee vouchsafed to tell them, That iniurie in publike shee would doe them none: as for priuate matters, no account was to be made of them; neither was it the manner of Kings, to forbid their Subjects to get commoditie, how they best could, by Sea. But (saide the younger of the two Embassadors) we Romans haue a manner, and a very laudable one, to take reuenge in publike, of those priuate wrongs, that are borne out by publike authoritie: therefore we shall teach you, God willing, to reforme your Kingly manners, and learne better of vs. These words the Queene tooke so impatiently, that no reuenge could satisfie her, but the death of him that had spoken them. Wherefore, without all regard of the common Law of Nations, shee caused him to be slaine: as if that had bene the way, to set her heart at rest; which was indeede the meane, to disquiet and afflict it euer after.

The Romans, prouoked by this outrage, prepared two great Armies; the one by Sea, confiting of two hundred saile, commanded by C. Fulvius; the other by Land, led by M. Posthumus. They trouble not themselves any more, with requiring satisfaction: for this injurie is of such nature, as must be requited with mortall warre. It is indeede contrarie to all humane Law, to vse violence towards Embassadors; the reason and ground whereof, seemes to bee this; that since without mediation, there would neuer be an end of warre and deltruction, therefore it was equally received by all Nations, as a lesse taught by Nature, that Embassadors should passe freely, and in factie, betweene enemies. Neuertheless, as I take it, this generall Law is not without limitation. For if any King, or State, lay hold vpon Embassadors sent by their enemies, not vnto themselves, but vnto some third, whom they should draw into the quarrell; then is it as lawfull, to vse violence to those Embassadors (thus imploied, to make the warre more terrible) as it is to kill the men of warre, and subjects, of an enemy. And so might the Athenians haue answered it, when they slue the Lacedemonian Embassadors, that were sent to Xerxes, to draw him into a warre vpon the Athenians. Neither are those Embassadors, which practise against the person of that Prince, in whose Countries they reside, warranted by any Law whatsoever. For whereas the true Office of an Embassador residing, is the maintenance of amitie; if it be not lawfull for one Prince, to practise against the life of another, much lesse may an Embassador doe it, without incurring justly the same danger of punishment, with other Traitors; in which case, his place giues him no priuiledge at all. But we will leaue this dispute to the Civilians; and goe on with the reuenge, taken by the Romans, for the slaughter of their Embassadors Cornelians.

The Illyrian Queene was secure of the Romans, as if they would not dare to stirre against her. Shee was indeede in an error; that hath vndone many of all sorts, greater and lesse than shee, both before and since: Having more regard vnto fame, than vnto the substance of things. The Greekes were at that time more famous than the Romans; the Aetolians and Epirats had the name of the most warlike people in Greece; these had shee easily vanquished; and therefore thought, that with the Romans shee should be litle troubled. Had shee considered, that her whole Armie, which wrought such wonders in Greece, was not much greater, than of ten thousand men; and that neuertheless, it prevailed as much, by oddes of number, as by valour, or skill in armes; shee would haue continued to vse her aduantage, against those that were of more fame than strength, with such good caution, that shee should not haue needed to oppose her late-gotten reputation, against those that were more mighty than her selfe. But shee was a woman, and did what shee listeth. Shee sent forth a greater fleet than before, vnder Demetrius of Pharus; with the like ample commission, to take all that could be gotten. This fleet diuided it selfe; and one part of it fell with Dyrachium; the other, with Coryra. Dyrachium was almost surprized by the Illyrians; yet was it rescued by the stout Citizens. In Coryra the Illyrians landed; they walled the Ile; and besieged the Towne. Hereupon the Aetolians and Achaeanes were called in to helpe: who came, and were beaten in a fight at Scas; loosing, besides others of lesse note, Marcus Caryneis, the first Prætor of Achaia, whom Aratus succeeded. The Towne of Coryra, dismayed with this ouerthrow, opened the gates vnto Demetrius Pharius; who tooke possession of it, with an Illyrian Garrison: sending the rest of his forces to besiege Dyrachium. In the meane season, Tenta was angry with her Captaine Demetrius: I know not why; but so, as hee resolved to trie any other course, rather than to trust her.

The Romans were euen readie to put to Sea, though vncertaine which way to take, when aduertisement was brought to C. Fulvius the Confull, of Demetrius his feare, and discontent. Likely it was, that such an occasion might greatly helpe to aduance the businesse in hand. Wherefore the Confull sailed thither; where hee found the Towne of Coryra so well prepared to his hand by Demetrius, that it not only receiued him willingly, but deliuered into his power the Illyrian Garrison, and submitted it selfe vnto the Roman protection.

After

After this good beginning, the Confull sailed alongst the coast, to Apollonia; accompanied with Demetrius, whom hee vied thenceforth as his counsailler and guide. To Apollonia came also Posthumus, the other Confull, with the Land-Armie, numbered at twentie thousand foot, and two thousand horse. Thence they hasten towards Dyrachium, which the Illyrians had besieged; but vpon newes of the Roman Armie, they disperse themselves. From thence the Romans enter Illyria, and take Parthenia; beat the Illyrians by Sea, take twentie of their ships; and enforce the Queene Tenta to forsake the coast, and to couer her selfe in Ezion, farre within the Land. In the end, part of the Romans halte them homeward, and leaue the best places of Illyria in the hands of Demetrius; an other part staies behinde, and prosecutes the warre, in such sort, that Tenta was forced to begge peace: which shee obtained vpon miserable conditions; to wit, That shee should quit the better part of Illyria, and pay tribute for the rest; and from thenceforth, neuer send any of her ships of warre, towards the coasts of Greece, beyond the Land of Lissa: except it were some one or two vessels, vnarmed, and by way of Trade.

After this Illyrian warre, the Romans sent Embassadors into diuers parts of Greece, signifying their loue to the Countrey, and how, for good will thereunto, they had made warre with good successe vpon Tenta, and her people. They hoped belike, that some distressed Cities would take this occasion, to desire their patronage: which if it hapned, they were wise enough to play their owne games. But no such matter fell out. The Embassadors were only rewarded with thanks; and a decree made at Corinth, That the Romans thenceforth might be partakers of the Illyrian pastimes. This was an idle courtserie, but well meant by the vaine Greekes, and therefore well taken by the Romans: who by this Illyrian Expedition got nothing in Greece, save a little acquaintance, that shall be more hereafter.

§. VIII.

Of the warre betweene the Romans and Gauls, somewhat before the coming of HANNIBAL into Italy.

He Gauls that dwelt in Lumbardie, were the next, against whom the Romans tooke Armes. These were a populous Nation, and often molested Rome; sometimes with their owne forces, and sometimes with the assistance of those that inhabited France. Once their fortune was good; when they tooke Rome, and burnt it: though the issue of that warre proud not answerable to the beginning, if we may giue credit vnto Roman Historians. In following times, their successe was variable, and commonly bad. Many ouerthrowes they receiued; and if they got any victorie, it yielded them no profit, but was soone extorted out of their hands. They were indeede more fierce, than well aduised; lightly stirred vp to warre, and lightly giuing out. At the first brunt, they were said to be more than men; but when that was past, lesse than women. The Romans were acquainted with their temper, by long experience; and knew how to handle them: yet gaue alwaies carefull heede to their approach, were it only bruted. For the danger of them was sudden, and vncertaine; by reason of their neighbourhood, and want of intelligence among them. Few of their attempts vpon Rome, were called warres, but tumults of Gallies; tumults of the Gauls; and rightly. For they gaue many alarms to Italy, and vied to rise with great Armes; but after a few dayes march, and sometimes before their setting forth, any small occasion serued to disperse them. Having receiued an ouerthrow; they would rest ten, or twelue yeares, sometimes twentie or thirtie; till they were stirred vp againe, by younger heads, vnacquainted with the danger. Whilest they rested, the state of Rome, that against these made only defensive warre, had leisure to grow, by setting vpon

Dyrachium, sometime called Epidamnus, and now Durazzo, seated vpon the Adriaticke Sea, betwene the Ilands of Dubara and Coryra, b. Coryra, an Iland of the Adriaticke Sea, not farre from Durazzo; called now Ceph, and in the possession of the Venetians.

upon others. Herein God provided well for that Monarchie, which he intended to raise: that the Gauls neuer fell vpon Italie, with a mightie power, in the time of any other great and dangerous warre. Had they attempted to conquer it, whilst Pyrrius was traualling in the same enterprize; or in either of the two former Punick warres: it may be doubted what would haue become of this imperious Citie. But it seemes that the Gauls had no better intelligence in the affaires of Italie, than strangers had in Gaul. At least, they knew not how to vse their times: and were therefore like to smart, whensoever the enemies, whom they had much prouoked, and little hurt, should finde leisure to visit them at their owne home: which was now after the first Punick Warre. Once before this, the Romans had beene bold, to set vpon the Gauls in their owne Countrey: and that was three yeares before the coming of Pyrrius into Italie. At that time the Senones, a Tribe of the Gauls, invading Hetruria, and besieging Arretium, had wonne a great battaile, and slaine L. Caelius with the most of his Armie. Manius Curius the new Consul, sent Embassadors to them, to treat about ranfome of prisoners. But these Embassadors they slue. Thereupon when fortune turned to the better, the Romans followed it so well, that they expelled these Senones out of their Countrey, and sent a Colonie of their owne to inhabit it. This caused the Boj, another people of Gaul, to feare the like measure: who thereupon tooke armes, and drew the Hetrurians to their side. But the Romans ouerthrew them in two great battailes; and thereby made them sue for peace, so which lallt vntill this end of the Illyrian warre.

e There were diuers nations of the Boj: as in Pannonia, Illyria, Germanie, in Boulogne in France, and in Aquitaine; but this Boj were of the French race, & dwelt at this time about the mouth of the Riuier of Po.

It vexed the Gauls, to see a Roman Colonie planted in their Countrey; who had beene accustomed to enlarge their bounds, by driving out their Neighbours perforce. Wherefore they laboured with the Transalpines (so the Romans called those in France, as lying from them beyond the Alpes, though to vs they are nearer; like as they called Cisalpines, or by-bithers the Alpes, those who dwelt betwene them and the Mountaines) to draw them to their partie: reasonably presuming, that as their diiunction had caused their losse, so their union might recompence it, with large amends. But the businesse was so foolishly carried, that the Cisalpines and Transalpines, fell together by the eares: putting the Romans only to a tumult, without further trouble of warre. Soone after, they were vrged by a greater indignitie, to goe more substantially to worke. For C. Flaminius, a popular man in Rome, propoed a Decree which was ratified by the people; That, besides one Colonie already planted in the territorie of the Senones, as many more should be caried thither, as would serue to people the whole Countrey betwene Ancona and Ariminum: exterminating vnto the Gauls. Such an offer, were it made in England, concerning either Virginia, or Gutiana it selfe, would not ouer-joy the Multitude. But the Commonalty of Rome tooke this in so good part, notwithstanding all danger joynd with the benefit, that Flaminius had euer after their good will.

This dreadfull President extremely displeased the Boj: who being Neighbours to Ariminum, feared the like displantation. And because all the rest of the Gauls had reason to resolue, that themselves also should be rooted out by degrees; the great Nation of the Insubrians, which inhabited the Duchie of Milan, joynd with the Boj, and vpon a common purfe entertained the Gessates, Nations about Rhodanus, wageable as the Switzers in these times. The Gessates, hauing receiued a great Imprest come to the field vnder the conduct of their Kings, Concolitanus and Atreclus: who with the Boj and Insubrians, compound an Armie of fiftie thousand foot, and twentie thousand horse, and those of the best men, and best appointed, that euer invaded the Roman Territorie; to whom, the Senogalli, that had beene beaten out of their possessions, gaue a great increase of strength. On the contrarie side, the Venetians, and the Cenomanni, adhered to the Romans: as better beleeuing in their prosperitie and rising fortune. For feare of whole incurfions therefore, the Gauls were forced to leaue a good part of their Armie, on the frontier of Milan: With the rest of their forces they entred into Tuscane. The Romans hearing of this danger, f Cenomanni, are the people about Exgona, on the North-side of the Riuier Po in Italie. There were also of these Cenomanni in France, and inhabited the Countie of Main.

sent Emilius to Rimini, to stop their passage; and in the place of C. Attius their other Consul, who then was in Sardinia, they employ one of their Pretors, for the defence of Tuscane.

Being at this time greatly troubled, with the consideration of this powerfull Armie, which the Gauls had assembled, they caused a view to be taken, as well of all their owne forces, as of those of their Allies: who were no lesse willing than themselves, to oppose the incurfions of the barbarous people; fearing, as they had cause, that their owne destruction could not be prevented otherwise, than by the good fortune of Rome. The numbers, found in this Muster, deserue to be recorded: because they set out the power of the Romans in those daies. With the Consuls they sent forth to the warre foure Legions of their owne: euery Legion consisting of fise thousand two hundred foot, and three hundred horse; and of their Allies, thirtie thousand foot, and two thousand horse. There were also appointed for Supplies (if any misadventure came to these) of the Salurnes and Hetrurians fiftie thousand foot, and foure thousand horse; which Armie was to be lodged in the border of Hetruria. Of the Vmbri and Sarlinates, which inhabited the Apennines, there were twentie thousand; and of the Venetians and Cenomanni, other twentie thousand: which latter Armies were directed, to invade the Boj, that forcing them to defend their owne Territories, the generall Armie of the Gauls should be thereby greatly diminished. There were besides these, to bee readie against all vncertaine chances of warre, thirtie thousand foot, and fiftie hundred horse, garriisoned in Rome: it selfe, of their owne people; and of their Allies, thirtie thousand foot, and two thousand horse.ouer and about these great troupes; in the Roll of the Laines, that was sent vnto the Senate, there were numbered foure score thousand foot, and fise thousand horse; in that of the Samnites, seuentie thousand foot, and of horse foure thousand; in that of the Sapreges, and Messapges, fiftie thousand foot, and sixteen thousand horse; the Lucans sent a list of thirtie thousand foot, and three thousand horse; the Marsi, Marrucini, Ferentans, and the Pessini, of twentie thousand foot, and foure thousand horse. The Romans had also two Legions in Stail, and about Tarentum, containing eight thousand foure hundred foot, and foure hundred horse. So as of the Romans and Campans jointly, reckoning men armed, and fit to beare armes, there were registred two hundred and fiftie thousand foot; and of horse, three and twentie thousand: of which, reckoning the Romans apart, there were an hundred and fiftie thousand foot, and about fixe thousand horse. Calling vp the whole forces of all the Provinces in Italie, both of the Romans and their Conederates, it amounted to seuen hundred thousand foot, and seuentie thousand horse. But the number is somewhat misse-calt by Polybius; not with a purpose to enrich himselfe by the dead prices: for where he reckons nine hundred horse too many, he falls short nine thousand two hundred of the foot.

g Imperand Messapges seeme to be one Nation who are also called Salernites, Pouccidri, Apulians, and Calabrians. The Countie is now Apulia, containing the Northernmost part of the land of Calabria. h A people of the Kingdome of Sapota. i Ptolomee calls them a people of Italie. k A people of Commania, called to this day Ferentians, and Leander.

How great fouer this Muster was, it seemes to haue beene like vnto that, which Ladonick Sforza made when Lewes the twelfth invaded Milan: at what time, the better to encourage himselfe, and his subjects, he tooke a Roll of all persons able to beare armes, within the Duchie, though indeed he were neuer able to bring a tenth part of them into the field. Certaine it is, that the battailes of Trebit, Trafymene, and Canna, did not consume any such proportion, as was answerable to this large accompt. Yet were the Romans faine to arme their slaues, euen for want of other Souldiers, after their ouerthrow at Canna. Wherefore the maraile is not great, that the Cartheginians and others were little terrified, with report of such a multitude. For all heads are not fit for helmets: though the Roman Citizens were, in generall, so good fighting men, as elsewhere might be found.

Notwithstanding all these counter-preparations, the Gauls keepe on their way: and entring into Tuscane, destroy, and put to fire and sword, all that lay before them. From thence they march directly towards Rome; hoping to finde the Romans, rather in deliberation, than in the field. But their intelligence failes them. For the Roman Armie, sent into Tuscane, hauing taken some other way than they did, and finding that it had misfed of them, came againe fall after them, to arreft them in their iourne. Hereof when they heard the rumour, fearing to be charged on their backs, they turned head: and in the fame cuning discovered the Roman Armie, by whom they incamped. It was now a matter of apparant necessitie, that fight they must. Wherefore they helped themselves with a stratageme: that shewed no great finesse or wit, but such, as well befecmed those that had none other occupation than warre: and flood them in good stead at the present. In the dead of the night, they caule their foot to march away, but not farre: leauing their horse in guard; to whom they giue order, to come off at the first light of day, with such a speede, as might rather argue a running away, than a retreat, as if they had not dared to abide battle. The Romans, interpreting this their hallic departure, as the Gauls desired they should, follow them in disorder. The Gauls returne; charge them; and kill fixe thousand vpon the place; the rest take a peece of ground of aduantage, and defend themselves, till L. Emilius, being at Ariminum, comes to their succour. Vpon the comming of the Consull, the Gauls consult, whether they should giue the Romans battaile, or forbear. In which dispute, Anerceslus, one of their Kings, perswades them, rather to returne into their owne Countreies; where after they had disposed of the great spoiles and riches which they had gotten, they should then renew the warre, being without carrieage, pester, or other impediment. This aduice they all embrace; for seeing they that were Mercenaries, had obtained what they came for, to wit, the spoiles of their enemies; they thought it wisdome, to hazzard neither it, nor themselves, any further.

This indeede had beene a good resolution, if they had taken it, before the enemy had beene in fight. But as well in the warres of these latter ages, as in former times, it hath euer beene found extreme dangerous, to make a retreat in the Head of an enemies Armie. For although they that retire, doe often turne head; yet in alwaies going on from the pursuing enemy, they finde within a few miles, cuber freight, hedge, ditch, or place of disaduantage, which they are enforced to passe in disorder. In such cases the Souldier knowes it, as well as the Captaine, that he which forsakes the field, perceiues, and feares, some aduantage of the Enemies. Feare, which is the betrayer of those succours that Reason offreth, when it hath once possit the heart of man, it casteth thence both courage and vnderstanding. They that make the retreat, are alwaies in feare to be abandoned; they that leade the way, feare to be ingirded: and fo the hindmost treads on his heeles that is foremost, and consequently, all disband, runne, and perish, if those that fauour the retreat, be not held to it by men of great courage. The miserable overthrow, that the French receiued in 2. April, in the yeare 1503. vpon a retreat made by the Marques of Sal, doth testifie no lesse. For although a great troupe of French horse, slayn the pursuing enemy a long time, and gaue the foot leisure to not away; yet being retarded by oftentimes, the Spanish foot ouer-tooke, and delated them vicerly. During the warres betwene the Imperials, and the French, Boiss and Mont were lost at Brignoles, who in a brauerie would needes fee the enemy, before they left the field. So was Stras overthrowne, by the Marques of Marignan, because he could not be perswaded, to dislodge the night before the Marques his arriuall. Therefore did the French King Francis the first, wisely: when without respect of point of honour, he dislodge from before Landersey, by night; as many other, the most aduised Captaines, (not finding themselves in ease to giue battaile) haue done. Je ne trouue point (saith the Marshall MONLVC) au fait des armes chose si difficile, qu'une retreat; i fin, enooling in the arte of warre so difficult, as to make a safe retreat. A fure rule it is, that there is lesse dishonour to dislodge in the darke, than to be beaten in the light. And hercof M. de la Noue giues this iudgement, of a diues retreat, made in France, presently before the battaile of Moncointour. For (saith he) staying vpon our reputation, in shew not to dislodge by night; we lost our reputation indeede, by dislodging by day: whereby whereby we were forced to fight vpon our disaduantage, and to our ruine. And yet did that worthie Gentleman, Count Lodowick of Nassau, brother to the late famous Prince of Orange, make the retreat at Moncointour with so great resolution, as hee faced the one halfe of the Protestant Armie, then broken and disbanded, of which my selfe was an eye-witnesse; and was one of them that had caule to thanke him for it.

Now the Gauls, embracing the safe aduice (as they take it) of one of their Kings; turne their backs to the enemy, and their faces homeward. Emilius follows them, as neare as he can, without ingaging himselfe, attending his aduantage. In the meane while, C. Atilius the other Consull, with the Legions of Sardinia, lands at Pisfz, so as the Gauls, inclosed betwene two Armies, are forced to fight. They therefore equally strengthen their Reare, and Front. To sustaine Emilius, they appoint the Gessates, and the Alanois; in the Front, they range the Piemontois, and the rest of the Gauls inhabiting vpon the River of Po. The manner of the fight Polybius describeth at large; which was well fought of all hands. But in the end the Gauls fell; and so did Atilius the Consull: who died in the place, accompanied with the two Kings of the Gauls, Concolitanus and Anerceslus, with fortie thousand of their Vallais.

After this fatal overthrow, the Gauls lost courage; and, ere long, all that they held in Italie. For they were invaded the yeare following this overthrow, by the new Consulls, Eulais, and Manlius. The Romans knew well how to vse their victorie: they gaue not ten, twentie, or thirtie yeares time, to the Gauls, to repaire their forces, as the Gauls had done to them. These new Consulls beat the Bois; but by reason of the great raines that fell, and the great pestilence that reigned, they were compelled for that present to surcease. In the second yeare, Furius, and Flaminius, invade the Milanois; and preuaile very farre, being strongly assisted by the Cenomanians and the Venetians. Neuerthelesse these Consulls were reuoked out of their Prouince, by the Senate of Rome, and compelled to resigne their Office: because the Augures, or Soothsayers, had found, that some token or other of the Birds (in which, and all sortes of their diuination, the Romans were extremely superstitious) had not only foretold little good, when they were chosen, but had also nullified the election. C. Flaminius, receiuing letters of this reuocation, from the Senate, and being otherwise aduertised of the contents, was not hastic to open them: but first gaue battaile vnto the enemies, vanquished them, and spoiled their Countreie; then perused the letters; and returning home obtayned a triumph, fore against the will of the Senate, and not altogether with good liking of the people, who yet bare him out, for that hee sided in faction with the Commonalty, though a man of great Nobilitie.

This was that Flaminius, who had propounded the Decree, for diuiding the Countreie of the Senones among the people of Rome. He was the first, or one of the first, that vnderstanding the Majestie of Rome to be in danger, not only in the people, and no otherwise in the Senate, than by way of Delegation, or grand Commission; did not stand highly vpon his birth and degree, but courted the multitude, and taught them to know and vse their power, ouer himselfe, and his fellow-Senators, in reforming their disorders. For this, the Commons highly esteemed him, and the Senators as deeply hated him. But he had the surer side: and found Imitators, that rose by the same arte; which in proceesse of time, grew the only or chiefe way to preferment.

Flaminius and his Colleague, being deposed; M. Claudius Marcellus, and Cn. Cornelius Scipio, were chosen Consulls, for the rest of that yeare. The Gauls about this time desired peace, and were like to haue obtayned it: though the new Consulls were against it, as fearing to want worke. But when thirtie thousand of the Gessates, following their King Britomarus, were come ouer the Alpes, and joyned with the Insubrians: all other discoure, than of present warre, was at an end. So the Consulls hastied into their Prouince, where they besieged Acerca, a towne not farre from Novaro (so farre had the Romans pierced already) in the Duchie of Milan. To diuert them them from this siege, Britomarus late downe before Clastidium, a Towne in the same Traſt, with great part of his forces: leauing the rest, with the Insabrians, to attend vpon the Conſulls at Acerre, and to looke to the defence of Milan. But this would not suffice, to make the Romans breake vp their siege. Marcellus, taking with him the greatest part of the horse, and six hundred foot lightly armed, thought to deale well enough with those at Clastidium. Britomarus heard of the Conſulls coming; and met him vpon the way: so suddenly, that the Romans had no leisure to rest themselves after their iourne, but were compelled instantly to fight. Herein Britomarus had done well; if he had not forthwith, in a rash brauerie, lost his game at a cast. He had advantage enough in number, both of horse and foot: but hee thought so well of his owne personall valour, that he rode out single before his Armie, prouoking any one to fight with him. Marcellus was no lesse daring, than the barbarous King: whether more wise in this action, I will not dispute; he was more fortunate, and that sufficed to commend him. He slue and disarmed Britomarus, in presence of both Armies: whereby his owne men tooke such courage, and his enemies were so dismayed, that without much trouble of fight, the Romans obtained a great victorie.

This was the third and last time, that euer any Roman Generall slue the Generall of the enemies, with his owne hand. To this kind of victorie, belonged a peculiar triumph; whereof only Romulus, Cassius, and this Marcellus, had the honour: yet I dare say, that the two Scipios, and diuers other Roman Captaines, especially Caesar, would be better men of warre than any of these three; though they neuer offered vp to Iulius, Optima spolia; The Armour of a Generall slaine by themselves, when they were Generalls, nor perhaps affected so to doe.

After this victorie, Acerre was yielded to the Romans; and Milan soone after: with all that belonged to the Cisalpinos, or Gauls, that dwelt in Lumbarde. Thus was that valiant and mightie Nation, that had for so many yeares vexed the State of Rome, and in former times taken the Citie it selfe, brought to nothing in a short time; their pleasant and fertile Territories possit by the Romans; and the remainder of their Nation, inhabiting Italie, so many as would not subject their necks to the Roman yoke, either forced to abandon their Countries, or to hide themselves in the cold and barren Mountaines, like Out-lawes and Thieues. And thus did the Romans spend the three and twentie yeares, following the peace made with Carthage. In part of which time, they were at such leisure, that they closed vp the Temple of Ianus: which they neuer did before, (it standing alwaies open, when they had any warre) saue once, in the raigne of Numa; nor in long time after, vntill the raigne of Augustus. But this their present happinesse was not to last long:

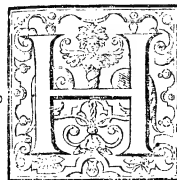

a dangerous warre, and perhaps the greatest that had euer beene, was to come vnto their gates; which being well ended, they might boldly vndertake, to extend their Monaarchie as farre, as their ambition

CHAP. III.

Of the second Punick Warre.

§. I.

10 The warres of HANNIBAL in Spaine. Quarrels betweene the Romans and Carthaginians.
HANNIBAL besiegeth and taketh Saguntum; whilſt the Romans are buſied with the Ilyrians. Warre proclaimed betwene Rome and Carthage.

HANNIBAL, the sonne of Amilear, was about fixe and twente yeares old, when hee was chosen Generall of the Carthaginian forces in Spaine. Hee was elected by the Armie, as soone as Asdrubal was dead: and the election was ratified by the ſtate at Carthage; wherewith Hanno and his Complices were nothing pleased.
This was now the third of the Barchine familie (so called of Amilear, whole surname was Barchas) that had command in chiefe, ouer the men of warre. Which honour would perhaps haue bene lesse enuied, by these domestick enemies; if the Allies and Friends of the Barchine house, had not also borne the whole sway in gouernement, and been the only men regarded, both by the Senate and the People. This general goodwill, as it was first purchased by the most worthy deserts of Amilear, in ſauing his Countrie from imminent ruine, enlarging the Dominion thereof, and enriching it 30 with treasures, and great reuenues; so was it retained by the same good artes, among his friends and followers. Hanno therefore, and his Partisans, being neither able to taxe the vertue of their enemies, that was vnreproueable; nor to performe the like seruices vnto the Common-weale: had nothing left, whereby to value themselves, excepting the generall reprobation of Warre, and cautious aduice, of not prouoking the Romans. This they ſuſtained otherwhiles with distraction; ſaying, that the Barchine faction went about to oppreſſe the libertie of the Citie. But their malicious wordes were vnregarded; and if it were factious, to beare ill will to Rome, then were all the Citizens (very few excepted) no lesse Barchine, than Hannibal himſelfe. For it was long ſince apparent, that the oath of the Romans, to the ar-40 ticles of peace, afforded no ſecurity to Carthage; were they neuer ſo quiet, and officious; vnleſſe they would yeeld to become their Subiect. Since therefore the peace was like to hold no longer, than vntill the Romans could finde ſome good aduantage, to renew the Warre: it was rather deſired by the Carthaginians, that whilſt their owne ſtate was in good caſe, the warre ſhould beginne; than that in ſome vnhappy time of ſcarce or penitence, or after ſome great loſſe of Armie or Fleet, they ſhould be driuen to yeeld vnto the impudent demands of their enemies; and to giue away baſely their lands and treasures, as they had lately done; or miſerably fight, vpon termes of diſadvantage.

This diſpoſition of his Countreymen, Hannibal well vnderſtood. Neither was he ſo ignorant (for his father, and other friends, had long time deuiſed of this buſineſſe) that in making warre with the Romans, it was no ſmall aduantage to get the ſtart of them. If once he could bring an Armie into Italie, without moleſtation; there was good hope, that he ſhould finde friends and aſſiſtants, euen of thoſe people, that helped to increaſe the Roman armies in forreigne wars. But this could neuer be effected,

N n n n

Ated, if the matter were openly disputed at Carthage. For it was to be doubted, that the Carthaginians, how glad fouer they would be, to heare that he had let the warre on foote, would neuerthelesse be slow and timorous, as commonly men are in the beginning of great enterprizes, if the matter were referred to their deliberation. Which it should happen; then were the Romans like to be made acquainted, not onely with the generalities of his purpose, but with such particulars as muſt be diſcourſed of, in procuring allowance to his deſigne. This might ſuffice to diſorder the whole Project. Wherefore he reſolved to lay liege vnto Saguntum; which might ſeeme not greatly to concerne the Romans; and would highly pleaſe the Carthaginians, that had freſh in mind the indignitie, of that Spaniſh Townes alliance with the ſiſle friends. So ſhould hee alſaie both the patience of his enemies, and the diſposition of his owne Citizens.

Having thus concluded, he neuertheleſſe went faire and orderly to worke: and beginning with thoſe that lay next in his way, approached vnto Saguntum by degrees. This he did (ſaith Liue) to giue ſome colour to his proceedings: as if he had not principally intended the warre, againſt Saguntum, but had beene drawne thither by courſe of buſineſſe. Yet reaſon teacheth plainly, that without regard of ſuch formalities, it was needfull to finiſh the Conqueit of the reſt, before he did any thing that ſhould prouoke the Romans. Firſt therefore he entred vpon the Territorie of the * Oleades; and having beſieged Alibea ( Liue calleth it Carterea ) their chiefe Citie, he became, in a few dayes, Maſter not only thereof, but of all the other townes of their Countie. This Nation which he firſt undertooke, being ſubdued, and the winter at hand; he reſted his Armie in New Carthage, or Carthagen; and imparted liberally to the Souldiers, the ſpoiles he had gotten in his late conqueit.

In the Spring following, he purſued the warre againſt the * Vaccii : and without any great difficultie, wanne firſt Salmantica, now called Salamanca; and after it, * Braccida, by aſſault: though not without a long ſiege, and great difficultie. But in his returne, he was put to the brightſt, both of his courage, and of his Martiall iudgement. For all ſuch of the Vaccii, as were able to beare armes, being made deſperate by the ſpoile of their Countie, with thoſe of Salmanica, and of the Oleades, that had eſcaped in the late ouerthrow, joyning themſelues with the Taletani; compounded an Armie of an hundred thouſand able men; and ſtayed Hannibal on the banks of the Riuer Tegus, which runneth to the Sea by Liſboune in Portugall. Theſe foure Nations, hauing had experience of Hannibals invincible courage, and that he neuer ſaw enimie, vpon whom hee durſt not giue charge; were thoroughly reſolved, that his naturall valour would at this time no leſſe neglect the cold aduice of diſcretion, than at other times it had ſeemed to doe, when the like great occaſion perſwaded him to ſiege it. But hee that makes himſelfe a bodie of Cryſtall, that all men may looke through him, and diſcerne all the parts of his diſpoſition; makes himſelfe (withall) an Aſſe: and thereby teacheth others, either how to ride, or driue him. Wife men, though they haue ſingle hearts in all that is iuſt and vertuous; yet they are like coſſers with double bottomes: which when others looke into, being opened, they ſee not all that they hold, or the fudden, and at once. It is true, that this ſubtile Carthaginian, when he ſerued vnder Aſdrubal, was, of all them of marke in the Armie the moſt aduenturous. But that which may beſeeme a Captaine, or inferior Commander, doth nor alwaies become a Chiefe; though it hath ſometimes ſucceeded well with ſuch great ones, as haue beene found more fortunate, than wiſe. At this time, our great Man of warre knew as well how to diſſemble his courage, as at other times to make it good. For he with-drew himſelfe from the Riuer ſide, as if fearefull to foord it; thereby to draw ouer that great multitude, from their banks of aduantage. The Spaniards, apprehending this in ſuch ſort, as Hannibal deſired that they ſhould; thruſt themſelues in furie and diſorder, into the ſwift ſtrame, with a purpoſe to charge the Carthaginians, abandoning (as they thought for feare) the defences on the contrarie ſide. But when Hannibal

* A people (ſaith Vir ſaſt) were the Riuer of Rio. But in the old deſcription of Syrie, in Oriſus, they are found where Tegus ſhall be by Saguntum, not far from New Carthage.
a. A people of Cilicia the old. b. Alibea, on Alibea ſide in and Citie on the Tegus in Portugall.

ſaw them in their way, and well-neare ouer; hee turned back his Elephants, to entertayne them at their landing: and thruſt his Horſe-men, both aboue and beneath them, into the Riuer. Theſe, carrying a kinde of Lance de gy, ſharpe at both ends, which they held in the middle of the ſtaffe; had ſuch an aduantage ouer the foot, that were in the Riuer, vnder their ſtrokes, clattered together, and vnable to moue or ſhift their bodies, as on firme ground: that they flew all theſe, (in a manner) without reſiſtance, which were already entred into the water; and purſued the reſt, that fled like men amazed, with ſo great a ſlaughter, as from that day forward, there was not any Spaniard, on that ſide the Riuer of Iberus, (the Saguntines excepted) that had the daring to liſt vp their hands againſt the Carthaginians.

The Saguntines, perceiving the danger towards them; cryed before they were hurt. They ſent Embaſſadours to Rome, and benomed themſelues, as likely to ſuffer that, which afterwards they ſuffered indeede; only becauſe of their alliance and friendſhip with this honourable Citie, which the Carthaginians hated. This tale moued the Senate: but much more a report, that Saguntum was already beſieged. Hereupon ſome crye out, that Warre ſhould be proclaimed by Land and Sea; as alſo that the two Conſuls ſhould be ſent with Armies, the one into Spaine, the other into Aſiack. But others went more Roman-like to worke; and carryed it. So it was only concluded; that Embaſſadours ſhould be ſent into Spaine, to view the ſtate of their Confederates: which were indeede none other, than the Saguntines. For if Hannibal intended warre againſt Rome, it was likely, that he would giue them, ere it were long, a more plauſible occaſion to take armes againſt him: if hee had not ſuch purpoſe; yet would it be in their power, to determine what they liſted themſelues, vpon the report of theſe Embaſſadours; and this their grauitie, in being not too rash at firſt, would ſerue to countenance their following Decree. Of theſe Embaſſadours Liue reports, that they found Hannibal before Saguntum; but could not get audience of him, and therefore went to Carthage, where alſo they were not regarded, nor heard. But Polybius, an Hiſtorian of ſincritie leſſe queſtionable, tels, that they found him at Carthagen; and had conference with him, though ſuch as left them doubtfull. This is more agreeable to the reſt of Hannibals his whole courſe. And ſurely wee might wonder, why the Carthaginians ſhould afterwards admit a more peremptorie Embaſſage (as Liue conteſteth) and fall to diſputation about the covenants of peace; if they had rejected that which was ſent vpon none other pretence, than preuention of warre.

Whielt the Embaſſadours paſſed to and fro, Hannibal prepared not only his forces, but ſome Roman pretences, againſt Saguntum. He found out Amertines, or people that ſhould doe as the Amertines in Siell had done for the Romans; and implore his helpe againſt the Saguntines. Theſe were the Turdetani; a Nation adjoining to Saguntum, and hauing many quarrells with them: (as happens commonly among Neighbours) of which, Hannibal himſelfe had hatche ſome. Finding therefore ſuch an occaſion, whatſoeuer it was, as made him able to ſay, that the Saguntines had firſt prouoked him, ere he medled with them; he made no more ado, but ſate downe with his whole power before their Towne. Hee was now more ſecure, than he had formerly been, of his owne Citizens: for that they had not entertayned the Roman Embaſſadours, with any trembling reverence, as of late yeares they had beene wont. Neuertheleſſe, he was glad of any handſome colour, to ſhadow his actions: not only becauſe the warre, which he ſo much deſired, was not proclaimed, but that he might not be checked in his courſe, as an open enimie, before hee could ſet foot in Italie. The Romans had the like, though contrarie deſire. They were glad of the quarrell: as hoping, that Carthage, with all thereto belonging, ſhould thereby in ſhort ſpace become their owne. Yet were they not haſtie to threaten, before they were ready to ſtrike; but meant to temporize, vntill they had an Armie in readineſſe to be ſent into Spaine, where they thought to make Saguntum, the ſeate of the Warre.

In the meane while, Demetrius Pharius, whom the Romans had made King ouer a great part of Ilyria, rebelled against them: either for that hee found himselfe ouerslightly tyed vp by them, with hard conditions; or rather becaufe hee was of an vnthankfull disposition. The commotion of the Gauls, and afterward, the flame of the Carthaginian warre, emboldened him to despise his Benefactors and Patrons: whom he ought to haue defended and aided, in all perills, euen with the hazard of his whole estate, which hee had receiued of their gift. But hee was a Traitor to his owne Queene; and therefore dealt according to his kinde, with those that had rewarded him for being such. First, he built ships, and spoiled the Isles of Greece: against the covenants to which he was bound. Then he aduentured further, and seized vpon some places, that the Romans kept in their owne hands. If he had begonne sooner, or rather if he had staied somewhat longer, he might haue sped better. For the businesse with the Gauls, was ended; with Hannibal, not thoroughly begun: when he declared himselfe, by his doings, an enemy, and was vanquished. The Roman Consul, Amilius, was sent against him: who in few daies wan the strong Towne of Drim'um; and thereby brought such terror vpon the Countie round about, that Embassadors were sent from all places, to yeld themselves, without putting him to further paines. Only the Citie of Pharus, in which Demetrius lay, prepared to resist: which it might haue done long, if the hot-headed Rebelle had bene too foolish, Amilius landed a great part of his Armie, in the Isle of Pharus, by night; and bestowed them in covert; presenting himselfe the next morning, with twentie ships before the Towne, and offering to force the Hauens. Demetrius with all his power issued out against the Consul; and was soone intercluded from the Towne, by those that lay in ambush. Wherefore he fled away through by-paths, to a creeke, where he had shipping readie for him, and embarked himselfe: leauing all his estate vnto them, of whose libertie he first had it.

This businesse, though it were soone dispatched, yet preuented it not the siege of Saguntum; before which Hannibal fate downe, ere Amilius was landed in Ilyria. In the beginning of the siege, the Carthaginians were much discouraged, by reason of the braue sallies made by the Saguntines; in one of which, their Generall receiued a dangerous wound in the thigh, that caused him to lie many daies vnable to moue. Neuerthelesse he was not vnminidfull of this worke in the meane while; but gaue order to raise certaine moueable Towers, that might equall those which were built on the walls of the Citie; and to prepare to batter the curtaines, and make a breach. These being finished and applied, had soone wrought their effect. A great and large breach was made, by the fall of diuers Towers, and a great length of wall, whereat an hot assault was giuen: but it was so well sustained by the Saguntines, as the Carthaginians were not only beaten from the breach, and out of some ground within the Towne, which vpon the first furie they had won; but they were pursued euen to their owne trenches and camp. Neuerthelesse the Carthaginian Armie, wherein were about an hundred and fiftie thousand men, did so wearie the townesmen with continuall trauaile, that at length it got within the walls; and was only hindred from taking full possession of the Citie, by some counter-workes of the Saguntines, that were all ready to be won. In this extremitie, there was one Aleon a Saguntine, that conueyed himselfe out of the Towne, to treat with Hannibal for some accord. But the conditions which the Carthaginian offered, were so seuer, and without all compasse of honour, as Aleon durst not returne to propound them to his countermen. For Hannibal demanded all that they had; gold, siluer, plate, and other riches within the Citie: yea, the Citie it selfe to be abandoned by the Citizens; promising, that hee would assigne some other place for their habitation: not allowing them, to carrie out with them any other thing, wherewith to sustaine themselves, than the clothes on their backs; or other armes to defend them, than their nailes and teeth. Yet might they farre better haue submitted themselves vnto this miserable appointment, (seeing thereby they might haue enioyed their liues, and saued the honor of their wiues and daughters) daughters) than to haue rested at the discretion of the Conquerour, as soone after they did: by whom their wiues and daughters were deflowred before their faces; and all put to sword, that were about foureene yeares of age. For it was a poore comfort, which a great number of them tooke, when not daring to fight, and sell their blood at the dearest rate, they thrust themselves vp like most wretched creatures, in their owne houses, and therein burnt themselves with all that they had: so dying vnreueged. The treasures found in Saguntum, which were very great, Hannibal kept, therewith to pay his Armie: the statues, and other bootie, he diuided among his Souldiers; reseruing some things of choice, wherewith to present his friends at Carthage, and to animate them vnto the Warre.

These tidings exceedingly vexed the Romans; who had good cause to bee angry at their owne slownesse, in forbearing to send helpe vnto the Saguntines, that held out eight moneths, looking still for succour, in vaine. Wherefore they determined to repaire their honour, by taking sharpe reuenge. To this end they sent Embassadors againe to Carthage: demanding only, whether it were by generall consent and allowance of the Carthaginians, that HANNIBAL had made warre vpon Saguntum; which if they granted (as it seemed they would) then to giue them defiance. Hereunto answer was made, in the Senate of Carthage, to this effect. That this their second Embassage, howsoeuer qualified with milde words, was indeede more insolent than the former. For in that, they only required iustice against Hannibal; but in this, the very State and Common-wealth of Carthage, was vrged to pleade guiltie, or not guiltie. But (said the Carthaginian speaker) whether the Generall of our Armie in Spain, in besieging Saguntum, haue only followed his owne counsaile; or whether he did it, by direction from vs: it is not the question which the Romans ought to aske vs. That which is indeede worthy examination or dispute, is; whether it were lawfull, or vnlawfull, for HANNIBAL to doe as hee hath done. For it belongs to vs, to call our owne Commanders in question, and to punish them according to their faults and errors; to you, to challenge vs, if wee haue done any thing contrarie to our late League and Contract. It is true, that in our negotiation with Luc'atius the Consul, the Allies of both Nations were comprehended: but the Saguntines were not then of your Allies, and therefore no parties to the peace then made; for of your Allies in the future, or of ours, there was no dispute. As touching the last agreement, betwene you and Asdrubal, wherein you will say that the Saguntines were comprehended by name; it is you that haue taught vs, how to answer that particular. For whatsoeuer you found in the Treatie betwene vs and Luc'atius, to your owne disadvantage, you call it vpon your Consuls presumption; as promising those things, for which he had no warrant from the Senate and People of Rome. If then it bee lawfull for the Romans, to disauow the actions of their Consuls and Commanders, concluding any thing without punctuall and precise warrant; the same libertie may we also assume, and hold our selues no way bound in honour, to performe those bargaines, which Asdrubal hath made for vs, without our commandement and consent.

This was an impertinent answer, and little better than a meere cauill. For Luc'atius the Consul, in his Treatie of peace with the Carthaginians, had expressly referred the allowance thereof to the people of Rome. It had bene therefore much better, to haue dealt plainly; and to haue alleged, That after this League was made, and confirmed on both parts, it was broken by the Romans, in robbing the Carthaginians of the Isle of Sardinia, and withall of twelue hundred talents: which perjurie the state of Carthage, being now growne able, would reuenge with open warre. As for the Saguntines; it little skilled that the Romans had admitted them into confederacie, and forthwith inserted their names into the Treatie of peace with Asdrubal: seeing that the Treatie with Asdrubal, and all other businesse betwene Rome and Carthage, following the violence and breach of peace, in taking away Sardinia, were no better than Roman injuries; as implying this commination, Doe what power wee require, else will wee make warre, without regard of our oath, which we have already broken.

But this the Carthaginians did not allege, forgetting, in heat of contention (as Polybius takes it) the best of their Plea. Yet since Lince himselfe doth remember and acknowledge, that the taking of Sardinia from the Carthaginians, did inflame the spirit of Amilcar with desire of reuenge: we may reasonably thinke, that the mention of this iniurie was omitted, not so much vpon forgetfulness, as for that it was not thought convenient, by ripping vp such ancient matter of quarrell, to lewe that the warre, now towards, had long bene thought vpon, and like to be made with extraordinary force; in other manner than heretofore. In conclusion, the Carthaginian Senate moued the Roman Embassadors, to deliuer vnto them in plaine termes the purposes of those that sent them, and the work of that, which they had long determined against them: as for the Saguntines, and the confining of their Armies within Iberus; those were but their pretences. Whereupon Q. Fabius gathering vp the skirt of his Gowne, as if somewhat had bene laid in the hollow thereof, made this short reply: I haue here (quoth he) in my Gowne-kirt both Peace and Warre: make you (my Masters of the Senate) election of these two, which of them you like best, and purpose to embrace. Hereat all cryed out at once; Each which of them you your selfe haue a fancie to offer vs. Marrie then (quoth Fabius) take the Warre, and shure it among you. Which all the Assembly willingly accepted.

This was plaine dealing. To wrangle about pretences, when each part had resolved to make warre, it was merely frivolous. For all these disputes of breach of peace, haue euer bene maintayned by the partie vnwilling, or vnable to sustaine the warre. The rustie sword, and the emptie purse, doe alwaies pleade performance of covenants. There haue bene few Kings or States in the World, that haue otherwise vnderstood the obligation of a Treatie, than with the condition of their owne advantage: and commonly (seeing peace betweene ambitious Princes, and States, is but a kinde of breathing) the best-advised haue rather begunne with the sword, than with the trumpet. So dealt the Arragonis with the French in Naples; Nemro the second, of France, with the Imperialls, when he wrote to Brisac, to surpris as many places as he could, ere the warre brake out; Don Iohn, with the Netherlands; and Philip the second, of Spaine, with the English, when in the great Imbarge he tooke all our Ships and goods in his Ports.

But Hannibal, besides the present strength of Carthage, and the common feeling of injuries recieued from their enemies, had another private and hereditarie desire, that violently carried him against the Romans. His father Amilcar, at what time he did sacrifice, being readie to take his iourne into Spaine, had solemnly bound him by oath, to pursue them with immortall hatred, and to worke them all possible mischief, as soone as he should be a man, and able. Hannibal was then about nine years old, when his father caused him to lay his hand vpon the Altar, and make this vow: so that it was no meruaile, if the impression were strong in him.

That it is inhumane, to bequeath hatred in this sort, as it were by Legacie, it cannot be denied. Yet for mine owne part, I doe not much doubt, but that some of those Kings, with whom we are now in peace, haue recieued the like charge from their Predecessors, that as soone as their coffers shall be full, they shall declare themselves enemies to the people of England.

§. II.

§. II.

His iourne into Italie.

Arre being thus proclaimed, Hannibal resolved, not to put vp his sword, which hee had drawne against the Saguntines, vntill hee had therewith opened his passage vnto the gates of Rome. So began the second Punicke Warre; second to none, that euer the Senate and People of Rome sustained. Hannibal wintred at Carthage; where he licensed his Spanishe Souldiers to visit their friends, and refresh themselves againe the Spring. In the meane while he gave instructions to his brother Asdrubal, for the gouernement of Spaine in his absence. Hee also tooke order, to send a great many troupes of Spaniards into Africk, to equall the numbers of Africans formerly drawne thence into Spaine; to the end, that so the one Nation might remaine as pledges and gages for the other. Of the Spaniards, he transported into Africk thirteen thousand, eight hundred, and fiftie four, and twelue hundred horse; also eight hundred slingers of the Maleares. Besides these, he selected foure thousand foot, all young men, and of qualitie, out of the best Cities of Spaine; which he appointed to be garrisoned in Carthage it selfe, not so much in regard of their forces, as that they might serue for hostages: for among those foure thousand, the best of the Spanishe Citizens, and those that swayned most in their feuerall States, had their Sonnes or Kinsmen. Hee also left with his brother, to guard the coast and Ports, fiftie and seuen Gallies; whereof thirtie seuen were presently armed, and appointed for the warre. Of Africans, and other Nations strangers, he left with him about twelue thousand foot, and two thousand horse, besides one and twentie Elephants.

Having in this fort taken order for the defence of Spaine and Africk; he sent Discoverers before him, to view the passages of the Pyrenean Mountains, and of the Alpes. He also sent Embassadors to the Mountainers of the Pyrenes, and to the Gauls, to obtaine a quiet passage: that he might bring his Armie entire into Italie, and not be compelled to diminish his forces, by any warre in the way, till he came to encounter the Romans. His Embassadors, and Discoverers, being returned with good satisfaction; in the beginning of the Spring, he past over the Riuer of Iberus, with an Armie consisting of fourescore and ten thousand foot, and twelue thousand horse. All those parts of Spaine, into which he had not entred before, hee now subdued: and appointed Hanno (not that old enemy of his house, who fate ill at Carthage): to gouerne Spaine on the East side of Iberus; to whom he left an Armie of ten thousand foot, and one thousand horse. Being arrived at the borders of Spaine, some of his Spanishe Souldiers returned home, without asking leave: which that others might not also doe, or attempt, he courteously dismisshd many more, that seemed willing to be gone. Hereby it came to passe, that the iourne seemed the lesse tedious vnto those that accompanied him; as being not enforced by compulsion. With the rest of his armie, consisting now but of fiftie thousand foot, and nine thousand horse, he past the Pyrenes and entred into Gaul. He found the Gauls that bordered vpon Spaine, readie in Armes, to forbid his entrance into their Countrie: but wonne them, with gentle speech, and rich presents that he bestowed vnto their Leaders, to fauour his Expedition. So without any molestation, hee came to the bankes of Rhodanus; where dwelt, on each side of the Riuer, a people called Vales. These were vnacquainted with the cause of his coming; and therefore sought to keepe him from passing ouer the water. But he was greatly afflicted by some of those Gauls, that inhabited on the West side of Rhodanus, to wit, by those of Tunnets and Lionnois. For although many of them had transported themselves and their goods, into the Countrie of Danphline, thinking to defend the further bankes against him; yet such as remained, being desirous to see their Countrie of so many ill guests, were better pleased to haue their Countymen beaten, which had abandoned them, than to haue their owne store of corne and cattails wasted, by the long stay of so great an Armie, as lay vpon them. For which reason, they helped him to make boates; informed him of another more easie passage, higher vp the Riuer; and lent him guides. When the vessels for transportation of his Armie were in readinesse; he sent Hanno, the sonne of Bomilcar, vp the Riuer: himselfe in the meane while making countenance to enter the Foord below. The end of this labour was: that Hanno charging the Gauls vnawares vpon their owne side, and Hannibal, at the same time, passing the Riuer in their faces, the further banke was wonne, though with some difficultie; and the enemies disperfed. Yet was hee greatly troubled in conveying ouer his Elephants; who meruailously feared the water. He was therefore driuen to make rafles of trees, and couer them with earth and turfe; whereof hee fastened one to each banke, that might serue as a bridge, to and from another, of the same fort, but loose, vpon which the beasts were towed ouer.

Hauiing past this first brunt, and ouer-come both the rage of the Riuer, and of those that defended it, hee was visited by the Princes of the Gauls Cisalpine, that inhabited Piemont and Chilun, who lately had revolted from the Romans. These informed him of the passages of the Alpes, that they were not so difficult, as common report made them; and from these he received guides, with many other encouragements. All which notwithstanding; hee found himselfe extremely incumbered by the Sacouians: and lost, both of his carriages, and of his Carthaginians, more than willingly he would, or had formerly thought that he should. For he was twice mainly assailed by them, before he could recouer the plaine Countries on the other side. And whereas this iourne ouer the Mountaines cost him fiftene dayes traualle, he was euery day, more or lesse, not only charged by those Mountainers, but withall, extremely beaten with grievous weather and snow: it being in the beginning of Winter, when hee beganne, and ouer-came this passage. But the faire and fertile Plainnes, which were now readie to receiue them; with the assistance and conduct of the Cisalpine Gauls, who by their proper forces had so often invaded the Roman Territorie; gaue them great comfort, and encouragement to goe on: hauing nothing else of difficultie remayning, but that which from the beginning they made accompt to ouer-come, by their proper valour and resolution; namely the Roman Armies, and resistance.

§. III.

*How the Romans in Spaine solicited the Spaniards and Gauls to take their part.
The rebellion of the Cisalpine Gauls against the Romans.*

THe Countries of Spaine and Gaul, through which the Carthaginians marched this farre, had beene solicited before, by the same Roman Embassadors, who had denounced the warre at Carthage. These as they were instructed by the Senate, tooke Spaine in their way homeward from Carthage, with a purpose to draw into the Roman Alliance, as many of the Cities and Princes as they could; at least, to dissuade them from contracting any friendship with the Carthaginians. The first which they attempted, were the Volcians, a people in Spaine; from whom, in open assembly, they received by one that spake for the rest, this vncomfortable answer. With what face (saith he) can yee Romans perswade vs to vallow your Alliance, or to preterre it before the friendship of the Carthaginians; seeing we are taught by the example of the Saguntines, to be more wise, than so? For they, relying on your faith, and promised assistance, haue beene utterly rooted out, and destroyed by the Carthaginians; whom they

they might else haue held their assured friends, and good neighbours, as we, and other the people of Spaine haue found them. Yee may therefore be gone, with this resolution from vs, That for our parts (and so I thinke, I may answer for the rest of our Countymen) the Romans henceforth are not to expect any kindnesse at our handes: who are resolved, neuer to make accompt of their protection, nor amitie. From the Volcians, the Embassadors tooke their way towards the Gauls; vying their best arguments to perswade them, not to suffer the Carthaginians to passe into Italie, through their Territorie: and withall greatly glorifying themselves, their strength, and large Dominion. But the Gauls laugh't them to scorn, and had hardly the patience, to heare them speake. For shall we (saide one of their Princes) by resisting Hannibal's passage into Italie, entertaine a warre which is not meant to be made against vs? Shall we hold the warre among our selves, and in our owne Territorie, by force, which marcheth with a speedie pace from vs, towards our ancient enemies? Haue the Romans defcured so well of vs, and the Carthaginians so ill, that wee should set fire on our owne houses, to saue theirs from burning? No, wee know it well, that the Romans haue already forced some Nations of ours, out of their proper Territorie and inheritance; and constrained others, as free as themselves, to pay them tribute. We will not therefore make the Carthaginians, our enemies; who haue no way as yet offended vs, nor we them.

With this vnpleasing answer the Embassadors returned home: carrying no good newes, of friends likely to helpe them; but rather some assurance from the people of Messina, which were Confederates with Rome, that the Gauls were determined to take part with their enemy. Of this inclination, the Cisalpine Gauls gaue halfe proofe. For when the newes was brought into Italie, that the Carthaginians had passed Iberus, and were on the way towards Rome; this alone sufficed to stirre vp the Boj, and Insubrians, against the Romans. These people were lately offended at the plantation of new Roman Colonies, at Cremona, and Placentia, within their Territories. Relying therefore vpon the Carthaginian succour, which they supposed to be now at hand; they laid aside all regard of those hostages, which they had giuen to the Romans, and fell vpon the new Colonies. The Townes it seemes that they could not winne; for Hannibal shortly after failed to get them. But they forced the Roman Commissioners, (who belike were abroad in the Countie) to flie to Modena: where they beleaged them. The siege of Modena had continued some small time; when the Gauls, hauing little skill in assailing Cities, waxed wearie, and seemed desirous to haue peace, and to come to some good accord with the Romans. This they did of purpose, to draw on some meeting; that they might therein lay hand vpon the Roman Deputies, thereby to redeeme their hostages, in way of exchange. And it fell out, in part, according to their wish. For the Romans sent out Embassadors to treat with them, and to conclude a peace; whom they detayned. Attilius the 40 Pretor, who lay in these quarters with an Armie, hearing this outrage; marched in all haste to the reliefe of the beleaged. But the Gauls, hauing laid a strong ambush in a wood ioyning to the way, fell vpon the Pretor so opportunely as he was utterly ouerthrowne, and all his followers left dead in the place; a few excepted, that recovered, by fast running, a little village, but defensible, vpon the Riuer of Po. When this was heard at Rome, C. Attilius, another of the Pretors, was hastily sent, to relieue the beleaged, with one Legion, and fift thousand of the Roman associates: which forces were taken out of the Consuls Armie, and supplied by a new leuie

As the Gauls were too rash and hallic: so were the Romans too slow, and indeede too ill-advised, in the beginning of this warre. They were not perswaded, that Carthage, which had almost cruelly endured so many indignities, in time of the late peace; would be so braue and courageous on the sudden, as to attempt the conquest of Italie itselfe. Wherefore they appointed one of their Consuls, to make warre in Spaine, the other in Affrick: resting secure of all danger at home. Titus Sempronius tooke his way toward Affrick, with an hundred and thre score Quinquagenses, or Gal-lies, of due to an Oare; which preparation may seeme to threaten euen the Citie of Carthage, to which it shall not come neare. P. Cornelius Scipio, the other Consul, made all possible haste, by the way of Genoa, into Prouince; and vfed such diligence, hauing the winde also fauourable, as in fixe dayes he recovered Mafilia. There hee was aduertised, of Hannibal his hauing passed the Riuer of Rhodanus; whom hee thought to haue found busie yet awhile in Spaine. Hannibal had also newes of the Consuls arriuall; whereof he was neither glad, nor forrie; as not meaning to haue to doe with him. Each of them sent forth Scouts, to discouer the others number and doings: Hannibal, about fixe hundred Numidians; Scipio, three hundred of his better appointed Roman horse. These met and fought, and the Numidians were to beate: yet could not the Romans greatly bragge, hauing slaine only two hundred, and lost of their owne, one hundred and fortie. But when Scipio drew neare, to haue met with the Carthaginians; he found, that they were gone three dayes before; and that (as hee then found assuredly true) with an intent to looke vpon the walls of Rome. This interrupted his intended voiage into Spaine. Neuertheless hee sent a way thither his brother Cn. Cornelius Scipio, with the greatest part of his Fleet and Armie, to trie what might bee done against Afdrubal, and the other Carthaginian Lieutenants in that Countrie. He himselfe, taking with him a few choice bands, returned by Sea to Pisys, and so passing through Tuscane into Lumbardie, drew together the broken troups of Manlius and Atilius, that lately had bene beate by the 20 Gauls: with which forces he made head against the enimie, thinking to finde him ouer-laboured, with trauaile of his painefull iourne.

§. IIII.

SCIPIO the Roman Consul over-come by HANNIBAL at Ticinum. Both of the Roman Consuls beate by HANNIBAL, in a great battaile at Trebia.

Hue moneths Hannibal had spent in his tedious iourne from Carthage: na; what great mulster he could make, when hee had passed the Alpes, it is not easily found. Some reckon his foot at an hundred thousand, and his horse at twentie thousand; others report them to haue bene only twentie thousand foot, and fixe hundred horse. Hannibal himselfe, in his Monument which he raised, in the Temple of Iuno Lacinia, agreeth with the latter summe. Yet the Gauls, Ligurians, and others that joyined with him, are likely to haue mightily increased his Armie, in short space. But when he marched Eastward from the banks of Rhodanus, he had with him eight and thirtie thousand foot, and eight thousand horse; of which, all saue those remembered by himselfe in 40 the Inscription of his Altar in Iuno's Temple, are like to haue perished, by diseases, enemies, Riuers, and Mountaynes; which mischiefs had deuoured, each, their severall shares.

Hauing newly passed the Alpes, and scarce refreshed his wearied Armie in the Countrie of Piemont; he sought to winne the friendship of the Taurini, wholy next in his way. But the Taurini held warre at that time with the Insubrians, which were his good friends, and refused (perhappes for the same cause) his amitie. Wherefore he assaulted their Towne; and wannet by force in three dayes. Their spoile serued well to beateen his Armie; and their calamitie, to terrifie the Neighbour places. So the Gauls, without more adoe, fell vnto his side: many for feare, many 50 for good-will, according to their former inclination. This disposition ranne through the whole Countrie: which joyned, or was all in a readinesse to joyne, with the Carthaginians; when the newes of Scipio the Consul his arriuall, made some to be more aduised, than the rest. The name of the Romans was terrible in those quarters; what was in the Carthaginians, experience had not yet laid open. Since therefore the Roman Consul was already gotten through the most defensible passages, ere any speech had bene heard of his approach: many fate it ill, for very feare, who else would haue concluded a League with these new-come friends; and some, for greater feare, offered their seruice against the Carthaginians, whom neuertheless they willed well to speede.

This wavering affection of the Prouince, whereinto they were entred, made the two Generals baiten to the triall of a battaile. Their meeting was at Ticinum, now called Pavia; where each of them wondered at the others great expedition: Hannibal thinking it strange, that the Consul, whom hee had left behinde him on the other side of the Alpes, could meet him in the face, before hee had well warmed himselfe in the Plaines; Scipio admiring the strange adventure of passing those Mountaynes, and the great spirit of his Enemie. Neither were the Senate at Rome little amazed, at Hannibals successe, and sudden arriuall. Wherefore they dispatched a Messenger in all haste vnto Sepronius, the other Consul, that was then in Medea, giuing him to vnderstand hercof: and letting him further know, that whereas hee had bene drected to make the warre in Africa, it was now their pleasure that hee should forsake to prosecute any such attempt, but that hee should returne the Armie vnder his charge, with all possible speede, to faue Italie selfe. According to this order, 20 Sepronius sent off his Fleet from Lilybeum; with direction to land the Arme at Armenia, a Port Towne not farre from Raenna: quite another way from Carthage, whither he was making haste. In the meane while, Scipio and Hannibal were come so neare, that light they must ere they could part asunder. Hercupon, both of them prepared the minds of their Souldiers, by the best arguments they had: vnto which Hannibal added the Rhetorick of a present example, that he shewed vpon certaine prisoners of the Savoyans, which hee brought along with him, fitted for the purpose, into Italie. For these, hauing bene no lesse miserably fettered and chained, than sparingly fed; and withall so often scourged on their naked bodies, as nothing was more in their desire, than to be deliuered from their miseries by any kinde of prefert 30 death, were brought into the middle of the Armie: where it was openly demanded, which of them would fight hand to hand with some other of his Companion, till the one of them were slaine; with condition, being the Victor, to recueve his libertie, and some small reward. This was no sooner propounded, than all of them together accepted the offer. Then did Hannibal cause lotte, to be call, which of them should enter the List, with such weapons, as the Chieftaines of the Gauls were wont to vse in single combats. Euerie one of these vnhappie men withed, that his owne lot might speede; whereby it should at least be his good fortune, to end his miseries by death, if not to get a reward by victorie. That couple whose good hap was to be chofen, fought resolutely: as rather desiring, than fearing death; and hauing 40 none other hope, than in vanquishing. Thus were some few couples matched, it skilled not how equally: for all these poore creatures were willing, vpon whatsoever vncertain termes, to ridde themselves out of slavery. The same affection that was in these Combatants, and in their fellows which beheld them; wrought also vpon the Carthaginians, for whom the spectacle was ordayned. For they deemed happie, not onely him, that by winning the victorie had gotten his libertie, together with an horse and armour: but euen him also, who being slaine in fight had escaped that miserable condition, vnto which his Companions were returned. Their Generall perceiving what impression this dumbe shew had wrought in them; beganne to admonish them of their owne condition. Speaking to this effect. That hee had laid before them an example of their owne estates: seeing the time was at hand, wherein they were all to runne the same fortune, that these slaves had done; all to liue victorious and rich; or all to die, or (which these prisoners esteemed farre more grievous) to liue in a perpetuall slavery: That none of them all, in whom was common sense, could promise to himselfe any hope of life by flight; since the Mountaines, the Ri- 50 uers, uers, the great distance from their owne Countries, and the pursuit of mercelless Enemies, mult needes retraceh all such impotent imaginations. He therefore praised them to remember, that they, who had euen now praised the fortune both of the Victior, and of the vanquished, would make it their owne case; seeing there was neuer any in the world, appointed with such a resolution, that had euer bene broken, or beaten by their enemies. On the contrarie, he told them, that the Romans, who were to fight vpon their owne soile, and in view of their owne Townes; who knew as many waies to saue themselves by flight, as they had bodies of men to fight withall, could no way entertaine such a resolution as theirs: seeing the same necessity, (to which nothing seemes impossible) did no way presse them, or constrain them. In this fort did Hannibal, that there was no mean, betwene Victorie and Death, encourage his Companions. For (saith a great Captaine of France) la comolite de la retraite aduance la suite; The commoditie of a retreat, doth greatly aduance a flat running away.

Scipio, on the other side, said that he had giuen order for the laying of a bridge ouer the R.uer of Tisus; did not neglect to vse the best arguments and reasons hee could, to encourage the Armie helied: putting them in minde of the great conquests and victories of their Aneitors; against how many Nations they had preuailed; and ouer how many Princes, their Enemies, they had triumphed. As for this Armie commanded by Hannibal, although it were enough to tell them, that it was no better than of Carthaginians, whom in their late waere they had so often beaten, by Land and Sea; yet he prayed them withall to consider, that at this time it was not only so diminished in numbers, as it rather seemed a troupe of Brigants and Thebes, than an Armie liketo encounter the Romans; but so weather-beaten, and haued, as neither the men, nor horses, had strength or courage to sustaine the first charge that should be giuen vpon them. Nay (said he) yee your selues may make iudgement what daring they haue now remayning, after so many traualles and miseries; seeing when they were in their best strength, after they had past the hoanes, their horse-men were not only beaten by ours, and driuen back to the very Trenches of their Campe, but Hannibal himselfe, tearing our approach, ranne head long towards the Alpes: thinking it a little dishonour, to die there by frost, famine, and precipitation, than by the sharpe swordes of the Romans, which had so often cut downe his people, both in Africa, and in Stail.

It was not long after this, ere the two Generalls met: each being farre aduanced before the profile of his Armie, with his Horse; and the Romans hauing also with him some light armed foot, to view the ground, and the enemies countenance. When they discouered the approach one of the other; Scipio sent before him his horsemen of the Gales, to beginne the night, and bestowing his Darters in the void ground betwene their troups, to assist them: himselfe with his Roman men at armes, following softly in good order. The Gauls (whether desirous to trie the mettall of the Carthaginians, or hoping thereby to get fauour of the Romans) behaued themselves courageously, and were as courageously opposed. Yet their foot that should haue aided them, thranke at the first brunt, or rather fled cowardly away, without casting a Dart; for feare of being troden downe by the enemies horse. This notwithstanding the Gauls maintayned the fight, and did more hurt than they received: as presuming that they were well backt. Neither was the Consul vnmindfull to relieue them: their hardinesse deseruing his aide; and the hallic flight of those that should haue stood by them, admonishing him that it was needfull. Wherefore hee aduanced himselfe so farre, that he received a dangerous wound; and had bene left in the place, if his sonne (afterward furnamed Africanus) had not brought him off: though others giue the honour of this rescue, to a Ligurian slaue. Whilst the Romans were builed in helping their Consul; an vnexpected storme came drining at their backs, and made them looke about how to helpe themselves. Hannibal had appointed his Nimidian light horse, to giue vpon the Romans in flanke, and to compasse them about, whilst he with his men at armes sustained their charge, and met them in the face. The Nimidians performed this very well: cutting in peeces the scattered foot, that ranne away at the first encounter; and then falling on the backs of those, whose lookes were fastened vpon Hannibal and Scipio. By this impression, the Romans were thrust together, and rowed: so that they all betooke them to their speede, and left vnto their enemies the honour of the day.

When Scipio saw his horse thus beaten, and the rest of his Armie thereby greatly discouraged; he thought it a point of wisdom, hauing lost so many of his Fleet vpon the first puffe of winde, to take Port with the rest, before the extremest of the tempest ouer-tooke him. For he saw by the lowering morning, what manner of day it was like to proue. Therefore his battaile of foot being yet vnbroken, hee in a manner stole the retreat; and recovered the bridge ouer Tisus, which he had formerly build. But notwithstanding all the haste that he made, hee left fixe hundred of his Reare behinde him: who were the last that should haue passed, and staid to breake the bridge. Herein he followed this rule of a good man of waere, Sceriatamen quondam, dubium videatur, totam miles arripit fugam: fuga enim aliquando laus: anda: which must be vnderstood in this sort, If a General of an Armie, by some vnprosperous beginnings doubts the successe; or findes this Armie fearefull or wauering; it is more profitable to scale a safe retreat, than to abide the vncertaine event of battail.

It was two dayes after, ere Hannibal could passe the R.uer; Scipio the whilst refreshing his men, and caling himselfe of his wound in Placentia. But as soone as Hannibal presented his Armie before the Towne, offering battaile to the Romans, who durst not accept it, nor issue forth of their campe; the Gauls, that hitherto had followed Scipio for feare, gathered out of his feare courage to forsake him. They thought that now the long-desired time was come, in which better Chieftaines and Souldiers, than Anerastus, Britomarus, and the Geslates, were come to helpe them: if they had the hearts to helpe themselves. Wherefore the same night they fell vpon the Roman campe; wounded and slew many; especially of those guards that kept watch at the gate; with whose heads in their hands, they fled ouer to the Carthaginians, and presented their seruice. Hannibal receiued them exceeding courteously, and dismist them to their owne places: as men likely to bee of more vse to him, in perswading the rest of their Nation to become his Confederates, than in any other seruice at the present.

About the fourth watch of the night following, the Consul stole a retreat, as hee had done before; but not with the like ease and securitie. Hannibal had a good eye vpon him; and ere he could get farre, sent the Nimidians after him: following himselfe with all his Armie. That night the Romans had received a great blow, if the Nimidians, greedie of spoile, had not staid to ransack their campe; and thereby giuen time to all, saue some few in Reare, that were slaue or taken, to passe the R.uer of Trebia, and saue themselves. Scipio, being both vnable to traualle by reason of his wound, and withall finding it expedient to attend the coming of his fellow-Consul; incamped himselfe strongly vpon the banks of Trebia. Necessitie required that he should so doe; yet this diminished his reputation. For euery day, more and more of the Gauls fell to the Carthaginian side, among whom came in the Bois, that brought with them the Roman Comissioners, which they had taken in the late Insurrection. They had hitherto kept them as Pledges, to redeme their owne Hostages: but now they deliuer them vp to Hannibal, as tokens and pledges of their affections towards him; by whose helpe they conceiued better hope of recouering their owne men and lands. In the meane while, Hannibal, being in great scarcitie of victualles, attempted the taking of Clautidnum, a Towne wherein the Romans had laid vp all their store and munition. But there needed no force; a Brundisian, whom the Romans had trusted with keeping it, sold it for a little monie.

The newes of these disasters, brought to Rome, filled the Senate and People, rather ther with a desire of halting reuenge, than any great sorrow for their losse received; seeing that, in a manner, all their foot, wherein their strength and hope consisted, were as yet entire. They therefore halted away Sempronius, that was newly arrived, towards Ariminum, where the Armie, by him sent out of Sicily, awaited his coming. He therefore halted thither; and from thence he marched speedily towards his Colleague: who attended him vpon the banks of Trebia. Both the Armies being joyned in one, the Consuls deuised about that which remained to be done: Sempronius receiving from Scipio the relation of what had passed since Hannibals arrival; the fortune of the late fight; and by what error or misadventure the Romans were therein killed: which Scipio chiefly laid on the revolt and treason of the Gauls.

Sempronius, hauing received from Scipio the state of the affaires in those parts; sought by all means to trie his fortune with Hannibal, before Scipio were recovered of his wounds, that thereby he might purchase to himselfe the sole glorie of the victorie, which he had already, in his imagination, certainly obtained. He also feared the election of the new Consuls: his owne time being well-near expired. But Scipio perfwaded the contrary; objecting the vnskillfulness of the new-come Souldiers: and withall gaue him good reason, to assure him, that the Gauls, naturally vnconstant, were vpon terms of abandoning the partie of the Carthaginians; those of them inhabiting betwene the Riuer of Trebia, and Po, being already revolted. Sempronius knew all this as well as Scipio: but being both guided and blinded by his ambition, he made haste to finde out the dishonour, which he might otherwise easily haue auoided. This resolution of Sempronius was exceeding pleasing to Hannibal, who feared nothing so much as delay and losse of time. For the strength of his Armie, consisting in strangers, to wit, in Spaniards and Gauls; he no lesse feared the change of affection in the one, than the impatiencie of the other: who being farre from their owne home, had many passions mouing them to turne their faces towards it. To further the desire of Sempronius, it fell out so, that about the same time, the Gauls inhabiting neare vnto Trebia, complained of injuries done by the Carthaginians. They did not supply Hannibal with necessaries, as hee supposed that they might haue done; although hee daily reprehended their negligence, telling them, that for their sakes, and to let them at libertie, hee had undertaken this Expedition. Seeing therefore how little they regarded his wordes, he was bold to be his owne Caruer; and tooke from them by force, as much as he needed of that which they had. Hereupon they flic to the Romans for helpe: and, to make their tale the better, say that this wrong is done them, because they refused to ioyne with Hannibal. Scipio cared not much for this: he suspected their fallhood, and was assured of their mutabilitie. But Sempronius affirmed, that it stood with the honour of Rome, to preserue the Confederates from suffering injurie: and that hereby might be won the friendship of all the Gauls. Therefore he sent out a thousand horse: which coming vnlooked for vpon Hannibal his forragers, and finding them heauie laden, cut many of them in peeces, and chased the rest euen into their owne campe. This indignitie made the Carthaginians fallie out against them: who caused them to retire faster than they came. Sempronius was readie to back his owne men; and repelled the enemies. Hannibal did the like. So that at length, all the Roman Armie was drawne forth; and a battaille readie to bee fought, if the Carthaginian had not refused it.

This victorie (for so the Consul would haue it called) made the Romans in generall delirious to trie the maine chance in open field: all the perfwasions of Scipio to the contrary notwithstanding. Of this disposition Hannibal was aduertised by the Gauls, his spies, that were in the Roman Campe. Therefore he bethought himselfe how to helpe forward the victorie, by adding some stratagem to his forces. He found in the hollow of a water-courfe, ouer-grown with high reede, a fit trench trench to couer an ambush. Thereinto he callt his brother Mago, with a thousand choice horse, and as many foot. The rest of his Armie, after they had well warmed, and well fed themselves, in their campe, he led into the field, and marched towards the Consul. Early in the morning, he had sent out Trebia some companies of African light horse: to braue the enemy, and draw him forth to a bad dinner, ere he had broken his fast. Sempronius was readie to take any opportunity to fight: and therefore not only issued out of his campe, but forded the Riuer of Trebia, in a most cold and miserable day; his foot being wet almost to the arme-holes: which, together with the want of food, did so enfeeble and coole their courages, as they wanted force to handle the armie they bore. Strong they were in foot, as well of their owne Nation, as of the Latines: hauing of the one sixtience, of the other, twentie thousand. The masse of these they ranged in a grosse Battalion, guarded on the flanks with three thousand horse; thrusting their right armed, and Dangers, into the troops in the head of the rest, in the nature of a Vanguard. The Carthaginian numbers of foot, were in a manner equal to their enemies, in horse, they had by farre the better, both in number and goodnesse. When therefore the Roman horse, ranged on the flanks of their foot, were broken by the Numidians; when their foot were charged both in front and flanke, by the Spaniards, Gauls, and Elephants; when finally the whole Armie was vnawares preit in the Rear, by Mago and his two thousand, that rose out of their place of ambush: then fell the Romans, by heapes, vnder the enemies swordes; and being beaten downe, as well fighting in disorder, as flying towards the Riuer, by the horse-men that pursued them, there escaped no more of fixe and thirtie thousand, than ten thousand of all sorts, Horse and Foot.

Three great errors Sempronius committed, of which euery one deserued to be recompenced with the losse that followed. The first was, that hee fought with Hannibal in a Champaine, being by farre inferiour in horse, and withall thereby subject to the African Elephants, which in inclosed or vn-even grounds, and woodlands, would haue bene of no vse. His second error was, that he made no discourse of the place vpon which he fought; whereby hee was grossly over-reacht, and inflamed, by the ambush which Hannibal had laid for him. The third was, that he drechit his foot-men with empty stomachs, in the Riuer of Trebia, euen in a most cold and frostie day, whereby in effect they lost the vse of their limbs. For as one saith well; There is nothing more inconuenient and perillous, than to present an Armie, tyred with traualle, to an enemy fresh and fed; since where the strength of body faileth, the generositie of minde is but an vnprofitable vapour.

The broken remainder of the Roman Armie, was collected by Scipio, who got therewith into Placentia stealing away the same night, which was exceeding raynic, from the Carthaginians; who either perceived him not, because of the showers; or would not perceiue him, because they were ouer-wearied. Sempronius escaped with extreme danger; flying through the Countie that was ouer-runne by the enemies horse. Hee was attended by more, than were requisite in a secret flight; yet by fewer, than could haue made resistance, if the enemy had met with him. Neuertheless hee got away, and came to Rome, where hee did his office in choosing new Consuls for the yeare following: and then returned into his Prouince, with a fresh supply against Hannibal.

Flaminius the Roman Consul slaine; and his Armie destroyed

THe Winter growing on apace, was very sharpe, and vsnit for seruice: to the great contentment of the Romans, who being not able to keepe 10 the field, lay warme in Placentia, and Cremona. Yet Hannibal did not suffer them to rest very quiet: but vexed them with continuall alarmes; assailing diuers places; taking some; beating the Gaules their adherents; and winning the Ligurians to his partie, who presented him, in token of their faithfull loue, with two Roman Quaestors or Treasurers, two Colonels, and fise Gentlemen the Sonnes of Senatours, which they had intercepted. These, and in generall all such Prisoners as he had of the Romans, he held in freight places, loden with yrons, and miserably fed: those of their followers hee not only well entreated, but sent them to their Countries without ranfome; with this protestation, That he therefore vnderooke the Warre in Italie, to free them from the oppression of the Romans. By these meanes hee hoped, and not in vaine, to draw 20 many of them to his partie and assistance. But the Gaules were not capable of such persuasions: They stood in feare, lest hee should make their Countrie the seat of the Warre, and perhaps take it from them. They were also more grieved than reason willed them, at his feeding vpon them, and waisting their Territorie. Wherefore some of them conspired against his life; others admonished him of the danger: and these that gaue him the aduice, were readie soone after to practise against him; but were in like sort detected. He was therefore glad to vse Perwigs of haire, and false beards of diuers colours, to the end that he might not be descried, nor known, 30 and false that should vndertake to make him away. Faine hee would haue passed the Apennines, vpon the first appearance of Spring; but was compelled by the violence of weather, to tarrie among the Gaules, till hee had scene more Swallows than one. At length, when the yeare was somewhat better opened, he resolved to take his leaue of these giddie Companions, and bring the warre nearer to the gates of Rome. So away he went, hauing his Armie greatly increased with Ligurians and Gaules; more seruicable friends abroad, than in their owne Countrie. That the passage of the Apennine Mountaines was troublesome, I hold it needlesse to make any doubt. Yet since the Roman Armies found no memorable impediment, in their marches that way: the great vexation which fell vpon Hannibal, when hee was traouling through and ouer them, ought in reason to be imputed rather to the extremity of Winter, that makes all wayes foule, than to any intolerable difficultie in that iourne. Neuertheless to auoid the length of way, together with the resistance and fortifications, which may not improbably be thought to haue bene erected vpon the ordinarie passages towards Rome: he chose at this time, though it were with much trouble, to trauaile through the Fennes and rotten grounds of 40 Tuscanie. In those Marishes and bogges, he lost all his Elephants, saue one, together with the vse of one of his eyes; by the moistnesse of the aire, and by lodging on the cold ground, and wading through deepe mire and water. In briefe, after hee had with much adoe recovered the firme and fertile Plaines; he lodged at Arretium: where hee somewhat refreshed his wearied followers, and heard newes of the 50 Roman Consuls.

C. Flaminius, and Cn. Seruius had of late bene chosen Consuls for this yeare: Seruius, a tractable man, and wholly gouerned by aduice of the Senate; Flaminius, an an hot-headed popular Orator; who hauing once bene robbed (as hee thought) of his Consulship, by a deuice of the Senatours, was afraid to be serued so againe, vnlesse hee quickly finished the warre. This jealous Consul thought it not best for him to be at Rome, when he entered into his Office, lest his aduerfaries, by faying some religious impediments, should detain him within the Cities, or finde other businesse for him at home, to disappoint him of the honour, that hee hoped to get in the Warre. Wherefore he departed secretly out of the Towne; and meant to take possession of his Office, when the day came, at Arminum: The Fathers (so the Senatours were called) highly displeased with this, reuoked him by Embassadors: but he neglected their injunction; and hasting to meet with the Carthaginians,ooke his way to Arretium, where he shortly found them.

The fierie disposition of this Consull promised vnto Hannibal great assurance of victorie. Therefore he provoked, with many indignities, the vehement nature of the Roman: hoping thereby to draw him vnto fight, C. Seruius came with the rest of the Armie. All this Countrie betwene Esula and Arretium, hee put to fire and sword, even vnder the Consuls nose; which was enough to make him furie; that would not haue litten still, though Hannibal had bene quiet. It is true, that a great Captayne of Brant hath said; Pays galleux est plus prompt a mesler Countree a dot thereby lost. But by this waste of the Countrie, Flaminius thought his owne honour 20 to be much impaired; and therefore aduanced towards the enemye. Many aduised him (which had inderde bene best) to haue patience awhile, and stay for his Colleague. But of this hee could not abide to heare: saying, that hee came not to defend Arretium, whilst the Carthaginians went burning downe all Italie before them, to the gates of Rome. Therefore heeooke horse, and commanded the Armie to march. It is reported as ominous, that one of their Enignes shooke so, fall in the ground, as it could not be plucked vp by the Enigne-bearer. Of this tale, whether true or false, Tullie makes a iest: saying, that the cowardly knaue did faintly pull at it (as going now to fight) hauing hardly pitched it into the carth. Neither was the answer of Flaminius (if it were true) disgreeceable hereto. For he commanded, that 30 it should be digged vp, if feare had made the hands too weak to lift it: asking with all; whether letters were not come from the Senate, to hinder his proceedings. Of this jealousie, both hee, and the Senate, that gaue him cause, are likely to repent.

All the Territorie of Cartena, as faine as to be Lake of Thrasymen, was on a light fire; which whilst the Consul thought to quench with his enemies blood, he pursued Hannibal so vnadvisedly, that he fell, with his whole Armie, into an ambush cunningly laid for him, betwene the Mountaines of Cartena, and the Lake. There was he charged vnawares, on all sides, (saue only where that great Lake of Parusia, permitted neither his enemies to come at him, nor him to flic from them) knowing 40 not which way to turne, or make resistance. So was hee linc in the place, accompanied with fiftene thousand dead carckasses of his Countreymen. About fixe thousand of his men, that had the Vanguard,ooke courage, as for the most part happens, out of desperation; and breaking through the enemies, that stood in their way, recovered the tops of the Mountaines. If these had returned, and given charge vpon the Carthaginian backe, it was thought that they might haue greatly amended, if not wholly altered, the fortune of the day. But that visidne of their feare, which, kindled by necessity, had wrought the effects of hardinesse; was well allwaged, when they ceased to despaiie, of sauing their liues by flight. They stood still, in a cold sweate, vpon the hill-top, hearing vnder them a terrible noise, but not discouering how things went, because of the great fogge that held all the morning. When it grew toward poone, the mize was cleared, and they might plainly discerne the lamentable slaughter of their fellowes. But they said not so lament it; for it was high time, they thought, to be gone, ere they were desfered; and attaching by 50

the enemies horse. This they should haue thought vpon sooner; since they had no minde to returne vnto the fight. For desired they were, and Maharbal sent after them; who ouer-tooke them by night in a village, which hee surrounded with his horse: and so they yielded the next day, rendering their armes, vpon his promise of their liues and liberties. This accord Hannibal refused to confirme; saying, that it was made by Maharbal, without sufficient warrant, as wanting his authoritie to make it good. Herein he taught them (yet little to his owne honour) what it was to keepe no faith: and fitted them with a trick of their owne. For if it were lawfull vnto the Romans, to alter couenants, or adde vnto them what they listed; if the Carthaginians must be faine to pay certaine hundreds, and yet more hundreds of talents, besides their first bargain; as also to renounce their interell in Sardinia, and beelimited in their Spanish Conquests, according to the good pleasure of the Romans, whose present aduantage is more ample, than the conditions of the late concluded peace: then can Hannibal bee as Roman, as themselves; and make them know, that peridioussesse gaineth no more in prosperitie, than it looeth in the change of fortune. Fifteene thousand Italian prisoners, or thereabout, hee had in his hands: of which all that were not Romans, he set free without ranfome; protesting, as he had done before, that it was for their sakes, and to free them and others from the Roman tyrannie, that he had vnderaken this warre. But the Romans he kept in streight prison, and in fetters, making them learne to eate hard meat. This was a good way, to breede in the people of Italie, if not a loss of Carthage, yet a contempt of Rome: as if this warre had not concerned the generall safetie, but only the preferring of her owne neck from the yoke of slauiery, which her ouer-strong enemies would thrust vpon her, in reuenge of her oppressions. But an ancient reputation, confirmed by successe of many ages, is not lost in one or two battailes. Wherefore more is to be done, ere the Carthaginians can get any Italian Partisans.

Presently after the battaile of Thrasymene, C. Centronius, with foure thousand Roman horse, drew neare vnto the Campe of Hannibal. Hee was sent from Ariminum, by Serulius the other Consul, to increase the strength of Flaminius: but coming too late, he increased only the misadventure. Maharbal was employed by Hannibal, to intercept this company; who finding them amazed with report which they had newly heard of the great ouerthrow, charged them, and brake them: and killing almost halfe of them, draue the rest vnto an high peece of ground, whence they came downe, and simply yielded to Carthage, the next day. Serulius himselfe was in the meane while skirmishing with the Claules; against whom hee had wrought no matter of importance, when the Romans were brought him, of his Colleagues ouerthrow and death in Hetruria; that made him hasten back to the defence of Rome.

In these passages, it is easie to discern the fruits of popular jealousie, which perswaded the Romans to the yearlie change of their Commanders in the wars; which greatly endangered, and retarded the growth of that Empire. Certaine it is, that all men are farre better taught by their owne errors, than by the examples of their fore-goes. Flaminius had heard, in what a trap Sempronius had beene taken but the yeare before, by this subtle Carthaginian; yet suffered he himselfe to be caught soon after in the same manner. He had also belike forgotten, how Sempronius, fearing to be preuented by a new Consul, and ambitious of the sole honour of beating Hannibal in battaile, without helpe of his companion Scipio, had beene rewarded with shame and losse: else would hee not, contrarie to all good aduice, haue beene so hasty to fight, before the arriuall of Serulius. If Sempronius had bene continued in his charge, it is probable that he would haue taken his companion with him the second time, and haue searched all suspected places, proper to haue shadowed an ambush: both which this new Consul Flaminius neglected. We may boldly avow it, that by being continued in his Government of France ten yeares, Cesar brought that mightie Nation, together with the Helvetians and many of the *German*s, vnder the Roman yoke; into which parts had there bene euery yeare a new Lieutenant sent, they would would hardly, if euer, haue bene subdued. For it is more than the best wit in the World can doe, to informe it selfe, within one yeares compasse, of the nature of a great Nation, of the Factions, of the Places, Riuers, and of all good helpes, whereby to prosecute a warre to the best effect. Our Princes haue commonly left their Deputies in Ireland three yeares; whence, by reason of the shortnesse of that their time, many of them haue returned as wife, as they went out; others haue profited more, and yet when they beganne but to know the first rudiments of Warre, and Government, fitting the Countrey, they haue bene called home, and new Apprentices sent in their places, to the great preiudice both of this and that Estate. But it hath euer bene the course of the World, rather to follow old errors, than to examine them: and of Princes and Gouvernours, to vp-hold their stordful ignorance, by the old examples and policie of other ages and people; though neither likeness of time, of occasion, or of any other circumstance, haue perswaded the imitation.

§. V I.

How Q. Fabius the Roman Dictator, sought to consume the force of Hannibal, by lingring warre. Minutius, the Master of the Horse, honoured and aduanced by the People, for bold and successfull attempting adventures rashly vpon Hannibal; and is like to persish with his Armie, but rescued by Fabius.

Reatly were the Romans amazed, at this their ill successe, and at the danger apparent; which threatened them in more terrible manner, than euer did warre, since Rome it selfe was taken. They were good Souldiers; and so little accustomed to receiue an ouerthrow; that when Pyrrhus had beaten them, once and againe, in open field, all Italie was strangely affected with his successe, and held him in admiration, as one that could worke wonders. But Pyrrhus his quarrell was not grounded vpon hate: hee only sought honour, and fought (as it were) vpon a brauerie; demeaning himselfe like a courteous enemy. This Carthaginian detected the whole Roman name; against which he burned with desire of reuenge. Ticinum, Trebia, and Thrasymene, witnessed his purpose, and his abilitie. Which to withstand, they fled vnto a remedie that had long bene out of vse, and created a Dictator. The Dictators power was greater than the Consuls, and scarcely subject vnto controll of the whole Citie. Wherefore this Officer was seldom chozen, but vpon some extremitie, and for no longer time than fixe moneths. He was to be named by one of the Consuls, at the appointment of the Senate: though it were so, that the Consul (if he stood vpon his prerogative) might name whom he pleased. At this time, the one Consul being dead, and the other too farre off; the People tooke vpon them, as hauing supreme authoritie, to giue the Dignitie by their election, to Q. Fabius Maximus, the best reputed man of warre in the Citie. Novum factum, novum consilium expetit: Contrarie winds, contrarie counsels. Q. Fabius chose M. Minutius Rufus Master of the horse: which Officer was customarily, as the Dictators Lieutenant; though this Minutius grew afterwards famous, by taking more vpon him.

The first act of Fabius, was the reformation of somewhat amisse in matter of religion: a good beginning, and commendable; had the Religion bene also good. But it were true (as Liniere reports it) that the bookes of Sybil were consulted, and a good direction in this businesse of deuotion; then must we beleue, that those bookes of Sybil, preferred in Rome, were dictated by an euill spirit. For it was ordained, that some Vow, made in the beginning of this warre to Marz, should be made anew, and amplified; as hauing not been rightly made before: also that great Plaies should be vowed vnto Iupiter, and a Temple to Venus; with other such trumperie. This veh-vehementie of superstition, proceeds alwaies from vehementie of feare. And surely this was a time, when Rome was exceedingly distemper'd with passion: whereof that memorable accident, of two women that suddenly died, when they saw their sonnes returne alive from Thrasymene, may serve to beare witness; though it bee more properly an example of motherly love. The walls and towers of the Citie, were now repaired and fortified; the bridges vpon Riuers were broken downe; and all care taken, for defence of Rome it selfe. In this tumult, when the Dictator was newly set forth against Hannibal; word was brought, that the Carthaginian fleet had intercepted all the supply, that was going to Cn. Scipio in Spain. Against these Carthaginians, Fabius commanded Servilius the Consul to put to Sea; and taking vp all the ships about Rome, and Ostia, to pursue them: whilst he, with the Legions, attended vpon Hannibal. Foure Legions he had leui'd in halte: and from Arminius he receiued the Armie, which Servilius the Consul had conducted thither.

With these forth-with he followed apace after Hannibal; not to fight, but to affront him. And knowing well, what aduantage the Numidian horse had ouer the Romans, he alwaies lodged himselfe on high grounds, and of hard access. Hannibal in the meane while, pursuing his victorie, had tringed ouer all the Countrie, and vfed all manner of crueltie towards the inhabitants: especially to those of the Roman Nation, of whom he did put to the sword, all that were able to beare armes. Passing by Spoleum and Ancona, he incamped vpon the Adriatick shores; refreshed his diseased, and ouer-trauail'd Companies; armed his Africans alter the manner of the Romans; and made his dispatches for Carthage, presenting his friends, which were in effect all the Citizens, with part of the spoiles that hee had gotten. Having refreshed his Armie; fed his horses; cured his wounded Souldiers; and (as Polybius hath it) healed his horse beeles of the scratches, by walking their paterines in old wine: he followed the coast of the Adriatick Sea towards Apulia, a Northerne Province of the Kingdome of Naples; spoiling the Marrucini, and all other Nations lying in his way. In all this ground that he ouer-ranne, he had not taken any one Citie: only he had assai'd Spoleum, a Colonie of the Romans; and finding it well defended, presently gaue it ouer.

The malice of a great Armie is broken, and the force of it spent, in a great siege. This the Protestant Armie found true at Poitiers, a little before the battaile of Moncousier; and their victorious enemies, anon after, at St. Iean d'Angeley. But Hannibal was more wise. He would not engage himselfe in any such enterprize, as should detainey him, and giue the Romans leaue to take breath. All his care was to weaken them in force and reputation: knowing, that when once hee was absolute Master of the field, it would not be long ere the walled Cities would open their gates, with out expecting any engine of batterie. To this end he presented Fabius with battaile; as soone as he saw him; and provoked him with all manner of bravado's. But Fabius would not bite. Hee well knew the differences, betwene Souldiers bred vp, euer since they were Boies, in warre and in blood, trayned and hardened in Spain, made proud and aduenturous by many victories there, and of late by some notable successes against the Romans; and such, as had no other scene the enemy, than been vanquished by him. Therefore hee attended the Carthaginian so neare, as hee kept him from stragling too farre; and preferred the countrie from vtter spoile. He inu'd his men by little and little, and made them acquainted with dangers by degrees; and hee brought them first to looke on the Lyon a farre off, that in the end they might sit on his taile.

Now Mimnius had a contrarie disposition, and was as ferie as Flaminius; taking Fabius with cowardise and feare. But all stirred not this well-advised Commander. For wise men are no more moued with such noise, than with winde bruised out of a bladder. There is nothing of more indiscretion, and danger, than to pursue misfortune: It wasteth it selfe sooner by sufferance, than by opposition. It is the invading Armie that desires battaile: and this of Hannibal, was both the invading, and the the victorious. Fabius therefore suffered Hannibal to crosse the Apenines, and to fall vpon the most rich and pleasant Territorie of Campania; neither could he by any arguments be perswaded, to aduenture the Roman Armie in battaile: but being farre too weak in horse, he alwaies kept the Hills and fast grounds. When Hannibal saw he could by no means draw this warie Dictator to fight; that the Winter came on; and that the towns stood firme for the Romans, whose Legions were in fight, though a farre off; he resolved to reit his Armie, that was laden with spoile, in some plentiful and assured place, till the following Spring. But ere this can be done, he must passe along by the Dictators campe, that hung ouer his head vpon the Hills of Calula, and Casitum: for other way there was none, by which hee might issue out of that goodly Garden countrie, which hee had already walled, into places more abundant of prouision for his wintering. It was by mere error of his guide, that he first entred within these streights. For he would haue bene directed vnto Casinum, whence he might both assay the faire Citie of Capua, which had made him friendly promises vnder hand, and hinder the Romans from coming nere it to prevent him. But his guide mis-vnderstood the Carthaginian pronunciation, and conducted him awry an other way, from Casinum to Casitum, whence Fabius hoped that he should not easily escape. Now beganne the wilddome of Fabius to grow into credit; as if he had taken the Carthaginians in a trap; and wonne the victorie, without blows. But Hannibal reformed this opinion, and freed himselfe; by a slight inuention, yet seruing the turne as well as a better. In driving the countrie, he had gotten about two thousand Kine; whose hornes he dressed with drie faggots, and setting fire to them in the darke night, caused them to be driuen vp the hills. The spectacle was strange, and therefore terrible; especially to those, that knew it to be the worke of a terrible enemy. What it should meane, Fabius could not tell: but thought it a deuice to circumuent him; and therefore kept within his Trenches. They that kept the hill-tops, were horribly afraid, when some of these ferie Monsters were gotten beyond them; and ranne therefore hastily away, thinking that the enemies were behinde their backs, and fell among the light-armed Carthaginians, that were no lesse afraid of them. So Hannibal, with his whole Armie, recovered fure ground, without molestation: where he layed till the next morning; and then brought off his light footmen, with some slaughter of the Romans, that began to hold them in skirmlish. After this, Hannibal made semblance of taking his iourne towards Rome: and the Dictator coasted him in the wonted manner, keeping still on high grounds, between him and the Citie, whilst the Carthaginian waled all the Plaines. The Carthaginian tooke Geryon, an old ruinous Towne in Apulia, forsaken by the Inhabitants, which he turned into Barnes and Store houses for winter, and incamped vnder the broken walls. Other matter of importance he did none: but the time passed idely, till the Dictator was called away to Rome, about some businesse of Religion, and left the 40 Armie in charge with Mimnius, the Master of the horse.

Mimnius was glad of this good occasion to shew his owne sufficiencie. Hee was fully perswaded, that his Romans, in plaine field, would be too hard for the Africans and Spaniards: by whom if they had beene foiled already twice or thrice, it was not by open force, but by subtiltie and ambush, which he thought himselfe wise enough to prevent. All the Armie was of his opinion; and that so earnestly, as he was preferred by iudgement of the Souldiers, in worthinesse to command, before the cold and warie Fabius. In this iollitie of conceit, hee determined to fight. Yet had hee bene preempitorily forbidden so to doe, by the Dictator; the breach of whose command was extreme perill of death. But the honour of the victorie, which hee 50 had vndoubtedly his owne; the loue of the Armie; and the friends that hee had at home bearing Office in Rome, were enough to faue him from the Dictators rods and axes, tooke he the matter neuer so haينously. Hannibal on the other side was no lesse glad, that he should play with a more aduenturous gamester. Therefore hee drew neare: and to prouoke the Romans, sent forth a third part of his Armie to waltie the

Countrie. This was boldly done, seeing that Minutius incamped hard by him: but it seemed, that he now despised those whom hee had so often vanquished. There was a peece of high ground betweene the two camps; which because it would bee commodious to him that could occupie it, the Carthaginians seized vpon by night with two thousand of their light-armed. But Minutius, by plaine force, wanne it from them the next day; and entrenching himselfe thereupon, became their nearer neighbour.

The maine businesse of Hannibal at this time was, to provide abundantly, not only for his men, but for his horses, which hee knew to bee the chiefe of his strength; that he might keepe them in good heart against the next Sommer: if besides this he could giue the Romans another blow, it would increase his reputation, encourage his owne men, terrifie his enemies, and giue him leaue to forrage the Countrie at will. Since therefore Minutius did not in many dayes issue forth of his campe, the Carthaginian sent out (as before) a great number of his men, to fetch in barrells. This aduantage Minutius wisely espied, and tooke. For he led forth his Armie, and setting it in order presented battaile to Hannibal, that was not in case to accept it, euen at his owne Trenches. His horse, and all his light Armature, diuided into many companies, hee sent abroad against the forragers; who being dispersed ouer all the fields, and laden with bootie, could make no resistance. This angered Hannibal, that was not able to helpe them; but worfe did it anger him, when the Romans tooke heart to assaile his Trenches. They perceived that it was mere weaknesse, which held him within his campe, and therefore were bold to despise his great name, that could not resist their present strength. But in the heat of the businesse, Asdrubal came from Geryon with foure thousand men, being informed of the danger, by those that had escaped the Roman horse. This emboldened Hannibal to issue forth against the Romans; to whom neuertheless hee did not such hurt, as hee had received.

For this peece of seruice Minutius was highly esteemed by the Armie, and more highly by the People at Rome, to whom hee lent the newes, with somewhat greater boast than truth. It seemed no small matter, that the Roman Armie had recovered spirit, so farre forth that it dared to set vpon Hannibal in his owne campe; and that in so doing, it came off with the better. Every man therefore praised the Master of the horse, that had wrought this great alteration; and consequently, they grew as farre out of liking with Fabius, and his timorous proceedings, thinking that hee had not done any thing wisely, in all his Dictatorship: saying that he chose such a worthy Lieutenant; whereas indeede in no other thing hee had so greatly erred. But the Dictator was not so ioyfull of a little good luck, as angry with the breach of discipline; and fearfull of greater danger, thereon likely to ensue. Hee said that hee knew his owne place, and what was to be done; that he would teach the Master of the horse to doe so likewise; and make him giue account of what he had done, if he were Dictator: speaking it openly, That good successe, issuing from bad counsaile, was more to be feared, than calamitie; for as much as the one bred a foolish confidence; the other, taught men to be warie. Against these Sermons every one cried out; especially Clelius, a Tribune of the people: which Office warranted him to speake, and doe what he list, without feare of the Dictator. Is it not enough (said he) that this our only Man, chosen to be Generall, and Lord of the Towne, in our greatest necessitie, hath done no manner of good, but suffered all Italie to bee wasted before his eyes, to the utter shame of our State; ynlasse he also hinder others, from doing better than himselfe can, or dares? It were good to consider what he meanes by this. Into the place of C. Flaminius hee hath not chosen any new Consul all this while; Seruius is sent away to Sea, I know not why; Hannibal and Hee, haue as it were taken Truce; Hannibal sparing the Dictators grounds: (for Hannibal had indeede forborne to spoile some grounds of Fabius, that so he might bring him into enuie and suspicion) and the Dictator giuing him leaue to spoile all others, without impeachment.

peachment. Surely his drift is euen this: He would haue the warre to last long, that he himselfe might be long in Office, and haue the sole Gouernment both of our Citie, and Armies. But this must not be so. It were better, that the Commonaltie of Rome, which gaue him this authoritie, should againe take it from him, and conferre it vpon one more wortheie. But lest, in mouing the people hereto, I should seeme to doe him iniurie; thus farre forth I will regard his honour: I will only propound, That the Master of the Horse may be joynd in equall authoritie, with the Dictator; a thing not more new, nor lesse necessarie, than was the electing of this Dictator, by the People.

Though all men, euen the Senators, were ill perswaded of the course which Fabius had taken against Hannibal, as being neither plausible, nor seeming beneficiall at the present; yet was there none so injurious, as to thinke that his generall intent, and care of the Weale publike, was lesse than very honourable. Whereas therefore it was the manner, in passing of any Act, that some man of credit and authoritie, besides the Propounder, should stand vp; and formally deliuer his approbation; not one of the principall Citizens was found so impudent, as to offer that open disgrace, both vnto a wortheie Personage, and (therewithall) vnto that Dignitie, whose great power had freed the State at severall times, from the greatest dangers. Only C. Terentius Varro, who the year before had bene Prator, was glad of such an opportunity, to winne the fauour of the Multitude. This fellow was the sonne of a Butcher; afterwards became a shop-keeper; and being of a contentious spirit, grew, by often brablings, to take vpon him as a Pleader, dealing in poore mens causes. Thus by little and little he got into Office; and rose by degrees, being aduanced by those, who in hatred of the Nobilitie fauoured his very baselesse. And now hee thought the time was come, for him to giue an hard push at the Consulship; by doing that, which none of the great men, fearing or fauouring one another, either durst or would. So he made an hot inuective, not only against Fabius, but against all the Nobilitie; saying, that it grieved them to see the people doe well, and take vpon them what belonged vnto them, in matter of Gouernment; that they sought to humble the Commons by pouertie, and to impoverish them by warre, especially by warre at their owne dores, which would soone consume euery poore mans liuing, and finde him other worke to thinke vpon, than matter of State. Therefore hee bad them to be wise: and since they had found one, (this wortheie Master of the horse) that was better affected vnto them and his Countrie, to reward him according to his good deserts; and giue him authoritie, accordingly as was propounded by the Tribune, that so he might be encouraged and enabled, to proceede as hee had begunne. So the Act passed.

Before this busie day of contention, Fabius had dispatched the election of a new Consul, which was M. Attilius Regulus, in the roome of C. Flaminius; and hauing finished all requisite businesse, went out of Towne, perceiving well, that he should not be able to withstand the Multitude, in hindering the Decree. The newes of Minutius his aduancement, was at the campe as soone as Fabius: so that his old Lieutenant, and new Colleague, beganne to treat with him as a Companion; asking him at the first, in what sort he thought it best to diuide their authoritie: whether that one, one day; and the other, the next; or each of them, successiuelly, for some longer time, should command in chiefe. Fabius briefly told him, That it was the pleasure of the Citizens, to make the Master of the horse equall to the Dictator, but that he should neuer be his superiour: He would therefore diuide the Legions with him, by lot, according to the custome. Minutius was not herewith greatly pleased; for that with halfe of the Armie he could not worke such wonders, as otherwise he hoped to accomplish. Neuertheless hee meant to doe his best; and soting his part of the Armie, incamped about a mile and an halfe from the Dictator. Needfull it was (though Lucius seeme to taxe him for it) that he should so doe. For wheretwo severall Commanders are not subordinate one vnto the other, nor joynd ned in Commission, but have each entire and absolute charge of his owne followers, there are the forces (though belonging vnto one Prince or State) not one, but two distinct Armies: in which regard, one campe shall not hold them both, without great inconvenience. Polybius rather findes fault with this diuinction; nor yet reports, that Fabius was unwilling to command in chiefe successiue (as the two Consuls vied) with Minutius; by turnes. Hee saith that Minutius was very retractive; and so proud of his aduancement, that continually hee opposed the Dictator: who thereupon referred it to his choice, either to diuide the forces betweene them, as is said before, or else to haue command ouer all by course. This is likely to be true. For natures impatient of subiection; when once they haue broken loose from the rigour of authority, loue nothing more, than to contest with it: as if herein consisted the prooffe and assurance of their libertie.

It behoued the Master of the horse; to make good the opinion which had thus aduanced him. Therefore he was no lesse carefull, of getting occasion to fight, than was Fabius of auoiding the necessitie. That which Minutius and Hannibal equally desired, could not long be wanting. The Countre lying betweene them was open and bare, yet as fit for ambush, as could be wished: for that the sides of a naked valley adjoyning, had many, and spacious caues; able, some one of them, to hide two or three hundred men. In these lurking places, Hannibal belowed five hundred horse, and five thousand foot; thrusting them so close together, that they could not be discouered: But left by any misaduenture they should be found out, and buried in their holes: he made oftentimes in the morning, to seize vpon a peece of ground, that lay on the other hand: whereby he drew the eyes and thoughts of the Romans, from their more needfull care, to businesse little concerning them. Like vnto this was the occasion, which, not long before, had prouoked Minutius, to aduenture vpon the Carthaginians. Hoping therefore to increase his honour, in like sort as he got it; he sent first his light armature, then his horse, and at length (seeing that Hannibal seconded his owne troups with fresh companies) hee followed in person with the Legions. He was soon caught; and so botly charged on all sides, that he knew neither how to make resistance, nor any safe retreat. In this dangerous case, whilst the Romans defended themselves, loosing many, and those of their best men: Fabius drew neare, in very good order, to relieue them. For this old Capitaine, perceiving a farre off, into what extremitie his new Colleague had rashly throwne himselfe; and his followers; did the office of a good Citizen; and regarding more the benefit of his Countre, than the disgrace which he had wrongfully sustained, fought rather to approue himselfe, by haisting to doe good, than by suffering his enemy to feele the reward of doing ill. Vpon Fabius his approach, Hannibal retired: fearing to be well wetted with a shower, from the cloud (as he termed the Dictator) that had hung so long on the Hill-tops. Minutius forthwith submitted himselfe to Fabius; by whose benefit hee confessed his life to haue beene saued. So from this time forwards, the Warre proceeded coldly, as the Dictator would haue it; both whilst his Office lasted, which was not long, and likewise afterwards, when hee deliuered vp his charge vnto the Consuls, that followed his instructions.

Serulius the Consul had pursued in vaine a Carthaginian fleet, to which hee came neuer within kenning. He ranne along all the coast of Italie; tooke hostages of the Sardinians and Corsicans; passed ouer into Africk; and there negligently falling to spoile the Countre, was shamefully beaten aboard his ships, with the losse of a thousand men. Weighing anchor therefore in all hate, hee returned home by Sicily; and (being so required by the Dictators letters) repaired to the campe, with his fellow-Consul, where they tooke charge of the Armie.

The Roman people, desirous to finish the warre quickly, choose a rash and unworthie Consul. Great forces leued against Hannibal. Hannibal taketh the Romans prouisions in the Cattle of Cannæ. The new Consul set forth against Hannibal.

WH little pleasure did they of the poorer sort in Rome, heare the great commendations, that were giuen to Fabius by the principall Citizens. He had indeed preserved them from receiving a great overthrow: but hee had neither finished the warre, nor done any thing in apparence thereto tending. Rather it might seeme, that the reputation of this his one worthie act, was likely to countenance the slow proceedings, or perhaps the cowardize (if it were no worse) of those that followed him, in protracting the worke to a great length. Else, what meant the Consuls to sit idle the whole winter, contrary to all former custome; since it was neuer heard before, that any Roman Generall, had willingly suffered the time of his command to runne away without any performance: as if it were honorable to doe just nothing? Thus they suspected they knew not what; and were readie euery man, to discharge the grieue and anger of his owne private losse, vpon the ill administration of the publike.

This affection of the people, was very helpfull to C. Terentius Varro, in his suit for the Consulship. It behoued him to strike, whilst the Iron was hot: his owne worth being little or none, and his credit ouer-weake, to make way into that high Dignitie. But the Commonalty were then in such a moode, as abundantly supplied all his defects. Wherein to help, he had a kinsman, Bibius Herennius, then Tribune of the People; who spared not to vse the libertie of his place, in saying what he listed, without all regard of truth, or modestie. This bold Orator lucke not to affirme, that Hannibal was drawne into Italie, and suffered therein to range at his pleasure, by the Noblemen; that Minutius indeed with his two Legions, was likely to haue beene overthrown, and was rescued by Fabius with the other two: but had all been joyned together, what they might haue done, it was apparent, by the victorie of Minutius, when he commanded ouer all, as Master of the horse; that without a Plebeian Consul, the warre would neuer be brought to an end; that such of the Plebeians, as had long since been aduanced to honor by the people, were growne as proud as the old Nobilitie, and contemned the meaner sort, euer since themselves were freed from contempt of the more mightie; that therefore it was needfull to chioose a Consul, who should bee altogether a Plebeian, a meere new man, one that could boast of nothing but the Peoples loue, nor could with more, than to keep it, by well deserting of them. By such persuasions, the Multitude was wonne, to be wholly for Terentius: to the great vexation of the Nobles, who could not endure, to see a man raised for none other vertue, than his detracting from their honor; and therefore opposed him with all their might. To hinder the desire of the People, it fell out, or at least was alleged, that neither of the two present Consuls could well be spared, from attending vpon Hannibal, to hold the Election. Wherefore a Dictator was named for that purpose: and he againe depoued; either (as was pretended) for some religious impediment, or because the Fathers desired an Inter-regnum, wherein they might better hope to pruaile in chioice of the new Consuls. This Inter-regnum tooke name and being in Rome, at the death of Romulus; and was in vse at the death of other Kings. The order of it was this. All the Fathers, or Senators, who at the first were an hundred, parted themselves into Tens, or Decuries; and gouerned successiue, by the space of five daies, one Decurie after another in order: yet so, that the Licitors, or Progers, carrying the Fasces, or bundles of rods and axes, waited only vpon the chiefe of them with these Ensignes of power. This custome was retained, in times of the Consuls; and put in vse, when by death, or any casualty, there wanted ordinary Magistrates of the old year, to substitute new for the year following. The advantage of the Fathers herein was, that if the Election were not like to goe as they would have it, there needed no more, than to let slip five daies, and then was all to begin anew: by which interruption, the heat of the Multitude was commonly well asswaged. Upon such change of those, that were Presidents of the Election; it was also lawfull vnto new Petitioners, to sue for the Magistracies that lay void: which otherwise was not allowed; but a time limited, wherein they should publicly declare themselves to seeke those Offices. But no device would serue, against the generall fauour borne vnto Terentius. One Inter-regnum passed ouer; and the malice of the Fathers, against the vertue (as it was believed) of this meane, but worthe man, seemed so manifest, that when the People had vrged the businesse to dispatch, only Terentius was chosen Consul: in whose hand it was left, to hold the election of his Colleague. Hereupon all the former Petitioners gaue ouer. For whereas men of ordinarie make had stood for the place before; it was now thought meet, that, both to supply the defect, and to bridle the violence of this vnexpert, and hot-headed man; one of great sufficiency, and reputation, should be joynd with him, as both Companion and Opposite. So L. Aemilius Paulus, he who few yeares since had ouer-come the Illyrians, and chased Demetrius Pharius out of his Kingdome, was vrged by the Nobilitie to stand for the place: which he easily obtained, hauing no Competitor. It was not the desire of this honorable man, to trouble himselfe any more in such great businesse of the Common-wealth. For, notwithstanding his late good seruice; He, and M. Lucius that had been his companion in Office, were afterwards injuriously vexed by the People, and called vnto judgement: wherein Lucius was condemned, and Aemilius hardly escaped. But of this iniustice they shall put the Romans well in minde, each of them in his second Consulship, wherein they shall honorably approue their worth; the one of them nobly dying, in the most grieuous losse; the other brauely winning, in the most happie victorie, that euer befell that Common-wealth.

These new Consuls, Varro and Paulus, omitted no part of their diligence, in preparing for the warre: wherein though Varro made the greater noise, by telling what wonders hee would worke, and that hee would aske no more, than once to haue a sight of Hannibal, whom he promised to vanquish the very first day; yet the prouidence and care of Paulus, trauielled more earnestly toward the accomplishment of that, whereof his fellow vainely boasted. He wrote vnto the two old Consuls Servilius and Stillicus; desiring them to abstaine from hazard of the maine chance; but neuerthelesse, to ply the Carthaginians with daily skirmish, and weaken them by degrees: that when hee and his Colleague should take the field, with the great Armie which they were now leuying, they might finde the foure old Legions well accustomed to the Enemie, and the Enemie well weakened to their hands. He was also very strict in his Musters; wherein the whole Senate assisted him so carefully, as if in this Action they meant to refuse the flanders, with which Terentius and his Adherents had burdened them. What number of men they raised it is vnertaine. Foure-score thousand foot, at the least, and fixe thousand horse, they were strong in the field, when the day came, which Varro had so greatly desired, of looking vpon Hannibal.

Here, the old King of Syracuse, as he had relieved the Carthaginians, when they were distressed by their owne Mercenaries; so did he now send helpe to Rome; a thousand Archers, and Slingers, with great quantitie of Wheat, Barlie, and other prouisions: fearing nothing more, than that one of these two mightie Cities should destroy the other, whereby his owne estate would fall to ruine; that stood vpright, by hauing them some what cunely balanced. He gaue them also counsaile, to send forces into Africa; if (perhaps) by that meane they might diuert the warre from home. His gifts, and good aduice were louingly accepted; and instructions were giuen to Titus Oclavius the Prætor, which was to goe into Sicily, that hee should accordingly passe ouer into Africa, if he found it expedient.

The

The great Leuiés, which the Romans made at this time, doe much more serue to declare their puillance, than any, though larger, accompt by Poll, of such as were not easily drawne into the field, and fitted for seruice. For besides these Armies of the Consuls, and that which went into Sicily, a twentie five thousand, with L. Papilius Albinus another of the Prætors, went against the Gauls, to reclaim that Province, which the passage of Hannibal through it, had taken from them. The contemplation of this their present strength, might well embolden them to doe as they did. They sent Embassadors to Philip the sonne of Demetrius, King of Macedony, requiring him to deliuer into their hands Demetrius Pharius: who hauing bene their subject, and rebell, was fled into his Kingdome. They also sent to the Illyrians, to demand their tribute; whereof the day of payement was already past. What answer they receiued, it is not knowne: only this is knowne, that Demetrius Pharius was not sent vnto them; and that Philip henceforth beganne to haue an eye vpon them, little to their good. As for the Illyrian monie; by the shifts that they were driuen soons after to make, it will appeare, that the one halfe of it (how little soeuer) would haue bene welcome to Rome, and accepted, without any cauil about forfeiture for non payment of the whole.

Whilst the Citie was busied in these cares, the old Consuls lay as near vnto Hannibal, as possibly they could, without incurring the necessitie of a battaile. Many skirmishes they had with him; wherein their successe, for the most part, was rather good than great. Yet one mischance not only blemished the honour of their other seruices, but was indeede the occasion, to draw on the miserie following. Hannibal, for the most part of that time, made his abode at Geryon, where lay all his store for the Winter. The Romans, to be neare him, lodged about Cannæ; and, that they might not be driuen to turne aside for all necessities, to the losse of good opportunities, they bestowed much of their prouisions in the Caste of Cannæ: for the towne was razed the year before. This place Hannibal wanne; and thereby not only furnished himselfe, but compelled his enemies to want many needfull things, vnlesse they would bee troubled with farre carriage. Besides this, and more to his advantage, hee enabled himselfe to abide in that open Countrey, fit for the seruice of his horse: longer than the Romans, hauing so many mouthes to feede, could well endure to tarrie; without offering battaile; which he most desired. Of this mishap when Servilius had informed the Senate, letting them vnderstand, how this Peccet, taken by Hannibal, would serue him to command no small part of the Countrey adjacent; it then seemed needfull, euen vnto the Fathers themselves, to aduenture a battaile with the Carthaginian, rather than suffer him thus to take roote in the ground of Italy. Neuerthelesse, answer was returned vnto Servilius, that hee should haue patience yet awhile: for that the Consuls would shortly be there, with a power sufficient to doe as neede required.

When all things were readie in the Citie, and the season of the yeare commodious to take the field; the two Consuls, with their armie, set forth against Hannibal. This was alwaies done with great solemnitie: especially, when soeuer they went forth to warre against any noble or redoubted Enemie. For Sacrifices, and solemn Vowes, were made vnto Iupiter, and the rest of their Gods, for good successe and victorie: which being performed; the Generals, in warlike attire, with an honorable traine of the principall men, not only such as were of their kindred and alliance, or followed them to the warre, as Volontaries, for loue, but a great number of others that meant to abide at home, were accompanied on their way, and dismissed with friendly leaue-taking, and good wishes. At this time, all the Fathers, and the whole Nobilitie, waited vpon Aemilius Paulus, as the only Man, whom they thought either worthe of this honor, or likely to doe his countrey remarkable seruice. Terentius his Attendants were the whole multitude of the poorer Citizens: a troupe no lesse in greatnes, than the other was in dignitie. At the parting; Fabius the late Dictator, is said to haue exhorted the Consul Paulus, with many graue wordes, to shew his magnanimitie, not only in dealing with the Carthaginians, but (which he thought harder) in bridling the outrageous follie of his fellow-Consul. The answer of Paulus was, That hee meant not againe to runne into danger of condemnation, by offending the Multitude; that hee would doe his best for his Countrey: but if he law his best were likely to be ill taken, Hee would thinke it lesse rashnesse to adventure vpon the Enemies sword, than vpon the malice of his owne Citizens.

Disfension betwene the two Roman Consuls. Whether it be likely, that HANNIBAL was vpon point of flying out of Italie, when the Romans pressed him to fight. The great battaile of Cannæ.

THe new Generals, arriuing at the Camp, dismissed M. Atilius one of the last yeares Consuls, requesting it because of his age and weakenes: Serulius they retained with them, as their Assisitant. The first thing that Emilius thought necessarie, was, to hearten his Souldiers with good wordes; who out of their bad successe hitherto, had gathered more caule of feare, than of courage. He willed them to consider, not only now, their victories in times past against the Carthaginians, and other more warlike Nations than were the Carthaginians, but euen their owne great numbers: which were no less than all that Rome at the present was able to set forth. Hee told them in what danger their Countrey stood; how the state and safetie thereof, relied vpon their hands; vsing some such other common matter of perswasion. But the most effectfull part of his Oration was, That Hannibal with this his terrible Armie, had not yet obtained one victorie by plaine force and valour: but that only by deceit and ambush he had stolne the honor, which he had gotten at Trebia and Thrasymene. Herewithall he taxed the inconsiderate rashnesse of Sempronius and Flaminius, of whom the one saw not his enemies, vntill hee was surrounded by them; the other scarce saw them, when they struck off his head, by reason of the thick mist, through the darkness: whereof he went groping (as it were blinde-fold) into their snares. Finally, declaring what advantages they had against the Enemy; and how destitute the Enemy was of those helps, by which he had hitherto preuailed against them; he exhorted them to play the men, and doe their best. They were easily perswaded: for the contemplation of their owne multitude, and confidence of the Roman vertue in matter of armes, gaue them caule to thinke, that vnder a Capitaine so well experienced, and euery way sufficient, as Emilius was knowne to bee, they should easily preuaile against the Carthaginians: that came farre short of them in all things else, saue craft; which would not alwaies thriue. But in one thing they mistooke the meaning of their Generall. It was his desire, that they should haue heart to fight; not that they should loose the patience of awaiting a conuenient season. But they, hauing preconceiued a victorie, thought all deliaies to be impediments: and thereby sought to robbe themselves of their best helpe; which was, good conduct. They remembered what talke they had heard at Rome: and were themselves affected with the vulgar desire, of ending the vvar quickly; wherein since Emilius had acknowledged, that the advantage was theirs, why did he make them forbear to vse it? Thus thought the common Souldier: and thus also thought the Consul Terentius, who was no lesse popular in the Campe, than he had been in the Citie. Expectation is alwaies tedious; and neuer more, than when the Euent is of most importance. All men longed, both at Rome, and in the Armie, to bee freed from the doubtful Passions of Hope and Feare: therefore Terentius, who halstened their desire to effect, was likely to winne more thanks, than should his Colleague, though greater in the performance.

Thus while the Romans thinke themselves to haue the better of their Enemies, they fall into an inconuenience, than which few are more dangerous; Disfension of their chiefe Commanders. Varrus would fight: Emilius would so too, but said that it was not yet time, why? because the enemy must shortly dislodge, and remove hence, into places lesse fit for his horse. But shall the Romans wait, till Hannibal, hauing eaten vp his last yeares provisions, returne into Campania to gather a second harvest? This would (said Varrus) fauour too much of Q. Fabius: And your haste (said Paulus) doth fauour no lesse of C. Flaminius. Their deedes were like their wordes: for they commanded by turnes interchangeably euery day. Emilius lodged like miles from Hannibal, where the ground was somewhat vnquen. Thither if the Carthaginians would take paines to come; hee doubted not to send them away in such haste, as they should not leaue running till they were out of Italie. But they came not. Terentius therefore the next day descended into the Plaines, his Colleague holding him, and beseeching him to stay. Neuertheless hee fate downe close by Hannibal: who as an vnbidden guest gaue him but a rude well come and intertainment. The Carthaginian Horse, and light Armature, fell vpon the Roman Vancourers; and put the whole Armie in tumult, whilst it was yet in march: but they were beaten off, not without losse, for that the Romans had, among their Velites, some troups weightily armed, whereas the Carthaginians had none. The day following, Emilius, who could not handsomly withdraw the Armie out of that leuell ground, incamped vpon the Riuer Aufidus; sending a third part of his forces ouer the water, to lie vpon the Easterne bankes, where they entrenched themselves. Hee neuer was more vawilling to fight, than at this present: because the ground serued wholly for the aduantage of his enemy; with whom hee meant to deale, when occasion should draw him to more equall termes. Therefore hee stirred not out of his Trenches, but fortified himselfe; expecting when Hannibal should dislodge, and remove towards Geryon, Cannæ, or some other place, where his store lay, for want of necessities: whereof an Armie foraging the countrey, was not likely to carrie about with it sufficient quantitie, for any long time.

Here it would not bee passed ouer with silence, that Luie differeth much in his Relation from Polybius: telling many strange tales, of the miserie into which Hannibal had bene driuen; and of base courses that hee deuised to take, if the Romans could haue retained their patience a little longer. Hee had (saith Luie) but ten daies provision of meat. Hee had not monie to pay his Souldiers. They were an vnruely Rabbie, gathered out of severall Nations, so that Hee knew not how to keepe them in order; but that from murmuring, they fell to flat exclamations, first, about their Pay, and Prouant, and afterwards for very famine. Especially the Spaniards were readie to forsake him, and runne ouer to the Roman side. Yea Hannibal himselfe was once vpon the point, to haue stolne away into Gaul with all his horse, and left his foot vnto their miserable destinies. At length, for lack of all other counsaile, Hee resolved to get him as farre as hee could from the Romans, into the Southermost parts of Apulia; to the end, that both his vnfaithfull Souldiers might finde the more difficultie in running from him; and that his hunger might be relieved with the more early harvest. But whilst hee was about to put this device in execution, the Romans pressed him so hard, that they cuen forced him vnto that, which hee most desired; euen to fight a battaile vpon open champaigne ground: wherein hee was victorious. It was not vncommendable in Luie, to speake the best of his owne Citizens; and, where they did ill, to say, That, without their owne great folly, they had done passing well. Further also hee may be excused; as writing only by report. For thus he saith; HANNIBAL de fuga in Galliam (dictum) agisse; HANNIBAL (u) said to haue betwixt him selfe of flying into Gaul: where he makes it no more than a matter of heare-say; as perhaps was all the rest of this Relation. As for the processe it selfe, it is very incredible. For if Hannibal, coming out of Gaul, through the Marishes and Bogs of Ettruria, could finde victualles enough, and all things needfull vnto his Armie, the Sommer foregoing: what should hinder him to doe the like this yeare; especially seeing hee had plaied the careful husband in making a great harvest; since he had long bene Master of the open field; and besides, had gotten, by surprise, no small part of the Romans prouisions? Sutable hereunto is all the rest. If Hannibal had taken nothing but corne and cattaile; his Souldiers might perhaps haue fallen into mutinie for pay. But he brought gold with him into Italy: and had so well increased his flock, since he came into that Countrey, that hee had armed his African Souldiers, all Roman-like; and loaden his followers with spoile: hauing left wherewith to redeeme as many of his owne, as were taken by the Enemy; when the Romans were not willing, as finding it not easie to doe the like. In this point therefore, wee are to attend the general agreement of Historians: who giue it as a principall commendation vnto Hannibal, That hee alwaies kept his Armie free from sedition, though it were composed of sundrie Nations; no lesse different in Manners, Religion, and almost in Nature, than they were in languages: and well might he so doe, hauing not only pronounced, That which of his men fouer fought brauely with an Enemy, was thereby a Carthaginian; but solemnely protelted and sworne, (besides other rewards) to make as many of them, as should deserue and seeke it, free Citizens of Carthage. The running away into Gauls, was a senselesse deuce. Hannibal, being there with his whole Armie, tooke so little pleasure in the Countrey and People, that he made all haste to get him out of it. And what should hee now doe there with his horse? or how could hee bee trusted, either there or elsewhere? yea, how could he desire to liue; hauing betrayed all his Armies; and relinquished his miserable foot, to the butcherie of their enemies? This tale therefore Plutarch omitteth; who in writing the life of Hannibal, takes in a manner all his directions from Livie. But of this and the like it is enough to say, That all Historians loue to extoll their owne Countreymen; and where a losse cannot be dissembled, nor the honor of the victorie taken from the Enemy, and giuen vnto blinde Fortune, there to lay all the blame on some strange misgouernment of their owne forces: as if they might easily haue wonne all, but lost all through such folly, as no Enemy can hope to finde in them another time.

Now let vs returne back to the two Armies, where they lie incamped on the River Ausilius. Varro was perswaded, that it concerned him in honour, to make good his word vnto the people of Rome: and since he had thus long waited in vaine, to get the consent of Paulus, now at length to vse his owne authoritie; and, without any more disputing of the matter, to fight when his owne day came. When therefore it was his turne to command; at the first breake of day he beganne to passe the River, without staying to bid his Colleague good morrow. But Paulus came to him; and sought, as in former times, to haue disswaded him, from putting the estate of his Countrey to a needlesse hazard. Against whose wordes and substantiall arguments, Terentius could allege none other, than point of honour. Hannibal had presented them battaile at their Trenches: should they endure this Brauado? He had sent his Numidians over the River but euen the day before, who fell vpon the Romans that 40 were fetching water to the lesser Campe; and draue them shamefully to runne within their defences, which also they made offer to assaile: must this also be suffered? Hee would not endure it: for it could not but weaken the spirit of the Roman Souldier; which as yet was liuely, and full of such courage, as promised assured victorie. When Emilius perceived, that he could not hinder the obstinate resolution of his Companion; he tooke all care, that what he saw must be done, might be done well. Ten thousand Roman foot he caused to be left behinde, in the greater campe, opposite vnto the Carthaginian; to the intent, that either Hannibal might bee compelled, to leave behinde him some answerable number, for defence of his Trenches: (which out of this pautie he was lesse able to spare from the battaile, than were the 50 Romans;) or that these ten thousand, falling vpon the Carthaginian Campe, when the fight beganne, and taking it with all the wealth therein, might thereby (as commonly doe such accidents) terrifie and distract the Enemies in the heat of fight. This done; the two Consulz went ouer the water with their Armie to the lesser Campe, whence whence also they drew forth their men, and ranged them in order of battaile: the ground on the East part of the River, seeming perhaps more fit for marshalling of their Armie. Hannibal was glad of this, as he had great cause; and, without any delay, passed likewise ouer, somewhat higher vp the Iream, which ranne from the South; leauing in his owne campe so many, as he thought would serue to defend it, and no more. To encourage his men; He had them looke about them, and view the ground well, vpon which they were to fight. They did so. And could you (said he) pray for any greater fortune, than to ioyne battaile with the Romans vpon such a leuell ground, where the stronger in horse are sure to preuaile? They all assented to him; and shewed by their countenances, that they were very glad of it. Well then (said he further) ye are first of all to thanke the Gods, that haue brought them hither; and then Vs, that haue trained them along, and draue them into necessity of playing for their liues, where they are sure to loose them. As for these Romans, I was faine to encourage you against them, when yee met them first: but now yee may euen encourage your selues, by calling to minde that they are the men, whom yee haue as often beaten as scene. Of one thing only I will put you in minde: That whereas hitherto you fought for other respects; as to drine them before you out of Gauls; and to winne the open Countrey, and fields of Italy; both of which yee haue obtained: now are yee to fight for the Townes themselves, and all the riches within them; which this victorie shall make yours. Therefore play the stout Souldiers: and ere many houres passe, yee shall bee Lords of all that the Romans hold.

When he had said this; his brother Mago came to him, whom hee had sent to view the countenance of the Enemy. Hannibal asked him, what newes; and what worke they were likely to haue with these Romans? Worke enough (answered Mago) for they are an horrible many. As horrible a many as they are (thus Hannibal replied) I tell thee brother, that among them all, I search them neuer so diligently, thou shalt not finde one man, whose name is Mago. With that hee fell a laughing, and so did all that stood about him: which gladdened the souldiers, who thought their 30 Generall would not be so merrie, without great assurance. Whether it were so, that Hannibal, in the pride of his victories already gotten, valued one Mago about many thousand Romans; or whether he intimated, that the Romans were no lesse troubled with thinking vpon Mago and his Companions, than was Mago with beholding their huge multitude; or whether hee meant only to correct the sad moode of his brother with a jest, and shew himselfe merrie vnto the Souldiers: this his answer was more manly, than was the relation of his discoverer. But if Hannibal himselfe had bene sent forth by Mago, to view the Romans; he could not haue returned with a more gallant report in his mouth, than that which Captaine Gaius, before the battaile of Agincourt, made vnto our King Henrie the first: saying, that of the Frenchmen, 40 there were enough to be killed; enough to be taken prisoners; and enough to runne away. Euen such wordes as these, or such pleasant jests as this of Hannibal, are not without their moment; but serue many times, when battaile is at hand, to worke vpon such passions, as must gouerne more of the businesse: especially, where other needfull care is not wanting; without which they are but vaine boasts.

In this great day, the Carthaginian excelled himselfe; expressing no lesse perfection of his militarie skill, than was greatnesse in his spirit and vnder takings. For to omit the commodiousness of the place, into which hee had long before conceiued the meanes to draw his enemies to battaile; Hee marshalled his Armie in such convenient order; that all hands were brought to fight, where euery one might doe 50 best seruice. His Darters, and Slingers of the Baleares, he sent off before him, to encounter with the Roman Velites. These were loose troupes, answerable in a manner to those, which we call now by a French name Enfans perdus; but when we view our owne termes, the forlorne hope. The grosse of his Armie following them he ordered thus. His Africans, armed after the Roman manner, with the spoiles which they had had gotten at Trebia, Thrasymene, or elsewhere; and well trained in the vse of those weapons, that were of more aduantage, than those wherewith they had formerly serued; made the two wings, very deepe in File. Betwene these hee ranged his Gauls and Spaniards, armed, each after their owne Countreie manner; their shields alike; but the Gauls vling long broad swordes, that were forcible in a downe right stroke; the Spaniards, short and well-pointed blades, either to strike or thrust; the Gauls, naked from their nauell vpwards, as in qualitie, made a gallant shew; the Spaniards, wearing white callocks embroidered with purple. This medley of two Nations, differing as well in habit and furniture, as in qualitie, made a gallant shew; and terrible, because strange. The Gauls were strong of body, and furious in giuing charge; but soone wearied, as accustomed to spend their violence at the first brunt, which disposition all that come of them haue inherited to this day. The Spaniards were lesse eager, but more warie; neither ashamed to giue ground, when they were ouer-pressed; nor afraid to retorne, and renew the fight, vpon any small encouragement. As the roughnesse of the one, and patience of the other, serued mutually to reduce each of them to a good and firme temper; so the place which they hold in this battaile, added confidence joyntly vnto them both. For they saw themselves well and strongly flanked with Carthaginians and other Africans; whose name was growne terrible in Spain, by their Conquests; and in Gaul, by this their present warre. Since therefore it could not bee feared, that any great calamitie should fall vpon them, whilst the wings on either side stood fast: these Barbarians had no cause to shrink, or forbear to imploy the vtmost of their hardinesse, as knowing that the Enemy could not presse farre vpon them, without further engaging himselfe than discretion would allow. Hereunto may be added that great aduantage, which the Carthaginian had in horse; by which he was able, if the worke had happened, to make a good retreat. The effect of contraries is many times alike. Desperation begetteth courage; but not greater, nor so liuely, as doth assured Confidence. Hannibal therefore caused these Gauls and Spaniards to aduance; leaving void the place wherein they had stood, and into which they might fall back, when they should bee over-hardly pressed. So, casting them into the forme of a Crescent, hee made them as it were his Vantguard: the two points of this great halfe Moone, that looked toward the empty space from which he had drawne it, being narrow and thinn, as seruing only to guide it orderly back, when neede should require; the foremost part of the Ring, swelling out toward the enemies, being well strengthened and thickned against all impression. The circle hereof seemeth to haue bene so great, that it shadowed the Africans, who stood behinde it: though such figures, cut in bras, as I haue scene of this Battaile, present it more narrow; with little reason, as shall anon appeare: as also in the same figures it is omitted, That any Companies of Africans, or others, were left in the Rere, to second the Gauls and Spaniards, when they were driuen to retreat; though it be manifest, that Hannibal in yercel stood betwene the last ranks of his long batallions, and in the head of his reare, doubtlesse well accompanied with the choice of his owne Nation. Betwene the left battallion and the Ruer Ausidus, were the Gauls and Spanish horse, vnder the command of Ardubal: On the right wing, toward the wide Plaines, was Hanno (Linie saith Maharbal) with the Numidian light horse. Hannibal himselfe, with his brother Mago, had the leading of the Rere. The whole summe of Hannibals Armie in the field this day, was ten thousand horse, and fourtie thousand foot; his enemies hauing two to one against him in foot; and hee, five to three against them in horse.

The Roman Armie was marshalled in the vsuall forme: but somewhat more narrow, and deepe, than was accustomed; perhaps, because this had bene found convenient against the Carthaginians, in the former waye. It was indeede no bad way of resistance against Elephants to make the Ranks thick and short, but the Files long; as also to strengthen well the Rere, that it might stand fast compacted as a wall, vnder the shelter whereof the disordered troupes might re-allie themselves. Thus much it seemes, that Terentius had learned of some old Souldiers; and therefore he now ordered his Battailles accordingly, as meaning to shew more skill, than was in his vnderstanding. But the Carthaginians had here no Elephants with them in the field; their aduantage was in Horse, against which, this manner of combattall was very vnprofitable, inasmuch as their charge is better sustained in front, than vpon a long flanke. As for Emilius; it was not his day of command: He was but an Assistant, and in such cases it happens often, that wise men yeeld for very wearinesse vnto the more contentious. Vpon the right hand, and toward the Ruer, were the Roman horse-men, vnder the Consul Paulus: On the left wing, was C. Terentius Varro the other Consul, with the rest of the horse, which were of the Latines, and other Associates: Cn. Seruilius the former yeares Consul, had the leading of the battaile. The Sunne was newly risen, and offended neither part; the Carthaginians hauing their faces Northward; the Romans toward the South.

After some light skirmish, betwene the Roman Velites and Hannibal his Darters and slingers of the Balances: Ardubal brake vpon the Consul Paulus, and was roughly encountred; not after the manner of seruice on horse back, vsed in those times, wheeling about Alman-like; but each giuing on in a right line, Pouldron to Pouldron, as hauing the Ruer on the one hand, and the shoulder of the foot on the other hand; so that there was no way left, but to pierce and breake through. Wherefore they not only vled their Lances and Swordes; but rushing violently amongst the Enemies, grasped one another: and so, their horses running from vnder them, fill many to the ground; where starting vp againe, they beganne to deale blowes like foot-men. In conclusion, the Roman horse were ouer-borne, and driuen by plaine force to a staggering recoile. This the Consul Paulus could not remedie. For Ardubal, with his boisterous Gauls and Spaniards, was not to bee refilled by these Roman Gentlemen, vnequall both in number, and in horsemanship. When the battailes came to joyning, the Roman Legionaries found worke enough, and somewhat more than enough, to breake that great Crescent, vpon which they first fell: so strongly, for the while, did the Gauls and Spanish foot make resistance. Wherefore the two points of their battaile drew towards the midit; by whose aide, these Opposites were forced to disband, and lie back to their first place. This they did in great halfe and feare: and were with no lesse halfe, and follie, pursued. Vpon the Africans, that stood behinde them, they needed not to fall foule; both for that there was void roome enough; and forasmuch as the Rere, or Hornes of this Moone, pointed into the safe retreat, where Hannibal with his Carthaginians was ready to reinforce them, when time should require. In this battleretreat, or flight, of the Gauls and Spaniards, it hapned, as was necessarie, that they who had stood in the limbe or vter compass of the halfe Moone, made the innermost or concave surface thereof (disordered and broken though it were) when it was forced to turne the inside outward: the hornes or points thereof, as yet, vnouched, only turning round, and recoiling very little. So the Romans, in pursuing them, were inclosed in an halfe-circle; which they should not haue needed greatly to regard, (for that the sides of it were exceeding thinn and broken, and the bottome of it, none other than a throng of men rowted, and seeming vnable to make resistance) had all the enemies foot bene cast into this one great bodie, that was in a manner dissolved. But whilst the Legions, following their supposed victorie, rushed on vpon those that stood before them, and thereby vnnitwittingly engaged themselves deeply within the principall strength of the Enemies, hedging them in on both hands; the two African Battallions on either side aduanced so farre, that getting beyond the Rere of them, they inclosed them, in a manner, behinde: and forward they could not passe farre, without remosing Hannibal and Mago; which made that way the least easie. Hereby it is apparent, That the great Crescent, before spoken of, was of such extent, as couered the Africans; who lay behinde it vndiscovered, vntill now. For it is agreed, that the Romans were thus empaled vnawares; and that they behaued themselves, as men that thought vpon no other worke, than what was found them by the Gauls. Neither is it credible, that they would haue bene so mad, as to runne head-long with the whole bulke of their Armie, into the throat of slaughter; had they seene those weapons bent against them at the first, which when they did see, they had little hope to escape. Much might be imputed to their heat of fight, and rashnesse of inferior Capitaines: but since the Consul Paulus, a man so expert in warre, being vanquished in horse, had put himselfe among the Legions; it cannot bee supposed, that hee and they did wilfully thus engage themselves. Asdrubal, hauing broken the troups of Roman horse, that were led by the Consul Paulus, followed vpon them along the River side, beating downe, and killing, as many as he could, (which were almost all of them) without regard of taking prisoners. The Consul himselfe was either driuen vpon his owne Legions, or willingly did cast himselfe among them; as hoping by them to make good the day, notwithstanding the defeat of his horse. But he failed of this his expectation. Neuertheless hee cheered vp his men as well as hee could, both with comfortable wordes, and with the example of his own stout behaviour: beating downe, and killing many of the enemies with his owne hand. The like did Hannibal among his Carthaginians, in the same part of the battaile; and with better successe. For the Consul receiued a blow from a sling, that did him great hurt: and though a troupe of Roman Gentlemen, riding about him, did their best to saue him from further harme; yet was he so hardly laid at, that he was compelled, by wounds and weakenesse, to forsake his horse. Hereupon all his companie alighted, thinking that the Consul had giuen order so to doe: as in many battailes, the Roman men at armes had left their horses, to help their foot in distresse. When Hannibal (for he was neare at hand) perceived this, and vnderstood that the Consul had willed his horse-men to dismount; He was very glad of it, and pleasantly said, I had rather he would haue deliuered them vnto me, bound hand and foot: meaning, that he had them now almost as safe, as if they were so bound. All this while C. Terentius Varro, with the horse of the Associates, in the left wing, was mercifully troubled by Hanno (or Mabarbal) and the Numidians: who beating vp and downe about that great sandie Plaine, raised a foule dust; which a strong South winde, blowing thereaccustomarily, draue into the eyes and mouthes of the Romans. These, vying their aduantage both of number and of lightnesse, wearied the Consul and his followers exceedingly: neither giuing, nor sustaining any charge, but continually making offers, and wheeling about. Yet at the first they seemed to promise him a happy day of it. For when the battailes were euen readie to ioyne; five hundred of these Numidians came pricking away from their fellows, with their shields cast behinde their backs, (as was the manner of those which yielded) and, throwing downe their armes, rendred themselves. This was good luck to beginne withall, if there had bene good meaning. Varro had not leasure to examine them; but caused them, vnweaponed as they were, to get them behinde the Armie, where he had them rest quietly till all was done. These craftie aduenturers did as hee bad them, for a while; till they found opportunitie to put in execution the purpose, for which they had thus yielded. Vnder their lackets they had short swordes and poyards; besides which, they found other scattered weapons about the field, of such as were slaine, and therewithall flew vpon the hindmost of the Romans, whilst all eyes and thoughts were bent another way: so that they did great mischief, and raised yet a greater terrour. Thus Hannibal, in a plaine leuell ground, found meanes to lay an ambush at the back of his enemies. The last blow, that ended all fight and resistance, was giuen by the same hand which gaue the first. Asdrubal, hauing in short space broken the Roman troups of horse, and cut in peeces all, saue the Companie of Æmilius that rusted into the grosse of his foot, and a very few besides, that recovered some narrow passage, betwene the River and their owne Battalions; did not stay to charge vpon the face of the Legions, but fell back behinde the Rear of his owne, and fetching about, came vp to the Numidians: with whom hee ioyned, and gaue vpon Terentius. This fearefull cloude, as it shewed at the first appearance what weather it had left behinde it, on the other side: so did it prognosticate a dismall storme vnto those, vpon whom it was readie now to fall. Wherefore Terentius his followers, hauing wearied themselves much in doing little, and seeing more worke toward, than they could hope to sustaine; thought it the best way, to auoide the danger by present flight. The Consul was no lesse wife than they, in apprehending the greatnesse of his owne perill; nor more desperate, in striuing to worke impossibilities: it being impossible, when so many thranke from him, to sustaine the impression alone, which he could not haue endured with their assistance. Now hee found, that it was one thing to talke of Hannibal at Rome; and another, to encounter him. But of this; or of ought else, excepting halte flight, his present leisure would not serue him to consider. Close at the heeles of him and his flying troups, followed the light Numidians: appointed by Asdrubal vnto the pursuit, as fittest for that seruice. Asdrubal himselfe, with the Gauls and Spanis horse, compassing about, fell vpon the backs of the Romans; that were ere this hardly distressed, and in a manner surrounded on all parts else. He brake them easily; who before made ill resistance, being inclosed, and laid at on euery side, not knowing which way to turne. Here beganne a pitifull laughter: the vanquished multitude thronging vp and downe, they knew not whither or which way, whilst euery one sought to auoide the enemies, whom hee saw nearest. Some of the Roman Gentlemen that were about Æmilius, got vp to horse, and saued themselves: which though it is hardly vnderstood how they could doe; yet I will rather beleue it, than suppose that Æmilius reporteth, to grace thereby his Historie with this following tale. C. Cornelius Lentulus, galloping along by a place, where he saw the Consul sitting all blouided vpon a horse, entreated him to rise and saue himselfe; offering him his assistance and horse. But Paulus refused it; willing Lentulus to fight for himselfe, and not to loose time: saying, That it was not his purpose to be brought againe into iudgement by the People, either as an accuser of his Colleague, or as guiltie himselfe of that dayes losse. Further he willed Lentulus to commend him to the Senate, and in particular to Fabius: willing them to fortifie Rome, as fast and well as they could; and telling Fabius, that hee liued and died mindfull of his whole (some counsaile). These wordes (peraduenture) or some to like purpose, the Consul vttered to Lentulus, either when against his will he was drawne to that Battaille, or when hee beheld the first defeat of his Horse; at what time he put himselfe in the head of his Legions. For I doubt not, but Hannibal knew vnto what he said a good while before this; when he thought the Consul and his troupe, in little better case than if they had bene bound. The whole Grosse of the Romans, was inclosed indeede as within a sack, vwhereof the African Battalions made the sides; the Spaniards, Gauls, and Hannibal with his Carthaginians, the bottom; and Asdrubal with his horse, closed vp the mouth: in which part, they first of all were thrust together, and beganne the Rout, vwherein all the reil followed. Æmilius therefore, who could not sit his horse, whilst the battaile yet lasted, and whilst the spaces were somewhat open, by which hee might haue withdrawne himselfe; was now (had he neuer so well bene mounted) vnable to fly, hauing in his vway so close a throng of his owne miserable followers, and so many heapes of bodies, as fell apace in that great Carnage. It sufficeth vnto his honour, That in the Battaille hee fought no lesse valiantly, than hee had vnto before, both abtained himselfe, and dissuaded his fellow-Consul, from fighting at all. If, when the day was vtterly lost, it had laine in his power to saue his owne life, vnto the good of his Countrie, neuer more needing it; I should thinke, that hee either too much distressed himselfe, or being too faintly minded, was vncare of the World, and his vnthankfull Citizens. But if such a resolution were praise vnto him in Æmilius, as proceeding out of Roman valour; then was the English vertue of the Lord John Talbot, Viscount Lisle, sonne to that famous Earle of Shrewsburie, who died in the Battaille of Chastillon, more highly to be honoured. For Æmilius was old, graciously, if not mortally, wounded, and accomptable for the ouerthrow received: Talbot was in the floure of his youth, unhurt, easily able to haue escaped, and not answerable for that dayes misfortune, when he refused to forsake his father; who foreseeing the losse of the battaile, and not meaning to staine his actions past by flying in his old age, exhorted this his noble sonne to be gone, and leaue him.

In this terrible ouerthrow died all the Roman foot, saue two or three thousand, who (as Liue saith) escaped into the lesser campe; whence, the same night, about five hundred of them brake forth, and joyning with such of those in the greater campe, as were willing to trie their fortune, conueyed themselves away ere morning, about foure thousand foot, and two hundred horse, partly in whole troup, 10 partly dispersed, into Cannu/um: the next day, the Roman Camps, both lesse and greater, were yeelded vnto Hannibal by those that remained in them. Polybius hath no mention of this escape: only he reports, that the ten thousand, whom Emilius had left on the West side of Aufidus (as was shewed before) to set vpon the campe of Hannibal, did as they were appointed; but ere they could effect their desire, which they had well-near done, the battaile was lost: and Hannibal, comming ouer the water to them, draue them into their owne campe; which they quickly yeelded, hauing lost two thousand of their number. Like enough it is, that at the first fight of Hannibal, comming vpon them with his victorious Armie, a great number of these did flie; and the eby escaped, whilest their fellows, making defence in vaine, 20 retired into their campe, and held the Enemie buied. For about two Legions they were (perhaps not halfe full, but made vp by addition of others, whose fault or fortune was like) that hauing serued at Canna, were afterwards extremely disgraced by the State of Rome, for that they had abandoned their Companions fighting. Of the Roman horse what numbers escaped it is vncertaine: but very few they were that saued themselves in the first charge, by getting behinde the Riuier; and Terentius the Consul recovered Venusia, with three score and ten at the most in his companie. That he was so ill attended, it is no mirraile: for Venusia lay many miles off to the Southward; so that his nearest way thither, had bene through the mid of Hannibals Armie, if the passage had bene open. Therefore it must needs be, that when once he got out of sight, he returned vp some by-way; so disappointing the Numidians that hunted centre. Of such as could not hold pace with the Consul, but tooke other waies, and were scattered ouer the fields; two thousand, or thereabouts, were gathered vp by the Numidians, and made prisoners: the rest were slaine, all fivee three hundred; who dispersed themselves in flight, as chance led them, and got into sundrie Townes. There died in this great Battaille of Canna, besides L. Amilius Paullus the Consul, two of the Roman Quætors or Treasurers, and one and twentie Colonells or Tribunes of the Souldiers, foure score Senators, or such as had borne Office, out of which they were to be chosen into the Senate. Many of these were of especiall make, as hauing bene Aediles, Prætors, or Consuls: among whom was Cn. 40 Scipilius the last yeres Consul, and Atinutius, late Master of the horse. The number of prisoners, taken in this battaile, Liue makes no greater than three thousand four, and three hundred horse: too few to haue defended, for the space of one halfe houre, both the Roman camps; which yet the same Liue saith, to haue bene ouer-cowardly yeelded vp. We may therefore doe better, to giue credit vnto one of the prisoners, whom the same Historian shortly after introduceth speaking in the Senate, and saying, That they were no lesse than eight thousand. It may therefore be, that these three thousand were only such as the Enemie spared, when the furie of Execution was past: but to these must be added about five thousand more, who yeelded in the greater campe, when their companie were either slaine or fled. 50 So the reckoning falls out right: which the Romans, especially the Consul Varrus, had before cast vp (as we say) without their Host; nothing so chargeable, as now they finde it. On the side of Hannibal there died some foure thousand Gauls, fifteene hundred Spaniards and Africans, and two hundred horse, or thereabouts: a losse not not sensible, in the joy of so great a victorie; which if he had pursued, as Atahabal aduised him, and forthwith marched away towards Rome; it is little doubted, but that the Warre had presently bene at an end. But hee believed not so farre in his owne prosperitie; and was therefore told, That he knew how to get, not how to lose, a victorie.

Of things following the battaile at Canna.

10 Not without good cause doth Polybius reprehend those two Historians, Fabius the Roman, and Philinus the Carthaginian: who regarding more the pleasure of them, vnto whose honour they consecrated their tra- uailles, than the truth of things, and information of posteritie, magnified indifferently, whether good or bad, all actions and proceedings, the one of his Carthaginians, the other of his Roman Quirites and Fathers conscript. No man of sound judgement will condemne this libertie of censure, which Polybius hath vied. For, to recompence his junioritie, (such as it was) hee produceth sub- 15 stantiall arguments, to iustifie his owne Relation; and confute the vanitie of those former Authors, out of their owne writings, by conference of places ill cohering: which paines it is to be suspected, that hee would not haue taken, had hee bene borne in either of these two Cities, but haue spared some part of his diligence, and bene contented, to haue all men thinke better and more honourably than it deserued, of his owne Countrey. The like disease it is to be feared, that we shall hereafter finde in others; and shall haue cause to wish, that either they were somewhat lesse Roman, or else, that some Workes of their opposite Writers were extant, that so we might at least heare both sides speake: being henceforth delitute of Polybius his helpe, that was a man indifferent. But since this cannot be, we must be 30 sometimes bold, to obserue the coherence of things; and belieue so much only to be true, as dependeth vpon good reason, or (at least) faire probability. This attentive circumspection is needfull euen at the present: such is the repugnancie, or forgetfulness, which we finde in the best Narration, of things following the Battaille of Canna. For it is said, that foure thousand foot and horse gathered together about the Consul Terentius at Venusia; that others, to the number of ten thousand, got into Cannu/um, choosling for their Captaines yong P. Scipio, and Ap. Claudius; yet that the Consul Terentius Varro, joyning his companie vnto those of Scipio at Cannu/um, wrote vnto the Senate, that hee had now well-near ten thousand men about him; that these letters of the Consul were brought to Rome, when the Senate was newly 40 risen, that had bene taking order for pacifying those tumults in the Citie, which grew vpon the first bruit of the ouerthrow; and yet, that Embassadors from Capua (after some consultation, whether it were meet to send any, or without further circumstance, to side with Hannibal) were sent vnto Terentius, and found him at Venusia, a prerie while before he wrote those letters, which ouer-tooke (in a manner) at Rome the first newes of the ouerthrow. Among such incoherencies, I hold it the best way, to omit so much as hath not some particular connexion with matter en- 50 suing: mutuall dependencie in things of this nature, being no small argument of truth.

When Hannibal had sacked the Roman campe, and trusted vp the spoiles, forth- with hee dislodged, and marched away into Samnium; finding a disposition in the Hopines, and many other people thereabout, to forsake the Roman partie, and make alliance with Carthage. The first Towne that opened the gates vnto him, was Cassia, where he laid vp his baggage: and leauing his brother Mago to take in other places, He halted into Campania. The generall affection of the Multitude, in all the Cities of Italie, was inclinable vnto him; not only in regard of their grievous losses, sustained abroad in the fields, which the Romans themselves, who could not hinder him from spoiling the Countrey, especially the poorer sort of them, did hardly endure; but in a loving respect vnto that great courtesie (as it seemed) which he vied, vnto each of them as became his prisoners. For as at other times, so now also after his great victorie at Canna, He had lovingly dismissed as many of the Italian Confederates of Rome, as fell into his hands: rebuking them gently for being so obstinate, against him that had fought to deliuer them from bondage. Neither spared hee to winne their loue with gifts; pretending, to admire their valour; but seeking indeede, by all waies and means, to make them his, whilst all other motives were concurrent. At this time also hee beganne to deale kindly (though against his nature) with his Roman prisoners: telling them, that he bore no mortall hatred vnto their Estate; but being provoked by injuries, fought to right himselfe and his countrey; and fought with them, to trie which of the two Cities, Rome or Carthage, should beare soueraigne Rule, not, which of them should be destroyed. So he gaue them leaue to chooſe ten of their number, that should bee sent home to treat with the Fathers about their ranſome: and together with these, he sent Carthage a Nobleman of Carthage, and Generall of his Horse, to seele the disposition of the Senate; whether it were bowed as yet by so much aduersitie, and could stoope vnto desire of peace. But with the Romans these artes prevailed not, as shall bee shew'd in due place. The people of Italie, all or most of them, saue the Roman Colonies, or the Latines, were not only wearie of their losses past, but entertained a deceivable hope, of changing their old Societie for a better. Wherefore not only the Samnites, Lucans, Bruttians, and Apulians, ancient enemies of Rome, and not vntill the former generation vterly subdued, beganne to re-assume their wonted spirits: but the Campanians, a Nation of all other in Italie most bound vnto the State of Rome, and by many mutuall affinities therewith as freightly conioyned, as were any saue the Latines, changed on a sudden their loue into hatred; without any other cause found, than change of fortune.

Campania, is the most goodly and fruitfull Prouince of Italie, if not (as some then thought) of all the Earth: and the Citie of Capua, answerable vnto the Countrey, whereof it was Head, so great, faire, and wealthie, that it seemed no lesse conuenient a seat of the Empire, than was either Rome or Carthage. But of all qualities, brauerie is the least requisite vnto soueraigne command. The Campanians were luxurious, idle, and proud: and valuing themselves, like layes by their feathers, despised the vnsortunate vertue of the Romans their Patrons, and Benefactors. Yet were there some of the principall among them, as in other Cities, that bore especiall regard vnto the maiestie of Rome, and could not endure to heare of Innoation. But the Plebeian faction had lately so prevailed within Capua, that all was governed by the pleasure of the Multitude; which wholly followed the direction of Pacuvius Calpurnius, an ambitious Noble-man, whose credit grew, and was vp-held, by furthering all popular desires: whereof, the conjunction with Hannibal was not the least. Some of the Capuans had offered their Citie to the Carthaginian, shortly after the battaile of Thrasymene: wherupon chiefly it was, that Hannibal made his iourne into Campania; the Dictator Fabius waiting vpon him. At that time, either the newnes of the Roman Armie, or some other feare of the Capuans, hindered them from breaking into actual rebellion. They had indeed no leisure, to treat about any articles of new Confederacie: or had leisure seuered, yet were the Multitude (whose inconstant loue Hannibal had wonne from the Romans, by gentle vſage, and free dismissing, of some prisoners in good account among them) vnable to hold any such negotiation, without aduice of the Senate; which mainly impugned it. So they that had promised to yeeld vp their towne to Hannibal, &c. to meet him on the way, with some of their nobilitie, that should assure him of all faithfull meanings; were driuen to sit still, in a great perplexitie: as hauing failed to let in this their new friend, yet sufficiently discouered themselves, themselves, to draw vpon them the hatred of the Romans. In this case were no small number of the Citizens: who thereupon grew the more incensed against their Senate; on whom they cast all the blame, easily pardoning their owne cowardize. The People, holding so tender a regard of libertie, that euen the lawfull Government of Magistrates grieved them, with an imaginative oppression; had now good cause to feare, lest the Senators would become their Lords indeede, and by helpe of the Romans, bring them vnder a more streight subiection, than euer they had endured. This feare, being readie to breake into some outrage, Pacuvius made vse of, to serue his owne ambition. He discoursed vnto the Senate, as they sat in Councell, about these motions troubling the Citie: and said, That he himselfe had both married a Roman Ladie, and given his Daughter in marriage to a Roman; but, that the danger of forsaking the Roman partie was not now the greatest: for that the People were violently bent euen to murder all the Senate, and afterward to ioyne themselves with Hannibal; who should countenance the fact, and saue them harmless. This he spake, as a man well knowne to be beloued himselfe by the People, and priue vnto their designs. Having thoroughly terrified the Senate, by laying open the danger hanging ouer them: He promised neuertheless to deliuer them all, and to set things in quiet, if they would freely put themselves into his hands; offering his oath, or any other assurance that they should demand, for his faithfull meaning. They all agreed. Then shutting vp the Court, and placing a Guard of his owne followers about it, that none might enter, nor issue forth, without his leaue, He called the People to assembly; and speaking as much ill of the Senate, as he knew they would bee glad to heare, hee told them, that these wicked Gouvernours were surpris'd by his pollicie, and all fast, readie to abide what sentence they would lay vpon them. Only thus much he aduised them, as a thing which necessitie required, That they should chooſe a new Senate, before they satisfied their anger vpon the old. So rehearsing vnto them the names of one or two Senators, hee asked what their iudgement was of those. All cried out, that they were worthe of death, Choosethen (said he) first of all some new ones into their places. Hereat the Multitude, vnprovided for such an election, was silent; vntill at last, some one or other aduentured to name whom he thought fit. The men so nominated, were vtterly disliked by the whole Assembly; either for some knowne fault, baselesse, and insufficiencie; or else euen because they were vnknowne, and therefore held vnworthie. This difficultie in the new Election appearing more and more, whilst more were to be chosen; (the fittest men to be substituted, hauing bene named among the first, and not thought fit enough) Pacuvius entreated, and easily prevailed with the people, that the present Senate might for this time be spared, in hope of amends hereafter; which (doubtlesse) they would make, hauing thus obtained pardon of all offences past. Henceforth, not only the People, as in former times, honoured Pacuvius, and esteemed him their Patron; but the Senators also, were gouerned by him: to whom they acknowledged themselves indebted, for suing all their liues. Neither did the Senate faile after this, by all obsequiousnesse, to court the People; giuing the reines vnto their lawlesse Will, who else were likely to cast them downe: All the Citie being thus of one minde; only feare of the Romans, kept them from opening their gates to Hannibal. But after the Battaille at Canna, this impediment was removed: and few there were, that would open their mouths to speake against the Rebellion. Yet so farre as three hundred principall Gentlemen of the Campanians, did then serue the Romans in the Isle of Sicill: the Parents and Kinsmen of these prevailed so farre, that Embassadors were sent vnto Terentius the Consul; to see his present case, and what it could minister of Hope or Feare. These, wherefoer they found him, found him weakly attended, and as weak in spirit, as in followers. Yet they offered him formally the seruice of their State; and desired to know what he would command them. But he most basely lamented vnto them, the greatnesse of the Roman misfortune: saying, that all was lost; and that the Campanians must now, not helpe the Romans, who had nothing left wherewith to helpe themselves, but, make warre in their defence against the Carthaginians; as the Romans had sometimes done for the Campans against the Sannites. Hereunto hee is said to haue added a foolish Inuention, against Hannibal and his Carthaginians: telling, How he had taught them to make bridges of slaughtered carcases, and to feede vpon mans flesh; with such other stiffe, as only bewraied his owne feare. As for the Campans themselves, He put them in minde of their present strength: they hauing thirtie thousand foot, and foure thousand horse; with monie, and all prouisions, in abundance. Thus he dismissed them, prouder than they came: and filled them with conceit of getting a great Lordship; whereas before, they were somewhat timorous, in aduenturing to seeke their owne libertie. Hauing reported this at Capua: the same Embassadors were dispatched away to Hannibal, with whom they casily made Alliance, vpon these conditions: That the Campans should be absolutely free, and ruled by their owne Lawes; That no Citizen of theirs should bee subiect vnto any Carthaginian Magistrate, in what case soeuer, whether in Warre, or Peace; and, That Hannibal should deliuer vnto the Campans three hundred Roman prisoners, such as they themselves would chooe, whom they might exchange for their Gentlemen which were in Sicil.

Against all this Negotiation, Decius Magius an honorable Citizen opposed himselfe earnestly: wing, in vaine, many perswasions, to the wilfull and head-strong Multitude; whom he put in minde of Pyrhus and the Tarentines, wishing them not to change old friends for new acquaintance. This did he, when they were sending Embassadors to Hannibal: and this also did he, when the new Alliance was concluded; but most earnestly, when a Carthaginian Garrison was entering the Towne: at which time he gaue advice, either to keepe it out, or to fall vpon it, and cut it in peeces, that, by such a notable peece of seruice, they might make amends vnto the Romans, whom they had forsaken.

Aduertisement hereof was giuen to Hannibal: who lying about Naples not farre off, sent for Magius to come speake with him in the campe. This Magius refused: alleging, that he was, by the late concluded Articles, free from subiection vnto any Carthaginian; and therefore would not come. Hannibal thereupon hastened himselfe towards Capua: forbearing to attempt any further vpon Naples; which he thought to haue taken in his way by Scalade, but found the walls too high, and was not well provided, to lay siege vnto it. At Capua hee was entertained with great solemnitie and pompe: all the people issuing forth of the Towne, to behold that great Commander, which had wonne so many noble victories. Hauing taken his pleasure in the sight of that goodly Citie, and passed ouer his first Entertainements; He came into their Senate: where he commended their resolution, in shaking off the Roman yoke; promising, that ere long all Italie, and Rome it selfe, should bee driuen to acknowledge Capua as chiefe, and receiue Law from thence. As for Decius Magius, who openly tooke part with the Romans their enemies; Hee prayed that, that they would not thinke him a Campian, but a Traitor to the State; and vse him accordingly, giuing sentence out of hand vpon him, as he deserved. This was granted: and Magius, deliuered vnto Hannibal; who vnwilling to offend the Capuans, at his first coming, by putting so great a man to death, yet fearing that they might sue for his libertie, if hee kept him aliuie, thought it best to send him away to Carthage. Thus Hannibal settled his friendship with the Campans: among whom, only this Decius Magius had openly dared to speake against him; being assisted by Perolla the sonne of Pacuvius. This Perolla would haue murdered Hannibal, whilst hee was at supper, the first night of his coming; had not his Fathers authoritie kept him from making any such attempt. All the Towne (besides) were so earnest in the loue of their new Societie, that they are said to haue murdered all the Romans, vpon whom at the present they could lay hand; or, (which is all one) to haue smothered them to death in an hot Bathe.

The

The same course of fortune, with those of Capua, ranne some other Townes thereabouts, which depended on this, as their Mother-Citie. Nola, Nuceris, Naples, Casertine, and Acerra, were the Cities next adjoining, that stood out for the Romans. Against these Hannibal went, thinking to finde them weakly manned as they were indeede, though stoutly defended.

The Romans at this time were not in case, to put Garrisons into all their walled Townes; but were faine to leaue all places, except a few of the most suspected, vnto the faith and courage of the Inhabitants. Rome it selfe was in extreme feare of Hannibal, coming at the first report of the ouerthrow at Cannae: and the griefe of that losse was so generall, and immoderate, that it much disturbed the prouision against apparent danger. It was hard to iudge, whether the losse alreadie received, or the feare of destruction presently threatening, were the more terrible. All the Senators found worke enough, to stint the noise and lamentable bewailings, whereof the streets were full. Courriers were sent forth, to bring assured tidings how all went: whereof when letters from the Consul Varro had thoroughly informed them, they were so amazed, that they ranne into barbarous superstition; and taking direction (as was said) from their fatal bookes, buried aliuie two men and women Gauls and Greekes, in their Oxe-market. If the bookes of Sibyl gaue them such instructions; we may iustly thinke, that Sibyl herselfe was instructed by the Deuill. Yet is it not improbable, that extremitie of feare caused them to hearken to wicked Sooth-sayers; who's detestable counsailes they afterwards, for their owne honour, (as ashamed of such Authors) imputed to the bookes of Sibyl. An Embassadour was sent to Delphi, to consult the Oracle of Apollo; and enquire, with what prayers and supplications they might pacifie the Gods; and obtaine an end of these calamities. This is enough to discouer the greatnesse of their feare; though not fruing to giue remedie. At the same time came letters out of Sicil, from the Prætor Octavius; whom the Senate had appointed, if he found it meet, to passe ouer into Africk. In these were contained newes, of one Carthaginian fleet, that waited the Kingdome of Syren their good friend and confederate; and of another fleet, riding among the Isles Ægeis, which was in readinesse to set vpon Durbeum, and the rest of the Roman Province, if the Prætor stirred aside, to the rescue of Syren.

In the midst of these extremities, it was thought needfull to call home Tarentinus the Consul, that he might name a Dictator, to take soeueraigne charge of the Weale publique, with absolute power, as necessitie required. It must needs seeme strange, that all sorts of people went forth to meet the Consul, and bid him welcome home, giuing him thanks for that he had not departed of the Weale publique. Use this was done (as may seeme) by order from the Senate; which altho (doubtlesse) provided wisely, for vp-holding the generall reputation. In his coming into the Citie, had renewed the lamentations and out-cries of the people: what else would haue followed, than a contempt of their wretchednesse, among those, that were subiect vnto their Dominion? Now in finding this occasion (though indeede he gaue it not) of bestowing vpon him their welcome, and thanks; they noised abroad a fame, which came perhaps vnto the eares of Hannibal, of their Magnanimitie and Confidence: that might seeme grounded on their remaying through them. This therefore was wisely done: But whereas Linus would haue vs thinke, that it was done generously, and out of great spirit; let me be pardoned, if I beleue him not. It was done fearfully, and to couer their griefe: had they dared to shew their indignation, they would haue struck off his head; as in few yeares after, Cn. Fulvius had his life brought into question, and was banished by them, being lesse blame-worthy, for a smaller offence. Cl. Iunius, by appointment of the Senate, was nominated Dictator; and T. Sempronius, Master of the horse. These fell presently to multering of Souldiers, of whom they raised foure new Legions, and a thousand horse: though with much difficultie; as being faine to take vp some, that were very Boies. These foure Legions, are elsewhere forgotten, in accompt of the forces leuied by this Dictator and two Legions only fet downe, that had bene enrolled in the beginning of the yeare for custodie of the Citie. Wherefore it may be, that these two Legions being drawne into the field; foure new ones of Prætorians, or Striplings, were left in their places. In such raw Souldiers, and so few, little confidence was to bee reposed; for which reason they increased their number, by adding vnto them eight thousand sturdie slaues, that were put in hope of libertie, if they should deserue it by manfull seruice. This not sufficing; the Dictator proclaimed, that whosoever ought monie and could not pay it, or had committed any capital offence, should forthwith bee discharged of his debt, or punishment, if he would serue in the Warre. To arme these Companies, they were faine to take downe, out of their Temples and Porches, the spoiles of their enemies that had bene there set vp: among which, were fix thousand Armour of the Gauls, that had bene carried in the Triumph of C. Flaminius, a little before the beginning of this Warre. To such mockerie had God brought the pride of the Romans, as a due reward of their insolent oppressions, that they were faine to issue forth of their owne gates, in the habit of strangers, when Hannibal was readie to encounter them with his Africans, armed Roman-like.

About the same time it was, that Carthala, with the Agents of the prisoners taken at Canna, came to Rome. Carthala was not admitted into the Citie, but commanded, whilst he was on the way, to be gone ere night out of the Roman Territorie. To the Messengers of the captiues, audience was given by the Senate. They made earnest Petition, to be ransomed at the publicke charge; not only the teares and lamentation of their poore kins-folke, but the great neede, wherein the Citie then stood, of able Souldiers, commending their iurie; which yet they obtained not: Besides the general custome of the Romans (held by long Tradition, and strengthened by a notable Precedent, when Regulus was ouerthrowne, and taken prisoner in the former warre) not to be too tender of such as had yeelded to the Enemy; much was alleged against these who now craued ransome: but the speciall point was, that they were wilfully lost, since they might haue saved themselves, as others did. It sufficed not vnto these poore men, to say, that their offence was no greater than the Consul's: they were told, that this was great presumption. The truth was, the State wanted monie; and therefore could not want excuses, whereby to auoid the disbarment: whether it were so, or not, that any such Plea was held about this matter of redemption, as we finde recorded. Neither must wee regard it, that the slaues which were armed for the warre, are said to haue cost more, than the summe did amount vnto, that would haue ransomed these prisoners. For this is but a tale, devised to countenance the Roman proceedings, as if they had bene seuer; when as in dedde they were futeable to the present fortune, poore, and somewhat beggarly. Hereof it is no little prooffe, that Hannibal valued those Roman slaues, whom he had taken in the campe among their Masters, at no more, than euery one the third part of a common Souldiers ransome: and likely it is, that hee offered them at the price, whereas he thought them current. But if we should suppose, that by trading with Hannibal, a better bargaine for slaues might haue bene made, than was by the State at home, in dealing with priuate men; yet must we withall consider, that these priuate men did only lend these slaues for a while vnto the Common-wealth, and were afterwards contented to forbeare the price of them (when by order from the Senate they were enfranchised) vntill the warre should bee ended. If Hannibal would haue giuen such long day of payment; it is likely that the Romans would haue bene his chapmen: but seeing he dealt only for readie monie, they chose rather to say, We will not giue, than, We cannot. The like austeritie, vpon the same reason, but contrarie pretence, was vsed toward the Souldiers that escaped from that great Bataille. These were charged, for hauing fled: as the prisoners were, for not flying, when they might haue done so. True it is, that in such cases (if cuer) that which they call ragione del Stato may serue for an excuse: when the Common-wealth being driuen to a miserable Exigent, is faine to helpe it selfe, by doing iniurieth

priuate men. And so dealt the Romans now: condemning all those that had serued at Canna, to be transported into Sicily; and there to serue, not as others did vntill they had fulfilled twentie yeares in the warres, or else were fiftie yeares of age; but vntill this warre should bee ended, how long fouer it lasted, and that without reward. The same thriftie censure, was afterwards laid vpon others, for their misbehaviour: but neuer vpon any man of qualitie, save only (a good while after this, at better leisure) vpon Cassius Metellus, and a few other hare-brained fooles his companions; who being frighted out of their wits, with the terrour of so great a losse, were deuiling, after the battaile, which way to runne out of Italie, when Hannibal as yet had scarce one Towne within it. The inequality of this rigour grew shortly distastfull to the Commonaltie: and was openly blamed by a Tribune of the People; neuertheless it was quietly digested, the excuse being no lesse apparent than the fault.

M. Iunius the Dictator, hauing dispatched all needfull businesse within the Citie, tooke the field with five and twentie thousand men. What he did with this Arme, I cannot finde: nor more of him, than this, That he spent the time about Campania; where (as may be presumed) he was not idle. To him therefore perhaps it may be ascribed, that Hannibal did no greater euill: for of any euill done to Hannibal, by the Romans in this their weake citate, only Marcellus had the honour. Marcellus, being then one of the Prætors, lay at Ofizia with a fleet, readie to set saile for Sicily, hauing one Legion aboard his ships, and fiftene hundred other Souldiers newly taken vp: with which forces he was to defend that Island, and doe what harme hee could in Africa. But hearing of the ouerthrow at Canna, he sent these of his new Leuie to Rome, for defence of the Citie; and marched hastily with his Legion toward Canusium: deliuering the fleet, emptie of Souldiers, to P. Furius his Colleague. Thence was he called by the Magistrates, and chiefe Citizens of Ofizia, to help them: who were like to be forced by the Multitude (assisted, as were the rest of the Campanians) to let in the Carthaginians; and knew not how to auoid this otherwise, than by seeming to deliberate about the Articles of this new Confederacie. Wherefore he made great journies thitherward; and arrived even time enough to prevent the Enemy. Many idle walkes Hannibal made, betwixt Nola and Naples: assaying by faire wordes, and terrible threats, the one and the other Citie. Naples was strong, and not infected with any the least touch of disloyaltie: it had also a sure Haucn; whereby it stood in the lesse feare, of sustayning much inconuenience, by spoile of the Lands and Villages abroad in the Countrey. But at Nola it was thought a valuable consideration, that Hannibal was Master of the field: which if he laid waste, all the poore people were vtterly vndone. So thought the Multitude: and such talkes &c. some, that had little feare of their owne priuate want or povertie, but a great desire to gratifie the Carthaginian. Of these, one Z. Bantius was chiefe; a stout yong Gentleman, and Souldier of especiall marke, well beloued in the Citie, and one that had done good seruice to the Romans: but was found by Hannibal, halfe dead at Canna, and after much gentle vsage, good attendance, and cure of his wounds, friendly dismissed with liberall gifts. Hee therefore thought, that it concerned him in honour, to returne the greatest thanks he could vnto so courteous an Enemy. Marcellus perceiving this, wrought vpon the same case nature of the Gentleman: and taking notice of him, as if it had bene by chance, seemed to wonder, why one that had so well deserved of the Roman State, had not repaired vnto him the Prætor, who desired nothing more than such acquaintance. So with many commendations, gifts, and louing entertainment, being himselfe also a man highly reputed for his personall valour, he made this Bantius so farre in loue with him, that nothing could be attempted within Nola, against the Romans, whereof he had not presently aduertisement. At the coming of Marcellus, Hannibal removed from about Nola; and assaid, as formerly he had done, the Neapolitans: but they had lately taken in a Roman Garrison; vpon confidence whereof they gaue him a peremptorie answer, to his discontent. Thence went he to Neueris: which he tooke by composition; and so returned back againe against Nola. Hee was not ignorant, what good affection the common people of Nola bore vnto him: who although they durst not stirre in his quarrell, being ouerawed by the Roman Garrison; yet if they saw Marcellus hardly besieged, and forced to turne his care from watching them within, to repelling the enemies assailing him without, like enough it seemed, that they would not bee wanting vnto the accomplishment of their owne desires. Hee therefore brought his Armie close to the Towne, and skirmished often with Marcellus: not in hope thereby to doe much good, but only to make shew of a meaning to force the Towne; which hee sought in the meane while to take by intelligence. In the night-time there passed messages betwene him and the Citizens his partakers: whereby it was concluded, That if once Marcellus, with all his forces, could bee trained into the field, the Multitude within the Towne should presently rise; and seizing vpon the gates, exclude him as an Enemy. Of this Negotiation Marcellus was aduertised: and fearing, lest the Conspirators would shortly aduenture, even to finde him busied within the Citie, whilst the Carthaginians should scale the walls; he thought it the surest way to cut off the enemies hope, and send him away betimes. Wherefore ordering his men in three Companies, within three severall gates looking towards the Enemy: Hee gave a freight command, that all the Citizens should keep their houses. Thus hee lay close a good part of the day, to the enemies great wonder; against whom hee had customarily issued forth before more early, euery day, to skirmish. But when it was further noted, that the walls were bare, and not a man appearing on them; then thought Hannibal, that surely all was discovered, and Marcellus now busied with the Citizens. Whereupon hee had his men bring ladders, and make readie for the assault; which was done in all haste. But when the Carthaginians were at the very walls, and thought nothing lesse, than that the Romans would meet them in the field: suddenly the middle gate was opened, wherout Marcellus, with the best and oldest of his Souldiers, brake forth vpon them, with a great noise, to make his vnexpected fallie the more terrible. Whilst the Carthaginians, much out of order, were some of them flying before Marcellus, the rest making head against him: the other two gates opened, wherout like fort issued they of the new-leiued Companies vpon the enemies backs. The sudden terror was more auailable vnto the Romans, than their force: yet the Execution was so great, that this was accounted as a victorie, and reputed one of the bravest Acts performed in all that warre; forasmuch as hereby it was first proued, that Hannibal might be ouercome. After this, Marcellus, being freed from his enemies that were departed, tooke a strict account of the Citizens of Nola: condemning about three score and ten of high Treason, whose heads hee struck off; and so leaving the Towne in quiet obedience vnto their Senate, went and incamped hard by about Suessula. Hannibal in the meane season was gone to Acerra: where being excluded, he thought it no wisdom to loose time in perswasions, but laid siege vnto it, and beganne on all sides to close it vp. This terrified the People, who know themselves vnable to hold out. Therefore, before his Workes were finished, and they quite surrounded; they stole out by night, and left him the Towne empty: which hee lacked and burnt. Then hearing newes of the Dictator, that he was about Casiline, thither went Hannibal: as being vnwilling, that an Enemy to neare should disquiet him at Capua; where hee meant to Winter. It seemed, or rather indecide it plaine, that the late victorie of Marcellus had nothing abated the spirit of the Carthaginian: who durst vvith a small part of his Armie lecke out the Dictator, that had with him the heart of the Roman strength. Wherefore the joy of his Enemies, vpon so slight an occasion as the death of some two thousand of his men, at the most, and those not slaine in plaine battaile, but by a sudden eruption; witnesseth chiefly, in what great feare they stood of Hannibal, and how Crell-fallen they were: that hauing three yeares since demanded at Carthage, the bodie of Hannibal, to be deliuered vnto their pleasure, by his owne Citizens; could now please themselves, as with good newes, to heare, That in a skirmish not farre from

from Rome he appeared to be a man, and not resistlesse. At Caslinum the Dictator was not: but many Companies of Italians, Confederates of Rome, were gotten into the Towne, and held it. Five hundred of the Prænestines there were, and about foure hundred of Perusia, with some of the Latinæ. All these had the good hap, to come too late to the Battaille of Canna, being sent by their severall States to the campe: whither whilst they were marching, the tidings of that great misfortune encountered them, and sent them back sorrowfull; for they loued well their Lords the Romans, vnder whose gouernement they liued happily. So came they all, one after another, to Casiline, where they met and staid. Neither had they staid there long, ere they heard newes from Capua, How that great Citie became the Ring-leader of all the Campanians into rebellion. The people of Casiline were affected as they of Capua: and therefore fought how to rid their hands of those Prænestines and their fellows; but the Souldiers were too hard for them, and after many traites laid one for another, at last they slew all the Townefolke in a night, and fortified the Western part of the Towne (for it was diuided by the Riuer Vulturius) against the Enemy. If they had runne away with the goods, and pretended, that these of Casiline were, as the rest of the Campanians, all Traitors; they themselves might haue been reputed, as no better than the Mamertines. But their constancie in defence of the place witnesseth, vpon what honest reasons they surprised it. Hannibal came thither, thinking to haue encountered with greater forces: but these few found him more worke than he expected. Diuers assaults hee gaue, but was still repelled with losse: and many fallies they made, with variable euent. The Enemy mined; and they countermined: opposing so much induritie to his force, that he was driuen to close them vp, and seek to winne them by famine. T. Sempronius Gracchus, that was Master of the horse, lay with the Roman Armie higher vp the Riuer: who faide would haue relieved Casiline, but that the Dictator, being gone to Rome about some matters of Religion, had giuen him expresse charge not to fight till his returne. Marcellus from Suessula could not come: his way being stopp'd by the ouer-flowings of Vulturius; the Nolans also beseeching him not to leave them, who were in danger of the Campanians, if he departed. Thus it is reported: but if the water staid his iourne, such entreaties were needlesse. Neither is it like, that the Dictator tarried at Rome so long, as till extreme famine had consumed the Garrison in Casiline. Wherefore it may be thought, that the Towne was lost, because the Romans durst not aduenture to raise the siege. Barrells of corne were sent by night, floting downe the Riuer; and when some of these, being carried awry by an Eddie of the water, stuck among the Willows on the banke, whereby this manner of reliefe was discovered and prevented; Gracchus cast a great quantitie of Nuts into the streame, which faintly sustained the poore besieged men. At length, when all foode was spent, and whatsoever grew greene vnder the walls was gathered for fallies; the Carthaginians ploughed vp the ground: wherupon the besieged presently sowed Rape-seede. Hannibal seeing this, admired their patience; and said, That he meant not to stay at Casiline, vntill the Rapes were growne. Wherefore, though hitherto hee had refused to hearken vnto any Composition, as intending to make them an example to all others, by punishing their obstinacie; yet now he was content, to grant them their liues at an indifferent ranfome, which when they had paid, hee quietly dismissed them according to his promise. Seven hundred Carthaginians hee placed in Casiline, as a Garrison for defence of the Campanians, vnto whom hee restored it. To the Prænestine Souldiers great thanks were giuen, and louing rewards; among which, they had offer, in regard of their vertue, to be made Citizens of Rome. But their present condition pleased them so well, that they chose rather to continue, as they were, in Prænestine: which is no weake proofe, of the good estate wherein the Citie flourished, that were subject to the Roman Gouernement. This siege of Casiline was not a little beneficiall to the Romans; as hauing long detained Hannibal, and consumed much of his time, that might otherwise haue bene better spent. For Winter ouer-tooke him, him, long before he could dispatch the businesse: which how to quit with his honor he knew not, when he was once engaged. Therefore he wintered at Capua: where he refreshed his Armie, or rather corrupted it, as all Historians report, and made it effeminate; though, effeminate as it was, He therewithall did often beate the Romans in following times, as shall appeare hereafter.

§. X.

Of the great supply that was decreed at Carthage to be sent to HANNIBAL in Italie.
How by the malice of HANNO, and slooth or parsimonie of the Carthaginians, the supply was too long deferred. That the riches of the Carthaginians grew faster, than of the Romans. Of FABIVS and other old Roman Historians, how partiall they were in their writings.

When Mago, the sonne of Amilear, had spent some time about the taking in of such Italians, as fell from the Romans after the battaile at Cannes; his brother Hannibal sent for him to Capua; and thence dispatched him away to Carthage, with the joyfull message of Victorie. He told the Carthaginian Senate, with how many Roman Generalls his brother had fought; what Consuls he had chased, wounded, or slaine; how the stout Romans, that in the former warre neuer shunned any occasion of fight, were now growne so calme, that they thought their Dictator Fabius the only good Capitaine, because he neuer durst adventure to come to battaile; that, not without reason, their spirits were thus abated, since Hannibal had slaine of them about two hundred thousand, and taken about fiftie thousand prisoners. He further told them of the Brutians, Apulians, S. unites, Lucans, and other people of Italie, that following the fortune of those great victories, had revolted vnto the Carthaginians. Among the rest he magnified Capua, as a goodly Citie, and fit to be not only (as already it was) Head of all the Capuans, but the chiefe seat of their Dominion in Italie: and there he informed them, how lovingly his brother had beene entertained, where he meant to rest that winter, attending their supply. As for the warre, He said it was euen at an end, if they would now pursue it closely, and not giue the Romans any breathing time, wherein to recollect themselves, and repaire their broken forces. He willed them to consider, that the warre was farre from home, in the Enemies Countrey; that so many Battailles had much diminished his brothers Armie; that the Souldiers, who had so well deserved, ought to be considered with liberrall rewards; and that it was not good to burden their new Italian friends, with exactions of monie, corne, and other necessaries; but that these things must bee sent from Carthage: which the victorie would requite with large amends. Finally hee caused the golden rings, taken from the fingers of the Roman Knights that were slaine, to be peeped out openly in the Court: which being measured, filled (as some say) three buhels, or (as others would rather haue it) no more than one; adding, that by this might appeare the greatnesse of the Roman calamitie, forasmuch as none but the principall of that Order, were accustomed to weare that ornament.

* Thus Lie reports it; and credible it is, that while Rome was poore, the brauerie of private men was not altogether so great, as the Law would haue permitted; though otherwise Luc Annal: The wearing of the ring, was the generall privilege of the Roman Equites.

Who so considers the former Punicke Warre, may easily finde, that the State of Carthage neuer did receive, in all the durance thereof, any such hopefull aduertisements from their Capitaines abroad. Wherefore it is no meruaile, if the Errand of Mago found extraordinary welcome. In the vehemencie of this joy, Himilear, a Senator aduerser to the faction of Hanno, is said to haue demanded of that great perswader vnto peace with Rome, Whether he were still of opinion, that Hannibal should be yeelded vp vnto the Romans; or whether he would forbid them to giue thanks vnto the Gods, for this their good successe. Hereunto though it bee not likely that

Hanno made the same formall answer, which Lie puts into his mouth, calling the Carthaginian Senators Patres conscripti, by a terme proper to the Romans, and putting them in minde of his owne shamefull ouerthrow receiued at the Ilands Ægates: yet the summe of his speech appeares to haue bene no lesse malicious, than it is set downe, forasmuch as Hannibal himselfe, at his departure out of Italie, exclaimed against the wickednesse of this Hanno; saying, that his hatred against the Barchines, had oppressed their Familie, when otherwise it could not, with the ruine of Carthage. Therefore it may well be, that he made such a jest of these victories, as is reported; saying, It ill becomed him, who had vanquished the Romans, to call for more helpe, as if he had bene beaten; or him, that had taken their campe, filled forsooth with spoile, to make request for meat and monie. To these caualis, if answer were needfull, it might be said, That other bootie than of horses and slaues, little was to be found in the Roman campe: the best of the Souldiers carrying no other wealth into the field, than a few silver studs in the bridles and trappings of their horses. If Hannibal had taken any maine conuoy of monie and prouisions, going to supply all wants of a great Armie in some other Prouince, (as the two Scipios are afterwards said to haue done, when they wanne the campe of Asdrubal, that carried along with him all the wealth of Spain, in his iourne towards Italie) then might such an objection more iustly haue bene made vnto his demand of a supply. But the most likely part of Hanno his Oration, and wherein hee best might hope to preuaile, contained a perswasion to vse their fortune with moderation; and now to seeke peace, whilst they had so much the better in warre.

What would haue bene the issue of this counsaile, if it had bene followed, it were not easie to say. For though it bee likely, that the Roman pride would haue brooked much indignitie, in freeing Italie from the danger of warre, yet it is not likely, that the faith, so often broken to the Carthaginians in former times, would haue bene kept entire, when any opinion of good aduantage had called for reuenge of so many shamefull ouerthrowes; since after this warre ended, and a new league concluded, no submissiue behauiour could preferre Carthage from ruine, longer than vntill such time, as Rome was at leisure from all other warres. This counsaile therefore of Hanno, though it might seeme temperate, was in deede very pellicent; and serued only to hinder the performance of a noble resolution. For it was concluded by a maine consent of the Senate, that fortie thousand Ammidians, fortie Elephants, and great abundance of silver, should bee sent out to Hannibal: and that, besides these, twentie thousand foot, and foure thousand horse, should be lured in Spain; not only to supply, as needs should require, the Armies in that Prouince, but to be transported into Italie.

This great aide, had it bene as carefully sent, as it was readily decreed, the Roman Historians would not haue found cause, to taxe the rechelesse imprudence of Hannibal, in forbearing to march directly from Cannes to Rome; or in refreshing his Armie among the delights of Capua: the next years worke would haue finished the businesse, with lesse dangerous adventure; and the pleasures, which his men enjoyed among the Campani, would haue bene commended, as rewards by him well thought vpon, wherewith to animate both them and others; that were to be employed in the following warre. But either the too much carelesnesse of those, that were loth to make haile in laying out their monie, before extreme necessity required it; or the craftie malice of Hanno, and his fellows, working vpon the private humours of men, that had more feeling of their owne commoditie, than sense of the publike neede; vterly peruerred, and made vnprofitable in the performance, the order that had bene so well set downe. The Elephants were sent: and some monie peraduantage; vncertaine it is, how long after. But those great forces of threecore thousand foot, and foure thousand horse, came not into Italie, till much was lost of that which already had bene gotten, and a great part of the old Carthaginian Armie, was first consumed by time, and sundrie accidents of warre. Only some some small numbers, no way answering vnto the proportion decreed, were sent into Spain; and the journey of Afarabul thence through France into Italie much talked of, but he not enabled thereto, till many yeares were past, and the Romans had recovered their strength.

Here wee may note, what great riches the Carthaginians drew into their Citie, both by the Tributes receiued from their subiects, and by their wealthie Trade of merchandize. For it is not long, since the warre of the Mercinaries; and the perfidious tyrannie of the Romans, extorting in time of greatest necessitie twelue hundred talents, had exceedingly impouerished Carthage: which was before brought into great want, euen by the expence of so much monie, as was to bee disbursed for redeeming of peace, after the losse at Agathis. Yet wee see, what great Armies of Africans, and Spaniards, besides those already on foot, are appointed to the seruice in Italie, and how little the Carthaginians feare the want of monie in these chargeable vnder takings: whereas the Romans, on the other side, hauing three or foure yeares together bene forced to some extraordinary cost, are faine to goe vpon credit, euen for the price of those slaues, which they bought of their owne Citizens to arme for their defence. Such advantage, in meanes to enrich their Treasurie, had the wealthy merchants of Carthage, trading in all parts of the Mediterranean Sea, euen from Tyrrus their Mother-Citie in the bottome of the streights vnto the great Ocean, about the Romans: who liued on the fruits of their ground; and receiued their Tributes from people following the same course of life. When time therefore was come, that the hatred of Rome found leisure to shew it selfe, in the destruction of Carthage, the impudence of Roman fullhood, in seeking an honest colour wherewith to shadow the intended breach of faith, discovered plainly whence the jealousy was bred, that this mighty Citie would againe rebell. For the Carthaginians, hauing giuen vp hostages, euen before the Roman Armie did set forth, to performe whatsoever should bee enjoyed them, with condition that their Citie might not be destroyed; and hauing accordingly, when they were so required, yielded vp all their weapons, and engines of warre; the Romans told them plainly, That the Citie of Carthage, which was the Bodie of the Citizens, should be friendly dealt withall, but the Towne must needs be demolished, and remoued into some other place, that should be twelue miles distant from the Sea. For (saide the Romans) this Trade of merchandize, by which yee now liue, is not so fit for peaceable men, such as yee promise to become hereafter, as is the Trade of husbandrie; an wholesome kinde of life, and enduing men with many laudable qualities, which enable their bodies, and make them very apt for conseruation. This villainous dealing of the Romans, though sugred with glossing wordes, plainly shewes, what good obseruation the elder Cato had made of the baslie growth of Carthage in riches. For when, being demanded his opinion in the Senate about any matter whatsoever it were, added still this conclusion, Thus I thinke; and that Carthage should be destroyed; He may seeme, not only to haue had regard vnto that present wealth, which at his being there hee had found in the Citie, but much more vnto these times, and the great height wherunto it rose, euen suddenly as wee see, out of many calamities, whilst the Romans thought, that it had not bene in case to dare so terrible a warre.

Becas the Carthaginians, in gathering wealth, were more industrious and skillfull than the Romans; so came they farre short of them, in the honourable care of the publike good: hauing euery one, or most of them, a more principall regard of his owne priuate benefit. This made them (besides the negligence commonly found in Victors) when the first heat of their affection, wherein they concluded to pursue the warre strongly, was ouer-past, goe more leisurely to worke, than had bene requisite in the execution. It was easie for Hanno to perswade couetous men, that they should first of all defend their owne in Spain. This might be done with little charges. Afterwards, when that Prouince was secured, they might send an Armie into Italie; so going to worke orderly by degrees. For it were no wisdom, to commit all the strength of the Common-wealth to one hazard of fortune, against the Enemies; or (which perhaps were worke) to the Government of an ambitious man, and his brethren; who hauing once (if they could so doe) finished the warre, might easily make Hannibal a King, and subdue Carthage, with the forces that thee had giuen them to the conquest of Rome.

By such malicious working of Hanno, and by their owne slacknesse, incredulitie, dulnesse, or niggardize, the Carthaginians were perswaded rather to make small disturbances in Spain, than to set vp all their reit at once in Italie. Yet was it indeede impossible, to hold a Countrey of so large extent, and lo open a coast, as that of Spain, free from all incursion of the Enemy: especially the affection of the Natural (as in a new Conquest) ill established. A better way therefore it had bene to make a running warre, by which the Romans might haue bene found occupied, euen with the ordinarie Carthaginian Garisons, or some little addition therunto. For if it were thought meet, to deferre the prosecution of their maine intendment against Rome it selfe, vntill such time as euery little thorne were pulled out of the sides of so great a Prouince; then must Emporia haue bene besieged and forced: which by reason of alliance with the Masilians, gaue vnto the Romans, at all times when they pleased, a readie and secure Harbour. But the Towne of Emporia was too strong to be wonne in haste: it had long defended it selfe against the Barbarians; hauing not aboue foure hundred paces of wall to the maine Land, and exceedingly well fortified; a great Spanish Towne of the same name, lying without it, that was three miles in compasse, very strong likewise, and friend vnto the Grecians, though not ouer-much trusted. Wherefore to force this Towne of Emporia, that was, besides the proper strength, like to be so well assisted by the Masilians, Romans, and some Spaniards; would haue been a worke of little lesse difficultie, than was the Roman warre (in appearance) after the battaile at Canna: yea it had bene in effect none other, than to alter the seat of the warre; which Hannibal had already fixed, with better iudgement, neare vnto the gates of Rome. The difficultie of this attempt being such, as caused it altogether to be forborne; great follie it was, to bee much troubled about expelling the Romans vtterly out of Spain: whom they might more easily haue diuerted thence, and drawne home to their owne doores, by making strong warre vpon their Citie. For euen so the Romans afterwarde remoued Hannibal into Africa, by sending an Armie to Carthage, and by taking the like course, they now endeouored to change the seat of the warre, transferring it out of Italie into Spain. But the priuate affections of men, regarding the common good no otherwise, than as it is accellarie to their owne purposes, did make them easily winke at opportunities, and hope, that somewhat would fall out well of it selfe, though they let not to their helping hands. Hanno was a malicious wretch: yet they that thought him so, were well enough contented to hearken vnto his discourages, as long as they were plausible, and tended to keepe the peace full. In the meane while they suffered Hannibal, and all the noble house of Amilcar, to wearie themselves in traualle for the Common-wealth: which all Carthage in generally highly commended, but weakly assisted; as if the indolence of these Barchines had bene somewhat more than needfull. Surely the Carthaginians, in general, were farre lesse honorable than the People of Rome: not only in gouernement of their subiect Prouinces, but in administration of their owne Estate; few of them preferring the respect of the Weale publike about their priuate interest. But as they thrived little in the end, by their parsimonie toward their owne Mercinaries, when the former Roman warre was finished: so the conclusion of this warre present, will make them complaine, with feeling sighes, of their negligence in supplying Hannibal, after the victorie at Canna; when gladly they would giue all their Treasuries, to redeem the opportunity, that now they let passe, as if it were cost enough to send a few handfulls into Spain.

That both the Spanish businesse, and the state of Africa it selfe, depended wholly,

ly, or for the most part, vpon successe of things in Itale, the course of actions following will make manifest. Particularly how matters were ordered in Spaine by the Carthaginian Gouvernours, it is very hard, and almost impossible, to set downe. For though we must not reprehend, in that worthe Historian Liuie, the tender loue of his owne Countreie, which made him giue credit vnto Fabius and others: yet mult we not, for his sake, beleue those lies, which the vnpartiall judgement of Polybius hath condemned, in the Writers that gaue them originall. It were needlesse to rehearse all that may be found in Polybius, concerning the vntruth of that Roman Historian Fabius. One example may suffice. Hee saith of Amilcar and his men at Eryx, in the former warre, That hauing cleane spent their strength, and being euen broken with many miseries, they were glad to submit themselues vnto the Romans. Contrarie herunto we finde in the Life of AMILCAR, set downe by Emilius Probins, That Eryx was in such fort held by the Carthaginians, that it seemed to bee in as good condition, as if in those parts there had not beene any warre. These wordes, being referred to the brauer resolution of the Carthaginian Souldiers, and the singular vertue of their Generall infusing such spirit into them; may be taken as not ouerliberrall. For in the Treatie of peace betwene Amilcar and Catulus, when the Roman first of all required, that this Garrison of Eryx should lay downe their Armes, and forsake Sicily, threatening, that otherwise he would not take of any composition: Amilcar boldly bad him choose, whether he would take of it, or no; for that the Armes, which his Countreie had put into his handes to vse against her Enemies, it was not his purpose to yeeld vp vnto them. Now since the Romans, contrarie to their custome vpon like aduantages, were content to let Amilcar haue his will, and not to stand with him vpon point of honour, whilest otherwise they might quietly rid their handes of him; paine enough it is, that they were farr from thinking him a man consumed with miseries, as Fabius would haue him seeme. Hereunto agrees the relation of Polybius: who flatly, and by name, chargeth Fabius with vntruth; saying, that howsoeuer Amilcar, and his Souldiers, had endured all extremities, yet they behaued themselues as men that had no sense thereof; and were as farr from being either vanquished, or tired, as were their Enemies. Such being the difference betwene Fabius (as also perhaps betwene other old Writers of the Roman storie) and those that had more regard of truth, than of flattering the mightie Citee of Rome: we must take it in good part, that howsoeuer Liuie introduceth Hanno, in one place, joyning very foolishly his owne shamefull ouerthrow at the Ilands Ægætes, with the great seruices of Amilcar at Eryx, as if both of them had had like-vent; yet Ægætes elsewhere he forbearth not to put a more likely tale (though with as impudent a commemoration of his owne vnhappy conduct) into the same Hanno his mouth, making him say, That the affaires of Carthage went neuer better, than a little before the losse of their fleet in that battail at Sea: wherein himselfe was General. Now concerning the doings of the Scipio's in Spaine, there is cause to wils, that this Fabius, with Val. Antias, and others of the like stampe, had either written (if they could not write more temperately) nothing at all; or that the tender affection of Liuie to his Rome, had not caused him to thinke too well of their relations: which are such as follow.

§. XI.

Stranger reports of the Roman victories in Spaine, before ASDRUBAL the sonne of AMILCAR followed thence his brother HANNIBAL into Italie.

That hath beene shewed already, how P. Cornelius Scipio the Consul, returning from Gaul into Italie, to encounter with Hannibal at his descent from the Alpes, sent before him his brother Cneus, with part of his Fleet and Armie, into Spaine. Two Roman Legions, with foure- teene thousand foot of the Confederates, and twelue hundred horse, had beene allotted vnto this Consul, therewith to make warre in Spaine against Hannibal: vnto since he was marching into Italie with the strength of his Armie, P. Scipio beleueed, that a good part of these his owne forces might well be spared from the Spanish Expedition; and therefore made bold to carrie some of the number back with him, sending on his brother with the rest, as his Lieutenant. Publius himselfe remayned in Italie all the time of his Consulship: which being expired, He was sent Proconsul into Spaine by the Senate, with an Armie of eight thousand men, and a fleet of thirtie Gallies.

The Acts of these two Brethren in their Prouince, were very great; and, as they are reported, somewhat meruailous. For they continually preuailed in Spaine, against the Carthaginians: whom they vanquished in so many battailes, and with-drew from their Alliance so many of the Spaniards their Confederates; that wee haue cause to wonder, how the Enemy could so often finde meanes to repaire his forces, and returne strong into the field. But as the Romans, by pretending to deliuer the Countreie from the tyrannic of Carthage, might easily winne vnto their Confederacie, as many as were galled with the African yoke, and durst aduenture to breake it: so the ancient reputation of the first Conquerours, might serue to arme the Naturalls against these Invaders; and to reclaime those, that had revolted vnto the Romans, were it only by the memorie of such ill successe; as the like rebellions in former times had found. Hereto may be added the Carthaginian treasure: which easily raised souldiers, among those valiant, but (in that Age) poore, and gold-thirstie Nations. Neither was it of small importance, that so many of the Spaniards had their children, kinmen, and friends, abroad with Hannibal in his Italian warres; or seruing the Carthaginians in Affric. And peradventure, if we durst be bold to say it; the victories of the Scipio's were neither so many, nor so great, as they are set out by Liuie. This we may be bold to say, That the great Capitaine Fabius, or Liuie in his person, maketh an objection vnto Scipio, which neither Scipio, nor Liuie for him, doth answer, That if ASDRUBAL were vanquished, as Scipio would say, by him in Spaine: strange it was, and as little to his honour, as it had beene extremely dangerous to Rome, that the same vanquished man should invade Italie. And it is indeede an incredible narration, That ASDRUBAL being closed in on all sides, and not knowing how to escape out of a battaile, saue only by the steepe descent of Rocks, ouer a great Riuer that lay at his back, ranne away with all his monie, Elephants, and broken troups, ouer Tagus, directly toward the Pyrenees, and so toward Italie; vpon which hee fell with more than three score thousand armed souldiers. Neither doe I see, how it hangs well together, That he chose a peece of ground very defensible, but most incommo- dious for his retreat, if he should happen to be vanquished; and yet, that he sent all his monie and Elephants away before him, as not intending to abide the Enemy: Or how it could be true, that these his Elephants, being so sent before, could hinder the Romans (for so are they said to haue done in the last battaile betwene him and Scipio) from breaking into his camp. Wherefore we can no more than be forrie, that all Carthaginian records of this warre, and Spanish, (if there were any) being vterly lost, we can know no more thereof, than what it hath pleased the Romans to tell vs: vnto whom it were no wisdom to giue too much credit. In this regard, I will summarily runne ouer the doings of the Scipio's in Spaine; not greatly insisting on particulars, whereof there is no great certainty.

Cn. Cornelius landed at Emporia, an Haven-towne not farre within the Pyrenes, retaining still the same name with little inflexion. That by the fame of his clemencie he allured many Nations to become subiect vnto Rome, as the storie beginnes of him, I could easily beleuee, if I vnderstood by what occasion they had neede to vse his clemencie, or he to giue such famous example thereof, being a mere stranger, and hauing no iurisdiction in the Countrey. Yet is it certaine, that he was a man very courteous, and one that could well insinuate himselfe into the loue of the Barbarians; among whom, his dexteritie in practise had the better successe, for that hee seemed to haue none other errand, than setting them at libertie. This pretext auailed with some: others were to bechired with monie: and some hee compelled to yeeld by force or feare; especially, when he had wonne a battaile against Hanno. In to all Treaties of accord, made with these people, likely it is that hee remembered to insert this Article, which the Romans in their Alliances neuer forgate, vnto in long times past, and when they dealt with the Carthaginians, or their Superiours; Maisiastern Pop. Rom. comiter conferent, which is, as Tullie interpreteth, That they should gently (or kindly) uphold the Maiestie of the People of Rome. This was in appearance nothing troublefome; yet implied it indeede an obscure couenant of subjection. And in this respect it may be true, That the Spaniards became dittonis Romanæ; of the Roman iurisdiction; though hereafter they will say, they had no such meaning. That part of the Countrey wherein Scipio landed, was newly subdued by Hannibal in his passage toward Italie; and therefore the more easily shaken out of obedience. Particularly in the Barguitans, Hannibal had found, at his coming among them, such an apprehension of the Roman greatnesse, as made him suspect, that any light occasion would make them start from the Carthaginians. Wherefore he not only appointed Hanno Gouvernour ouer them, as ouer the rest of the Prouince betwene Iberus and the Pyrenes, but made him also their Lord; that is, (as I conceiue it, for I doe not thinke he gaue the Principalltie of their Countrey vnto Hanno and his Heires.) He made him not only Lieutenant generall ouer them, in matters of warre, and things concerning the holding them in obedience to Carthage; but tooke from them all interiour Officers of their owne, leauing them to be gouerned by Hanno, at his discretion. These therefore had good cause to reioyce at the coming of Scipio: with whom, others also (no doubt) found reasons to ioyne; it being the custome of all conquered Nations, in hatred of their present Lords, to throw themselves indifferently into the protection of others, that many times proue worse than the former. So were the Neapolitans, and Milaneis, in the age of our Grand-fathers, wearie by turnes of the Spaniards and French; as more sensible still of the present cuill which they felt, than regardfull of the greater mischiefe, wherinto they ranne by seeking to auoide it. This bad affection of his Prouince, would not suffer Hanno to temporize. Ten thousand foot, and a thousand horse, Hannibal had left vnto him: besides which it is like, that some forces hee was able to raise out of his Prouince. Therefore hee aduentured a battaile with Scipio; wherein hee was overthrowne and taken. Following this victorie, Scipio besieged Stiffum, a Towne hard by, and wanne it. But Asdrubal hauing passed Iberus, and coming too late to the reliefe of Hanno, with eight thousand foot and a thousand horse, fell vpon the Roman Sea-forces, that lay not farre about Tarracon, whom he found carelesse, as after a victorie, rousing abroad in the Countrey; and with great slaughter draue them aboard their ships. This done, he ranne vp into the Countrey, where he with-drew the Illegetes from the Roman partie, though they had giuen hostages to Scipio. Scipio in the meane season was gone to visit and aide his fleet: where hauing set things in order, he returned back, and made toward Asdrubal; who durst not abide his coming, but with-drew himselfe againe ouer Iberus. So the Illegetes were compelled by force, hauing lost Athanasia their chiefe Citie, to pay a fine to the Romans, and increase the number of their hostages. The Asietans likewise, Confederates of the Carthaginians, were besieged in their chiefe Towne: which they defended thirte daies;

daies; hoping in vaine, that the sharpe Winter, and great abundance of Snow that fell, would haue made the Romans to dislodge. But they were faine at length to yeeld: and for this their obstinacie, they were amerced twentie talents of siluer. During the siege, the Lactari came to helpe their distressed Neighbours; and were beaten home by Scipio, leauing twelue thousand of their companie dead behinde them. I cannot but wonder, how these Lactari, that are said to be the first which embraced the friendship of Scipio, should, without any cause remembered, become Carthaginian on the sudden, in the next newes that we heare of them. As also it is strange, that all the Sea-coast Northward of Iberus, hauing lately become voluntarily dittonis Romanæ; subiect vnto Rome, should, in continuance of the storie, after a few lines, hold warre against Scipio, without any assistance of the Carthaginians. Neither can I beleuee, that Asdrubal, as it were by a charme, stirred vp the Illegetes, making them lay aside all care of their Hostages, and take armes in his quarrell; whilst himselfe had not the daring to stand against Scipio, but ranne away, and saved himselfe beyond Iberus. Philinus perhaps, or some Carthaginian Writer, would haue told it thus: That Scipio aduenturing too farre into the Countrey, was beaten by Asdrubal back to his ships, whence hee durst not stirre, until Winter came on: at what time this Carthaginian returned into the heart of his Prouince, leauing some few Garrisons to defend those places, that after Scipio wanne, by returning vpon them, vnlooked for, through a deepe snow. As for the Lactari, Illegetes, and the rest, we may reasonably thinke, that they fought their owne benefit: helping themselves one while by the Romans against the Carthaginians; and contrariwise, vpon sense of injuries receiued, or apprehension of more grievous tyrannie, vnder which they feared to be brought by these new Masters, hearkening againe vnto the comfortable promises of those, that had ruled them before. For that it was their intent to liue vnder their owne Countrey Lawes, and not vnder Gouvernours sent from Rome or Carthage, their demeanour in all Ages following may testifie: euen from henceforth vnto the dayes of Augustus Cæsar; till when they were neuer thoroughly conquered.

The yeare following this, Cn. Scipio had a victorie against the Carthaginians, in fight at Sea; or rather came vpon them vnlooked for, while they rode at Anchor, most of their men being on shore. All their ships, that ranne not too far on ground, he tooke: and thereby grew Master of the whole coast; landing at pleasure, and doing great hurt in all places that were not well defended. After this victorie, about one hundred and twentie Nations, or petty Estates, in Spain, are said to haue submitted themselves vnto the Romans, and giuen Hostages: whereby Asdrubal was compelled to flee into the vtmost corners of the Land, and hide himselfe in Lusitania. Yet it followes; that the Illegetes did againe rebell; that Asdrubal hereupon came ouer Iberus; and that Scipio (though hauing easily vanquished the Illegetes) went not forth to meet him, but stirred vp against him the Celtiberians; that lately were become his subiects and had giuen him Hostages. These tooke from the Carthaginian three Townes, and vanquished him in two battailes; wherein they slue fifteen thousand of his men, and tooke foure thousand prisoners. Then arrived P. Scipio, with the supply before mentioned: and henceforward the two brethren jointly administered the businesse in Spain.

The Carthaginians being occupied in the Celtiberian Warre; the two Scipios did, had constant, without feare or doubt, passe ouer Iberus, and besiege Saguntum. Little cause of doubt had they, if Cn. had already subdued many Nations beyond it, and, among many others, the same Celtiberians, that with their proper forces were able to vanquish Asdrubal, Bozlar, the Gouvernour of Saguntum, a simple man, suffered himselfe to be perswaded by one Aecidus a Spaniard, that the only way to get the fauour and heartie good will of the Countrey, was by freely restoring vnto them their Hostages; as resting, without any pledge, assured of their faith. But the craftie Spaniard, being trusted with this message and restitution of the Hostages, carried them all to the Roman Generalls: perswading them, as hee had done Beller, to make the Liberality their owne. Hereby the Romans purchased much loue: if the tale were true; and it were not rather true, as afterward and ere this we finde, that all the Spanish Hostages were left in new Carthage. I am wearie of rehearsing for many particularities, whereof I can beleue so few. But since wee finde no better certainties, we must content our selues with these.

The yeare following was like vnto this: Asdrubal must be beaten againe. The two Scipio's diuide their forces: Cn. makes warre by Land; P. by Sea. Asdrubal, with much labour and entreatie, hath gotten foure thousand foot, and fise hundred horse, out of Africa: Hee repaires his fleet; and prouides euery way to make resistance. But all his chiefe Sea-men, and Masters of his ships, reuolt vnto the Romans: because they had bene chidden the last yeare for their negligence, which had betrayed the Naue. The reuolt of these ship-masters animates to rebellion the Carpetani, or Carpetani, an In-land people about Toledo in the very Center of Spaine. These doe much mischief, so that Asdrubal is faine to make a iourne to them. His sudden coming cuts off some of them, that were found scattered abroad in the fields. But they, making head, so valiantly assaile him, that they driue him, for very feare, to incampe himselfe strongly on an high peece of ground; whence hee dares not come forth to giue them battaile. So they take a Towne by force, wherein hee had laid vp all his provisions; and shortly make themselves Masters of the Countre round about. This good successe breeds negligence; for which they dearly pay. Asdrubal comes vpon them, takes them vnprepared, beates them, kills the most of them, and disperleth the rest; so that the whole Nation yeeldeth to him the next day. Thence come directions from Carthage, that Asdrubal should leade his Armie forth- with into Italie: which we may wonder, why the Carthaginians would appoint him to doe, if they had bene informed by his letters in what hard case he was, and had so weakly supplied him, as is shewed before. But thus wee finde it reported; and that vpon the very rumour of this his iourne, almost all Spaine was readie to fall to the Romans. Asdrubal therefore sends word presently to Carthage, that this must not be so: or, if they will needes haue it so, that then they must send him a Succes- 30 four, and well attended with a strong Armie, which to employ they should finde worke more than enough; such notable men were the Roman Generalls. But the Senate of Carthage is not much moued with this excole: Asdrubal must needes be gone; and Ilmicio, with such forces as are thought expedient for that seruice, both by Land and Sea, is sent to take the charge of Spaine. Wherefore Asdrubal hath now no more to doe, than to furnish himselfe with store of monie, that hee might haue wherewithall to winne the friendship of the Gauls, through whose Countries hee must passe, as Hannibal had done before him. The Carthaginians were greatly too blame, for not remembering to ease him of this care. But since it can be no better, he laies great Impolitions vpon all the Spaniards his Subjects: and hauing gotten together as much treasure as he could, onward he marcheth toward Iberus. The Scipio's hearing these newes, are carefull how to arrest him on the way. They besiege Ibera (so called of the Riuers name running by it) the richest towne in all those quarters, that was confederate with Asdrubal: who thereupon steps aside to relieue it. The Romans meet him, and fight a battaile with him: which they winne the more easily, for that the Spaniards, his followers, had rather be vanquished at home; than get the victorie, and afterwards be hal'd into Italie. Great numbers are slaine: and few should haue escaped, but that the Spaniards ranne away, ere the batailles were thoroughly joyned. Their campe the Romans take, and spoile: whereby (question- 35 lesse) they are maruailously enriched; all the monie that could be raked together in Spaine, being carried along in this Italian Expedition. This dayes euent joynes all Spaine to the Romans, if any part of the Countre stood in doubt before; and puts Asdrubal so farre from all thought of trauiailing into Italie, that it leaues him small hope of keeping himselfe safe in Spaine. Of these exploits aduertisement is sent to 40 Rome:

Rome: and Letters to the Senate, from P. and Cn. Scipio, whereof the Contents are; That they haue neither monie, apparrell, nor bread, wherewith to sustaine their Armie and Fleet; That all is wanting; so as vnlesse they may be supplied from Rome, they can neither hold their forces together, nor tarrie any longer in the Province. These Letters come to Rome in an euill season; the State being scarcely able, after the losse at Canna, to helpe it selfe at home. Yet reliefe is sent: how hardly, and how much to the commendations of that loue and care, which the priuate Citizens of Rome bare vnto the Common-wealth, shall be inferred elsewhere, into the relation of things whereof the truth is lesse questionable. At the coming of 10 this supply, the two Scipio's pursue Asdrubal, and hunt him out of his lurking holes. What else can we thinke; that remember the last newes of him, and how fearfully he mistrusted his owne safetie? They finde him, and Mago, and Amilcar the sonne of Bomilcar, with an Armie of threecore thousand men, besieging Iliturgi: (which the learned Orielius, and others, probably conjecture to haue stood, where Carmenia is now, in the Kingdome of Aragon; for there was Iliturgi, afterward called Forum Iulii, quite another way) a Towne of the Ile, gettes their nearest Neighbour, for ha- 15 uing reuolted vnto the Romans. The Towne is greatly distressed; but most of all, with want of victuailes. The Romans therefore breake through betwene the Enemies camps, with terrible slaughter of all that resist them: and hauing victualled the place, encourage the townsmen to defend their walls as stoutly, as they should: mon- 20 hold them fighting manfully with the besiegers, in their behalfe. So they illue forth, about thirteen thousand against threecore thousand: and killing more of the enemies, than themselves were in number, driue all the three Carthaginian Com- manders, euery one, out of his quarter; and take that day, besides prisoners and other bootie, fiftie and eight Ensignes. The Carthaginian Armie, being thus beaten from Iliturgi, fall vpon Incibilis, that stood a little Southward from the mouth of I- 25 berus. The Spaniards are blamed, as too greedy of earning monie by warre, for thus re-enforcing the broken Carthaginians. But it may be wondered, whence the Cartha- ginians had monie to pay them: since Asdrubal was lately driuen to poll the Coun- 30 trie, wanting monie of his owne; and being beaten in this iourne, had lost his wealthie carriages, when his campe was taken after the battaile by Ibera. Howsoe- uer it happens, the Carthaginians (according to their custome) are beaten againe at Incibilis: where there are of them above thirteene thousand slaine, and above three thousand taken; besides two and fortie Ensignes, and nine Elephants. After this, (in a manner) all the people of Spaine fell from them vnto the Romans. Thus could Fabius, Valerius Antias, or some other Historian, to whom Liuie gaue credit, conquer all Spaine twice in one yeare, by winning famous victories; whereof these good 35 Captaines, P. and Cn. Scipio, perhaps were not aware.

The Romans, notwithstanding this large access of Dominion, winter on their 40 owne side of Iberus. In the beginning of the next yeare, great Armies of the Spaniards rise against Asdrubal; and are ouertrowne by him. P. Scipio, to helpe these his friends, is forced to make great halte ouer the Riuier. At Castrum altum, a place in the mid-way betwene new Carthage and Saguntum, famous by the death of the great Amilcar, P. Scipio incampeth: and stores the place with victuailes, being strong and defensible; as intending to make it his seat for a while. But the Countre round about is too full of Enemies: the Carthaginian horse haue charged the Romans in their march, and are gone off cleare; falling also vpon some straglers, or such as lag- 45 ged behinde their fellows in march, they haue cut off two thousand of them. Hereupon it is thought behouefull, to retire vnto some place more assured. So Pab- 50 lius withdraws himselfe vnto Monti Victoris: that rising somewhat Eastward from Incibilis, over-looks the Southerne Out-let of Iberus. Thither the Carthaginians pursue him: His brother Cn. repaires vnto him; and Asdrubal the sonne of Gelo, with a full Armie, arrives to helpe his Companions. As they lie thus neare incamped to- 55 gether, P. Scipio, with some light-armed, going closely to view the places therabouts, is discovered by the enemies: who are like to take him, but that he withdraws himselfe to an high peece of ground; where they besiege him, vntill his brother Cn. Scipio fetch him off. After this (but I know not why) Castulo, a great citie of Spaine, whence Hannibal had taken him a wife, joyne with the Romans; though being farre distant from them, and seated on the head of the River Betis. Neer the selfe the Carthaginians passe ouer Iberus, to besiege Illiturgi againe, wherein lodgeth a Roman garrison; hoping to winne it by famine. Wee may iustly wonder, what should moue them to neglect the rebellion of Castulo, yea and the Roman Armie lying so close by them, and to seeke adventures further off, in that very place, wherein they had bene so grievously beaten the yeare before. But thither they goe: and thither folloves them Cn. Scipio with one Legion: who enters the Towne by force, breaks out vpon them the next day, and in two battailes kills aboute twelue thousand, and takes more than a thousand of them prisoners, with fixe and thirtie Ensignes. This victorie (doublelesse) is remarkable: confidering that the greatest Roman Legion at this time, consisted of no more than fixe thousand men. The vanquished Carthaginians besiege Bigarra: but that siege is also raised by Cn. Scipio. Thence the Carthaginians remove to Amada; where the Romans are loone at their heeles. There is a great battaile fought, that lasteth foure houres, wherein the Romans get a notable victorie, and a more notable would haue gotten, had not Cn. Scipio bene wounded. Thirtie nine Elephants are killed; and twelue thousand men; three thousand prisoners taken, and seven and fiftie Ensignes. The Carthaginians flie to Auriger; and the Romans pursue them. Cn. Scipio in a Litter is carried into the field, and vanquisheth the Carthaginians againe: but kills not halfe so many of them, as before; good cause why, for there are fewer of them left to fight. Notwithstanding all these overthrowes, the Spaniards, a people framed even by nature to set warre on foot, quickly fill vp the broken troups of Asdrubal: who hauing also hired some of the Gauls, adventures once more to trie his fortune with the Romans. But he is beaten againe, and loseth eight thousand of his men; besides Prisoners, Elephants, Ensignes, and other appurtenances. After so many victories, the Romans are euen ashamed, to leaue Saguntum enthralled vnto the Carthaginians; since, in behalfe of that Citie, they had at first entred into this warre. And well may wee thinke it strange, that they had not recovered it long before, since wee may remember, that long before this they had wonne all the Countrie once and againe. But it must not be forgotten, that they had ere now besieged Saguntum; and were faine (as appears) to goe their way without it: so as they neede not to blush, for hauing so long forborne to doe that, which ere now they had attempted, but were vnable to performe. At the present they winne Saguntum: and restore the possession thereof vnto such of the poore dispersed Citizens, as they can finde out. They also waste and destroy the Countrie of the Turdetani, that had ministered vnto Hannibal matter of quarrell against the Saguntines. This last action (questionlesse) was much to their honour; and wherein we may be assured, that the Carthaginians would haue disturbed them, if they had bene able.

But ouer-looking now this long continuance of great victories, which the Romans haue gotten in Spaine, other print or token of all their braue exploits, wee can perceiue none, that this recouerie of Saguntum: excepting the stopping of Asdrubals iourne; which was indeede of greatest importance, but appertaining to their owne defence. For they haue landed at Emporia, an Hauentowne, built and peopled by a Colonie of the Phoenicians, kinne to the Nisibitians, friends to the Romans; They haue easily wonne to their partie, lost, recouered, and lost againe, some petty bordering Nations of the Spaniards, that are carried one while by perswasion, other whiles by force, and sometimes by their owne vnstedd passions; and now finally they haue wonne a Towne, whereof the Carthaginians held entire possession; who had rooted out the old Inhabitants. Wherefore we may easily beleue, that when they tooke Saguntum (if they tooke it not by surpris; which is to be suspected, since in this Action wee finde no particulars remembered, as when the same place was taken by Hannibal) they had gotten the better of their Enemies in some notable fight. In like sort also must we thinke, that all those battailes lately remembered, after euery one of which Asdrubal fared downe before some place, that had rebelled, or seemed readie to rebell, were prosperous vnto the Carthaginians. For it is not the custome of Armies vanquished, to carrie the warre from Towne to Towne, and beleaguer Cities of their Enemies; but to fortifie themselves within their owne places of strength, and therein to attend the leuie and arriuall of new supplies. And surely, if the Romans had bene absolute Masters of the field, when they wanne Saguntum, they would not haue consumed a whole yeare following, in practising only with the Celtiberians the next adjoining people. Yet made they this, little lesse than two yeares businesse. Of these Celtiberians we heare before, that they haue yielded vp themselves vnto the Romans; for securitie of their faith, giuen Hostages to Scipio; and, at his appointment, made warre against the Carthaginians, with their proper forces. Wherefore it is strange, that they are now thus hardly wrought; and, not without expresse condition of a great summe, hired to serue in the Roman Campe. How this may hold together I cannot perceiue; vnlesse perhaps in those daies it were the Roman custome, or rather the custome of some bad Author whom Luius followes, to call euery Mellerenger, or stragler, that entred their campe, an Hostage of that people from whom he came.

The Celtiberians at length, hired with great rewards, send an Armie of thirtie thousand to helpe the Romans: out of which, three hundred the littest men are chosen, and carried into Italie, there to deal with their Countreimen that follow Hannibal in his warres: But if any of these three hundred returne back into Spaine, it is to be feared, that he brings with him such newes of the riches and welfare of Hannibals men, that all his fellowes at home are the lesse vnwilling to follow Asdrubal, when he shall next haue a desire to leade them into Italie. Hereof wee finde more than probabilitie, when these Mercinarie Celtiberians meet the Carthaginian Armie in the field. The two Scipios, presuming on this access of strength, diuide their forces, and seeke out the Enemies; who lie not farre off with three Armies. Asdrubal, the sonne of Amilcar, is nearest at hand; euen among the Celtiberians, at Anitorgis. With him Cn. Scipio doubts not to take good order: but the feare is, that this one part of the Carthaginian forces being destroyed, Mago, and Asdrubal the sonne of Gisco, hearing the newes, will make vse of their distance, which is five daies march, and, by running into the furthest parts of the Countrie, save themselves from being our-taken. Publius therefore must make the more haste, and take with him the better Souldiers, that is, two parts of the old Roman Armie; leaving the third part, and all the Celtiberians, to his brother. Hee that hath the longer iourne to make, comes somewhat the sooner to his liues end. Mago, and Asdrubal the sonne of Gisco, are not studying how to runne away: they finde no such necessitie. They joyne their forces together; meet with P. Scipio; and lay at him so hardly, that hee is driuen to keepe himselfe close within his Trenches: wherein he thinks himselfe not well assured. Especially he is vexed by Masaniassa, Prince of the Massageti, Numidians bordering vpon Mauritania, in the Region called now Tremizen: to whom the chiefe honour of this seruice is ascribed, for that he becomes afterward Confederate with the Romans. In this dangerous case P. Scipio gets intelligence, that Indibilis, a Spanish Prince, is comming with seven thousand and fixe hundred of the Suesetani, to joyne with his Enemies. Fearing therefore to be freight thrust vp, and beleaged, He issues forth by night, to meet with Indibilis vpon the way; leauing T. Fonteus his Lieutenant, with a small companie, to defend the campe. He meets with Indibilis; but is not able, according to his hope, to defeat him at the first encounter. The fight continues so long, that the Numidian horse appeare (whom he thought to haue bene ignorant of his departure) and fall vpon the Romans on all sides: neither are the Carthaginians farre behinde; but come so fast vpon him in R care, that P. Scipio, vnesteine taine which way to turne, yet fighting, and animating his men, where neede most requirith, is thruck through with a lance, and slaine: very few of his Armie escaping the same destinie, through benefit of the darke night. The like end hath Cn. Scipio within nine and twentie dayes after. At his meeting with Asdrubal, the Celtiberian Mercenaries all forsake him; pretending that they had warre in their owne Countrey. If Antiochus, where Asdrubal then lay, were, as Ortelius following Bentley takes it; a Celtiberian Towne; this was no vaine pretence, but an apparent truth. But we may justly beleue, that they were wonne by Asdrubal, and easily perswaded to take as much monie for not fighting, as they should haue had for hazarding their liues. Cn. Scipio therefore being vnable to stay them; and no lesse vnable, without their helpe, either to resist the Enemy, or to ioyne with his Brother, makes a very violent retreat; herein only differing from plaine flight, that hee keeps his mentogether. Asdrubal presteth hard vpon him: and Mago, with Asdrubal the sonne of Gefso, hauing made an end of Publius, hasten to dispatch his brother after him. Scipio steales from them all, by night; but is ouer-taken the next day by their horse, and arrested, in an open place of hard stonie ground, where growes not so much as a shrub, vnfit for defence of his Legions against such enemies. Yet a little Hill he findes, of easie ascent on euery side; which he takes for want of a more commodious place, and fortifies with pack-saddles, and other luggage, for default of a better Palisado. These weak defences the Carthaginians loone teare in sunder: and, breaking in on all hands, leaue very few of them aliue; that sauing themselves, I know not how, within some woods adjoining, escape vnto T. Fonteius, whom Publius had left in his camp, as is before said. It is a terrible ouerthrow, they say, out of which no man escapes. Yet, how they that were thus hemmed in on euery side, in so bare a ground as afforded not a shrub to couer them, could breake out, and throw themselves within woods adjoining, I should much wonder; did not a greater miracle following call away mine attention. T. Fonteius is in P. Scipio's campe, on the North side of Iberus, fearfull (as may be supposed) of his owne life; since his Generall, with two parts of the Roman Armie, had little hope to remaine long safe within it. Thither comes L. Martius, a young Roman Gentleman of a notable spirit: who haing gathered together the scattered Souldiers, and drawne some Companies out of their Garrisons, makes a pretie Armie. The Souldiers, being to choose a Generall by most voices, preferre this L. Martius before Fonteius the Lieutenant; as well they may. For Asdrubal, the sonne of Gefso, coming vpon them; this L. Martius do encourageth his men, (specially weeping when hee led them forth, vpon remembrance of their more honourable Generalls lately slaine) and admonisheth them of their present needes, that he beates the Carthaginians into their Trenches. A notable victorie perhaps he might haue gotten, but that hee wisely founds the retreat; reseruing the furie of his Souldiers to a greater occasion. The Carthaginians are at first amazed, and wonder whence this new boldnesse growes, in enemies lately vanquished, and now againe little better than taken: but when they see, that the Roman dares not follow his aduantage, they returne to their former securitie; and vtterly despising him, set neither Corps du garde, nor Sentinell, but rest secure, as if no enemy were neare. Martius therefore animates his souldiers with liuely wordes; and tells them, That there is no aduantage more safe, than that which is furthest from suspicion of being vnder-taken. They are soone perswaded to follow him, in any desperate peece of seruice. So he leades them forth by night, and leales vpon the campe of Asdrubal: where finding no guard, but the enemies fast-asleepe, or very drowzie, He enters without resistance, fires their Cabbins, and giues a terrible alarme; so that all afrighted, the Carthaginians runne head-long one vpon another, they know not which way. All passages out of their campe Martius hath prepossessed, so that there is no way to escape, save by leaping downe the Rampart: which as many doe, as can thinke vpon it, and runne away toward the campe of Asdrubal the sonne of Amilcar, that lay fixe miles off. But Martius hath way-laid them. In a Valley be-

tweene their two campes he hath bestowed a Roman cohort, and I know not what number of Horse; so that into this Ambush they fall euery one, and are cut in peeces. But lest perchance any should haue escaped, and giue the alarme before his coming; Martius hastens to be there as soone as they. By which diligent speede, He comes early in the morning vpon this further campe: which with no great difficulty he enters; and partly by force, partly by apprehension of danger which the Enemies conceiued, when they beheld the Roman shields, foule, and bloudied with their former execution, He driues head-long into flight, all that can saue themselves from the furie of the sword. Thirtie seuen thousand of the enemies perish in this 10 nights worke; besides a thousand eight hundred and thirtie, that are taken prisoners. Hereunto Valerius Antius adds, that the campe of Mago was also taken, and seuen thousand slaine: and that in another battaile with Asdrubal, there were slaine ten thousand more; besides foure thousand three hundred and thirtie, taken prisoners. Such is the power of some Historians. Liue therefore hath elsewhere well obserued, That there is none so intemperate, as Valerius Antius, in multiplying the numbers that haue fallen in battailes. That, whilst Martius was making an Oration to his souldiers, a flame of fire thone about his head, Liue reporteth as a common tale, not giuing thereunto any credit: and temperately concludeth, I hat this Captaine 20 Martius got a great name; which he might well doe, if with so small forces, and in so lutt dreffe, He could clearly get off from the Enemies, and giue them any parting blow, though it were farre lesse than that which is here set downe.

Of these occurrences L. Martius sent word to Rome, not forgetting his owne good seruice, whatsoever it was, but setting it out in such wise, as the Senate might iudge him worthe to hold the place of their Vicegerent in Spaine: which the better to intimate vnto them, He stiled himselfe Propretor. The Fathers were no lesse moued with the tidings, than the case required: and therefore tooke such careful order, for supplying their forces in Spaine, that although Hannibal came to the gates of Rome, crethe Companies, leuied to serue in that Province, could be sent away; yet would they not stay a tide for defence of the Citie it selfe, but shipped them in all haste for 30 Spaine. As for that title of Propretor, which Martius had assumed, they thought it too great for him, and were offended at his presumption in usurping it: foreseeing well, that it was a matter of ill consequence, to haue the souldiers abroad make choice, among themselves, of those that should command Armies and Provinces. Therefore C. Claudius Nero was dispatched away, with all conuenient haste, into Spaine: carrying with him about sixte thousand of the Roman foot, and as many of the Latines, with three hundred Roman Horse, and of the Latines eight hundred.

It happened well, that about these times, the affaires of Rome beganne to prosper in Italie, and afforded means of sending abroad such a strong supply: otherwise, the victories of Martius would ill haue serued, either to keepe footing in Spaine, or to 40 stop the Carthaginian Armies from marching towards the Alpes. For when Claudius, landing with his new forces, tooke charge of that remainder of the Armie, which was vnder Martius and Fonteius, he found surer tokens of the ouerthrowes received, than of those miraculous victories, whereof Martius had made his vaunts vnto the Senate. The Roman partie was forsaken by most of the Spanish friends: whom how to reclaim, it could not easly be deuised. Yet Claudius aduanced boldly towards Asdrubal the brother of Hannibal: whom he found among the Ausetani, neare enough at hand, incamped in a place called Lapides atri; out of which there was no issue, but only through a streight, whereon the Roman seized at his first coming. What should haue tempted any man of vaderstanding to incampe in such a place, 50 does not finde: and as little reason can I finde in that which followed. For it is said, That Asdrubal, seeing himselfe thus lockt vp, made offer to depart forth-with out of all Spaine, and quit the Province to the Romans, vpon condition, that he and his Armie might be thence dismissed; That he spent many daies, in entertaining parlee with Claudius about this buisnesse, That night by night hee conueied his foot-men

(a few at a time) through very difficult passages, out of the danger; and that finally taking advantage of a miltie day, Hee stole away with all his Horfe and Elephants, leaving his campe empty. If we consider, that there were at the same time, besides this Asdrubal, two other Carthaginian Generalls in Spaine; wee shall finde no lesse cause to wonder at the Implicite of Claudius, who hoped to conclude a bargain for so great a Countrey, with one of these three Chieftaines, than at the strange nature of those passages: through which the foot-men could hardly creepe out by night; the Horfe and Elephants easily following them in a darke miltie day. Wherefore in giuing beliefe to such a tale, it is needfull that we suppose, both the danger wherein the Carthaginians were, and the conditions offered for their safe departure, to haue bene of farre lesse value. Howsoever it was; neither this, nor ought else that the Romans could doe, serued to purchase any new friends in Spaine, or to recouer the old which they had lost. Like enough it is, that the old Souldiers, which had chosen Martius their Propretor, tooke it not well, that the Senate, regardlesse of their good deserts, had repealed their Election; and sent a Propretor whom they fancied not so well. Some such occasion may haue moued them to desire a Proconsul, and (perhaps) yong Scipio by name: as if a title of greater dignitie, were needfull to worke regard in the Barbarians; and the beloued memorie of Cn. and Publius, likely to doe good, were it reuiued in one of the same Familie. Whether vpon these, or vpon other reasons; C. Claudius was recalled out of the Prouince; and Publius the son of P. Scipio sent Proconsul into Spaine.

This is that P. Scipio, who afterward transferred the warre into Africk. where he happily ended it, to the great honour and benefit of his Countrey. He was a man of goodly presence, and singularly well conditioned: especially he excelled in Temperance, Continencie, Bountie; and other Vertues that purchase loue; of which qualities what great vse he made, shall appeare in the tenour of his Actions following. As for those things that are reported of him, fauouring a little too much of the great Alexanders; vanitie; How he vsed to walke alone in the Capitoll, as one that had some secret conference with Iupiter; How a Dragon (which must haue bene one of the Gods; and, in likelihood, Iupiter himselfe) was thought to haue conuersed with his Mother, entring her chamber often, and vanishing away at the coming in of any man; and how of these matters he nourished the rumour, by doubtful answers; I hold them no better than meere fables, deuised by Historians, who sought thereby to adde vnto the glorie of Rome: that this noble Citie might seeme, not only to haue surpassed other Nations in vertue of the generalltie, but also in great worth of one single man. To this end nothing is left out, that might serue to adorne this Roman Champion. For it is confidently written, as a matter of vnquestionable truth, That when a Proconsul was to be chosen for Spaine, there durst not any Captaine of the principall Citizens offer himselfe as Petitioner, for that honourable, but dangerous charge; That the People of Rome were much astonished therat; That when the day of Election came, all the Princes of the Citie stood looking one another in the face, not one of them hauing the heart, to aduenture himselfe in such a desperate seruice; and finally, that this P. Cornelius Scipio, being then about foure and twentie yeares of age, getting vp on an high place where hee might be scene of all the Multitude, requested, and obtained, that the Office might be conferred vpon him. If this were true, then were all the victories of L. Martius no better than dreames: and either very vnreasonable was the feare of all the Roman Captaines, who durst not follow Claudius Nero, that not long before was gone into Spaine Propretor; or very bad intelligence they had out of the Prouince, which Asdrubal the Carthaginian, as we heard euen now, was readie to abandon. But vpon these inconherencies, which I finde in the too partiall Roman Historians, I doe not willingly insist.

P. Scipio was sent Proconsul into Spaine; and with him was joyned M. Iunius Sylanus, as Propretor, and his Coadiutor. They carried with them ten thousand foot, and

and a thousand horse, in thirtie Quinquereme Gallies. With these they landed at Emporia; and marched from thence to Tarracon along the Sea-coast. At the fame of Scipio's arrival, it is said, that Embassages came to him space from all quarters of the Prouince: which he entertained with such a majestic, as bred a wonderfull opinion of him. As for the Enemies, they were greatly afraid of him: and so much the greater was their feare, by how much the lesse they could giue any reason of it. It wee must beleuee this, then must wee needs beleuee, that their feare was euen as great as could be: for very little cause there was, to be terrified with the fame of so yong a man, which had as yet performed nothing. All the winter following (or, as some thinke, all the next yeare) hee did nothing: but spent the time perhaps, as his foregoers had done, in treating with the Spaniards. His first enterprise was against new Carthage: vpon which he came vnexpected, with five and twentie thousand foot, and two thousand five hundred horse; his Sea-forces coasting him, and moderating their course in such wise, that they arrived there together with him. Hee assailed the Towne by Land and Sea; and wanne it by assault the first day. The Carthaginians lost it, by their too much confidence vpon the strength of it: which caused them to man it more slenderly, than was requisite. Yet it might haue bene well enough defended, if some Fisher-men of Tarracon had not discovered vnto Scipio, a secret passage vnto the walls; whereof the Townsmen themselves were either ignorant, or thought (at least) that their enemies could haue no notice. This Citie of new Carthage, relembed the old and great Carthage in situation; standing vpon a demi-Iland, betwene an Hauen and a great Lake. All the Westerne side of the wall, and somewhat of the North, was fenced with this Lake: which the Fisher men of Tarracon had founded; and finding in some part thereof a shelte, whereon at low water men might passe knee-deepe, or (at most) wading vp to the Naull, Scipio thrust thereto some Companies of his men; who recovered the top of the wals without resistance: the place being left without guard, as able to defend it selfe by the naturall strength. These falling suddenly vpon the backs of the Carthaginians within the Citie; easily forced a gate, and gaue free entrance to the Roman Armie. What bootie was found within the Towne, Luie himselfe cannot certainly affirme; but is faine to say, That some Roman Historians told lies without measure, in way of amplification. By that small proportion of riches, which was afterward carried by Scipio into the Roman Treasurie, we may easily perceiue, how great a vanitie it was to say, That all the wealth of Africk and Spaine, was heaped vp in that one Towne. But therein were bestowed all the Spanish Hostages: (or at least of the adjoining Prouinces) whom Scipio entreated with singular courtesie; restoring them vnto their kindred and friends, in such gracious manner, as doubled the thanks due to so great a benefit. Hercupon a Prince of the Celtiberians, and two pettie Kings of the Hergetes and Lacetani, nearest Neighbours to Tarracon, and dwelling on the North side of Iberus, forsooke the Carthaginian partie; and joyned with the Romans. The speech of Indibilis, King of the Hergetes, is much commended; for that he did not vant himselfe, as commonly fugitiues vse, of the pleasure which he did vnto the Romans, in reuolting from their Enemies; but rather excused this his changing side, as being thereto compelled by injuries of the Carthaginians, and invited by the honorable dealing of Scipio. This temperate estimation of his new professed friendship, was indeede no vntrue token, that it should be long-lasting. But if the Hergetes had long ere this (as we haue heard before) forsaken the Carthaginian partie, and stoutly held themselves as friends to Cn. Scipio; then could nothing haue bene deuised more vaine, than this Oration of Indibilis their King; excusing, as new, his taking part with the fame, when he should haue rather craued pardon for his breach of alliance, formerly contracted with the Father and the Vncle. Most likely therefore it is, that howeouer the two elder Scipio's had gotten some few places among these their Neighbours, and held them by strength; yet were the Romans neuer Masters of the Countrey, till this worthy Commander, by recouering their Hostages from the Carthaginians; and by his great munificence in sending them home, wanne vnto himselfe the assured loue and assistance of these Princes. The Carthaginian Generalls, when they heard of this losse, were very forrie: yet neuertheless they set a good face on the matter; saying, That a yong man, hauing stolne a Towne by surpris, was too farre transported, and ouer-joyed, but that shortly they would meet with him, and put him in minde of his Father and Vncle; which would alter his moode, and bring him to a more conuenient temper.

Now if I should here interpose mine owne conjecture; I should be bold to say, That the Carthaginians were at this time busie, in setting forth towards Italy; and that Scipio, to diuert them, vnder-tooke new Carthage, as his Father and Vncle, vpon the like occasion, late downe before Ibera. And in this respect I would suppose, that it had not bene much amiss, if the passage ouer the Lake had bene vndiscovered, and the Towne held out some longer while. For howsoever that particular Action was the more fortunate, in coming to such good issue vpon the first day: yet in the generality of the bulinesse, betwene Rome and Carthage, it was more to be wished, that Asdrubal should bee staied from going into Italy, than that base of Spain should be taken from him. Whereas therefore he had nothing left to doe, that should hinder his iourne; Mago, and Asdrubal the sonne of Gisco, were thought sufficient to hold Scipio worke, in that lingering warre of taking and retaking Townes, whilst the maine of the Carthaginian forces, vnder Asdrubal the sonne of Amilcar, went to a greater enterprife: euen to fight in triall of the Empire. But the Roman Historians tell this after another fashion; and say, That Asdrubal was beaten into Italy: whether hee ranne for feare, as thinking himselfe ill assured of the Spaniards, as long as they might but heare the name of Scipio. Scipio, say they, coming vpon Asdrubal; his Vancourers charged so lustily the Carthaginian host; that they drawe them into their Trenches: and made it apparent, euen by that small peece of frivole, how full of spirit the Roman Armie was, and how dejected the Enemy. Asdrubal therefore by night retired out of that euen ground, and occupied an Hill, compassed on three sides with a River, very steepe of ascent, and not easie of access on the fore-side; by which himselfe got vp, and was to be followed by the Romans. On the top of it there was a Plaine, wherein he strongly incamped himselfe: and in the mid-way, between the top and root of the Hill, was also another Plaine; into which he descended, more vpon brauerie, than he might not seeme to hide himselfe within his Trenches, than for that he durst adventure his Armie to the hazard of a battaile, for which this was no equall ground. But such advantage of place could not saue him from the Romans. They climbed vp the Hill to him; they recovered euen footing with him; droue him out of this lower Plaine, vpon into his Campe on the Hill-top: whither although the ascent were very difficult, and his Elephants belowed in the smoothest places to hinder their approach; yet much more strongly breaking their passage where it was hardest to be found; but much more strongly breaking their way, where the Carthaginians had got vp before them, they drawe both Men and Elephants head-long. I know not whether: for it is said, that there was no way to flie. Out of such a battaile, wherein he lost eight thousand men, Asdrubal is said to haue escaped; and gathering together his disperfed troupes, to haue marched towards the Pyrennes, hauing sent away his Elephants ere the fight beganne. Neuertheless Mago, and Asdrubal the sonne of Gisco, are reported after this, to haue consulted with him about this warre; and finally to haue concluded, that god hee needed must, were it but to carrie all the Spaniards as farre as might be, from the name of Scipio. How likely this was to haue been true, it shall appeare at his coming into Italy; whence these incoherent relations of the Spanish affaires, haue too long detained vs.

§. XII.

The great troubles that HANNIBAL raised in all quarters, to the Citie of Rome. POSTHUMVS the Roman Generall, with his whole Armie, is slain by the Gauls. PHILIP King of Macedon, enters into a League with HANNIBAL, against the Romans. The Romans, joining with the Aetolians, make warre vpon PHILIP in Greece: and afterwards conclude a peace with him; the better to intend their businesse against the Carthaginians.

WE left Hannibal wintering at Capua: where hee and his new Confederates rejoiced (as may bee thought) not a little, to heare the good newes from Carthage of such mightie aide, as was decreed to bee sent thence vnto him. In former times hee had found worke enough, to carrie the Romans corne into his owne barnes, and to driue away their Cattle to Geryon: his victories affording him little other profit, than sustenance for his Armie; by making him Master of the open field. Hee might perhaps haue forc'd some walled Townes, in like sort as he did Geryon, and the Cattle of Cannae; but had he spent much time, about the getting of any one place well defended; the hunger, that his Armie must haue endured the Winter and Spring following, vntill corne were ripe, would haue grievously punished him for such imployment of the Sommer. This may haue bene the reason; why hee forbore to adventure vpon Rome after his victorie at Cannae. For had he failed (as it was a matter of no certaintie) to carrie the Citie at his first coming; want of victualles would haue compelled him to quit the enterprife. Yea many of the people that opened so hastily their gates vnto him, vpon the fresh bruit of his glorious successe, would haue taken time of deliberation, and waited perhaps the euent of another battaile: if being, either for want of meanes to force the Citie, or of necessities to continue a siege before it, repelled (as might seeme) from the walls of Rome, hee had presented himselfe vnto them with a lessened reputation, somewhat later in the yeare; when time to force their obedience was wanting, vntill they would freely yeeld it. But this great part of the care and trauaile was past, when so many States of Italy were become his: the yeare following, the Sannites, and other old enemies of Rome, were like to receive a notable pleasure of their new alliance with Carthage; by helping to lay siege vnto that proud Citie, which so long had held them in subjection. Thus the Winter was passed ouer joyfully, sauing that there came not any tidings of the preparations, to second the welcome report of those mightie forces, that were decreed and expected. The Spring drew on: and of the promised supply there arrived no more, than only the Elephants. How late it was ere these came, I finde not: only we finde, that after this he had about thirtie of them; whereas all, save one, that hee brought ouer the Alpes, had bene lost in his iourne through the marshes of Hetruria. Very bad excuse of this exceeding negligence, they that brought the Elephants could make vnto Hannibal. If they were his friends, they told him truly, what mischiefs the perswasion of Hanno wrought among the too niggardly Carthaginians. Otherwise, they might perhaps informe him, that it was thought a safer, though a farther way about, to passe along through Spain and Gule, as hee himselfe had done; and increase the Armie, by hyring the Barbarians in the iourne; than to commit the maine strength of their Citie, to the hazard of the Seas; especially wanting a commodious Haven, to receiue the fleet that should carrie such a number of Men, Horfes, and Elephants, with all needfull prouisions. With these allegations Hannibal must rest content; and seeke, as well as he can, to satisfie his Italian Confederates. Therefore when time of the yeare serued, he tooke the field; and hauing finished what rested to be done at Callinum, sought to make himselfe Master of some good Haven-towne thereabout; that might serue to entertaine the Carthaginian fleet; or take from his close prisoners to Rome: where the chiefe of them were cast into prison; and the rest sold for bond-slaves. Yet one of their ships that escaped, carried word into Macedon of all that had happened. Whereupon a new Embassage was sent, that went and returned with better speede; concluding, as was agreed before; only with some litle of time.

The Romans were exceedingly perplexed; thinking with what heauie weight this Macedonian warre, in an euill houre, was likely to fall vpon them; when their shoulders were ouer burdened with the load of the Carthaginian. Yet they tooke a noble resolution; and futeable vnto that, whereby they kept off the storme, that else would haue beaten vpon them from Spain. They judged it more easie, with small forces to detain Philip in Greece, than with all their strength to resist him in Italie. And herein they were in the right. For that the very reputation of a King of Macedon, joyning with Hannibal in such a time, would haue sufficed to shake the allegiance not only of the Latines, and other their most faithfull Subjects, but euén of the Roman Colonies that held all priuiledges of the Citie, it will appeare by the following successe of things. M. Valerius the Pretor, with twentie Quinguereme Gallies, was appointed to attend vpon the Macedonian: and to set on foot some commotion in Greece; or to nourish the troubles already therein begonne. Philip was busie about the Sea-townes, that looked towards Italie, setting vpon Apollonia; and thence falling vpon Oricum; which he wanne, and so returned to Apollonia againe. The Epirus craved helpe of M. Valerius: or rather accepted his kinde offers; who had none other businesse to doe. The Garrison that Philip had left in Oricum, was strong enough to hold the Townsmen in good order; but not to keepe out the Romans: of whose daring to attempt any thing against him, on that side the Sea, Philip as then had no suspicion. Valerius therefore easily regained the Towne; and sent thence a thousand men, vnder Namus Crispus an vnder-taking and expert Capitaine; which got by night into Apollonia. These made a notable sallie; and brake into Philip's Trenches with so great slaughter, that they forced him to forsake his camp, and raise the siege. The King purposed (as it is said) to haue departed thence by Sea; but Valerius, coming with his fleet from Oricum, stopped vp the mouth of the Riuer; so that hee was faine to burne his ships, (which belike were no better than long botes) and depart ill furnished of carriages, by Land. After this, Valerius dealt with the Ætolians, a Nation alwaies enemie to the Crowne of Macedon: and easily perswaded them (being so affected, as hath elsẽ where bene shewed) to make strong warre on Philip; wherein he promised them great assistance from the Romans. That which most moued the troublesome spirits of the Ætolians, was the hope of getting Acarnania: after which they had gaped long; and whereof the Roman was as liberal in making promise, as if already it had bene his owne. So a league was made betwene them: and afterward solemnely published at Olympia, by the Ætolians; and by the Romans, in their Capitoll. The conditions were, That from Ætolia to Corycia, in which space Acarnania was contained, all the Countrey should bee subdued, and left vnto the Ætolians; the pillage only to be giuen to the Romans. And that if the Ætolians made peace with Philip, it should be with Prouision, to hold no longer, than whilst hee obtained from doing iniurie to the Romans, or their Associates. This was indeede the only point, whereat Valerius aimed: who promised as much on the Romans behalfe, That they should not make peace with the Macedonian, vnlesse it were with like condition of including the Ætolians. Into this League was place referred for the Lacedemonians and Eleans, as to those that had made or fauoured the side of Cleomenes against the Macedonian, to enter at their pleasure. The like regard was had of Attalus, Pleuratus, and Ser diletus: the first of which reigned at Pergamus, in Asia the lesse, a Prince hereafter much to bee spoken of; the other two held some part of Ilyria, about which the Romans were so farre from contending with them, that gladly they fought to get their friendly acquaintance. But the names of these Associates, are thrust into the Treatie; rather to giue it countenance, than for any readinesse readinesse which they disclofe to enter thereinto. The Ætolians alone, and chiefly Scopas their Pretor, with Dorymachus and others, are yet awhile the only men, of whom the Roman Generalls must make much; as the late French King, Henric the fourth, when he had only the title of Nauarre, was said to court the Majors of Rochel. Philip was noridle, when he heard wherunto the Ætolians tended. He repaired his Armie; made a countenance of warre vpon the Ilyrians, and other his borderers, that were wont in times of danger to inleite the Kingdome of Macedon; walled the Countrey about Oricum and Apollonia; and ouer-running the Pelagians, Dardanians, and others, whom he held suspected, came downe into Thessalie, whence hee made shew as if he would invade Ætolia. By the fame of this Expedition, he thought to stirre vp all the Greekes adjoyning, against the Ætolians; whom they generally detested as a nest of Robbers, troublesome to all the Countrey. To which purpose, and to hinder the Ætolians from breaking into Greece, he left Perseus his sonne and heire, with foure thousand men, vpon their borders: with the rest of his Armie, before greater bulinesse should ouer-take and entangle him; He made a long iourne into Thrace, against a people called the Medes; that were wont to fall vpon Macedon, whensoever the King was absent. The Ætolians, hearing of his departure, armed as many as they could against the Acarnanians; in hope to subdue those their daily enemies, and winne their little Countrey, ere hee should bee able to returne. Hereto it much auailed, that the Romans had already taken Oeniada and Naxos, Acarnanian Townes, conueniently situated to let in an Armie; and conigned them vnto the Ætolians, according to the tenor of the contract lately made with them. But the stout resolution of the Acarnanians, to die (as we say) euery Mothers sonne of them, in defence of their Countrey; together with the great halfe of the Macedonian (who laid aside all other businesse) to succour these his friends; caused the Ætolians to forsake their enterprife. When this Expedition was giuen ouer, the Romans and Ætolians fell vpon Anticyra, which they tooke: the Romans assailing it by Sea; the Ætolians by Land. The Ætolians had the Towne; and the Romans the spoile.

For these good seruices M. Valerius was chosen Consul at Rome; and P. Sulpicius sent in his stead, to keepe the warre on foot in Greece. But besides the Roman helpe, Attalus out of Asia came ouer to assist the Ætolians. Hee was chiefly moued, by his owne jealousy of Philip's greatness: though somewhat also tickled with the vanitie, of being chosen by the Ætolians their principall Magistrate; which honour, though no better than titular, he tooke in very louing part. Against the forces which Attalus and the Romans had sent, being joyned with the maine power of Ætolia, Philip tried the fortune of two battailes: and was victorious in each of them. Hereupon, these his troublesome Neighbours desired peace of him; and vied their best meanes to get it. But when the day, appointed for the conclusion thereof, was come: the Embassadours, in stead of making submission, proposed vnto him such intolerable condition; as ill befemed vanquished men to offer; and might therefore well testifie, that their mindes were altered. It was not any loue of peace, but feare of being besieged in their owne Townes, that had made them delirious of composition. This feare being taken away, by the encouragements of Attalus and the Romans, they were as fierce as euer: and thrust a Garrison of their owne, and some Roman friends, into Elis; which threatened Achaia, wherein Philip then lay. The Romans, making a cut ouer the streight from Naupactis, walled the Countrey in a terrible braverie: wherein Philip required them; coming vpon them in haste from the Azmann Games (which he was then celebrating) and sending them faster away, but nothing richer, than they came.

In the heat of this contention, Prusias King of Bithynia, fearing the growth of Attalus, no lesse than Attalus held suspected the power of Philip; sent a Naue into Greece, to assist the Macedonian partie. The like did the Carthaginians: and vpon greater reason; as being more interested in the successe of his affaires. Philip was too weak by Sea: and though he could man some two hundred ships; yet the Vessells were were such, as could not hold out against the Roman Quinqueremes. Wherefore it behoued him, to vse the helpe of his good friends the Carthaginians. But their aide came somewhat too late: which might better at first haue kept those Enemies from falling vpon any part of Greece; than after wards it could serue to driue them out, when they had pierced into the bowells of that Countrie. Ere Philip could attempt any thing by Sea; it was needfull that he should correct the Eleans, bad Neighbours to the Achaians, his principall Confederates. But in assailing their Towne, Hee was encountered by the Aetolian and Roman Garrison; which draue him back with some losse. In such cases, especially where God intends a great conuersion of Empire, Fame is very powerfull in working. The King had receiued no great detriment, in his retreat from Elis: rather he had giuen testimonie of his personall valour, in fighting well on foot, when his horse was slaine vnder him. He had also loone after taken a great multitude of the Eleans, to the number of foure thousand; with some twentie thousand head of Cattle, which they had brought together into a place of safetie, as they thought, when their Countrie was invaded. But it had happened, that in his pursuit of the Roman forragers about Sicyon, his horse running badly vnder a low tree, had torne off one of the hornes, which (after the fashion of those times) the King wore in his Crest. This was gathered vp by an Aetolian; who carried it home, and shewed it as a token of Philip's death. The horne was well known; and the tale belieued. All Macedon therefore was in a vpror; and not only the Borderers, readie to fall vpon the Countrie, but some Captaines of Philip, callie corrupted; who thinking to make themselves a fortune in that change of things, ranne into such treason, as they might better hope to make good, than to excuse. Hereupon the King returned home; leauing not three thousand men, to assist his friends the Achaians. Hee also tooke order, to haue Beacons erected; that might giue him notice of the Enemies doings; vpon whom hee meant shortly to returne. The affaires of Macedon, his preference quickly established. But in Greece all went ill-favourably: especially in the Ile of Euboea, where one Plator betrayed to Attalus, and the Romans, the Towne of Oreum, ere Philip could arriue to helpe it; where also the strong Citie of Chalcis was likely to haue bene lost, if hee had not come the sooner. He made such hastie marches, that hee had almost taken Attalus in the Citie of Opus. This Citie, lying ouer against Euboea, Attalus had wonne, more through the cowardize of the people, than any great force that hee had vsed. Now because the Roman souldiers had defrauded him in the sack of Oreum, and taken all to themselves: it was agreed, that Attalus should make his best profit of the Opuntians; without admitting the Romans to be his Gaiers. But whilst he was busie, in drawing as much monie as hee could out of the Citizens: the sudden tidings of Philip's arriuall, made him leaue all behinde him, and runne away to the Sea-side, where hee got aboard his ships; finding the Romans gone before, vpon the like feare. Either the indignitie of this misadventure; or tidings of Prusias the Bithynian his insuasion vpon the Kingdom of Pergamus; made Attalus returne home, without staying to take leaue of his friends. So Philip recovered Opus; wonne Torone, Tritonias, Drymon, and many small townes in those parts; performing likewise some Actions, of more brauerie than importance, against the Aetolians. In the meane season, Machanidas, the Tyrant of Lacedaemon, had bene busie in Peloponnesus; but hearing of Philip's arriuall, was returned home.

The Lacedaemonians, hearing certaine report of Cleomenes his death in Egypt, went about to chooe two new Kings; and to conserue themselves to their old manner of gouernment. But their estate was so farre out of tune, that their hope of redressing things within the Citie, proued nolesse vnfortunate, than had bene so their attempts of reconseruing a large Dominion abroad. Lycurgus a Tyrant roleys among them: vnto whom succeeded this Machanidas; and shortly after came Nabis, that was worse than both of them. They held on the Aetolian and Roman side, for feare of the Achaians; that were the chiefe Confederates of Philip, and hated exremely the name both of Tyrant, and of Lacedaemonian. But of these wee shall speake more hereafter.

Philip entring into Achaia, and fecing his presence had brought the contentment of assurance to that Countrie; spake braue wordes to the Assembly of their States, saying, That hee had to doe with an Enemy, that was very nimble, and made warre by running away. Hee told how hee had followed them to Chalcis, to Oreum, to Opus, and now into Achaia; but could no where finde them; such haste they made, for feare of being ouer-taken. But flight, Hee said, was not alwaies prosperous: Hee should one day light vpon them; as ere this hee sundrie times had done, and ill to their losse. The Achaians were glad to heare these wordes; and much the more glad, in regard of his good deedes accompanying them. For he reitored vnto their Nation some Townes, that were in his hand, belonging to them of old. Likewise to the Megalopolitans their Confederates, Hee rendred Aliphera. The Dymiscians, that had bene taken by the Romans, and sold for slaues, Hee fought out, ranfomed, and put in quiet possession of their owne Citie. Further, passing ouer the Corinthian Gulfes, Hee fell vpon the Aetolians: whom hee draue into the mountains and woods, or other their strongest holds; and wasted their Countrie. This done, Hee tooke leaue of the Achaians: and returning home by Sea, visited the people that were his subjects, or dependants; and animated them so well, that they reled fearelesse of any threatening danger. Then had he leifure to make warre vpon the Dardaniens, ill Neighbours to Macedon: with whom neuerthelisse he was not so farre occupied, but that hee could goe in hand with preparing a fleet of an hundred Gallies, whereby to make himselfe Maister of the Sea; the Romans (since the departure of Attalus) hauing not dared to meet or pursue him, when he lately ranne along the coast of Greece, fast by them where they lay.

This good successfe added much reputation to the Macedonian; and emboldened him to make strong warre vpon the Aetolians, at their owne doores. As for the Romans; either some displeasure, conceiued against their Confederates; or some feare of danger at home, when Asdrubal was readie to fall vpon Italie; caused them to giue ouer the care of things in Greece, and leaue their friends there to their owne fortunes. The Aetolians therefore, being driuen to great extremitie, were faine to sue for peace vnto Philip; and accept it, vpon what euer conditions it best pleased him. The agreement was no sooner made, than P. Sempronius with ten thousand foot, a thousand horse, and thirtie fise Gallies, came ouer in great haste (though somewhat too late) to trouble it. Hearing how things went in Aetolia, hee turned aside to Dyrrachium, and Apollonia; making a great noise, as if with these his owne forces hee would worke wonders. But it was not long, ere Philip came to visit him; and found him tame enough. The King presented him bataille: but he refused it; and suffering the Macedonians to waste the Countrie round about, before his eyes, kept himselfe close with in the walls of Apollonia; making some Ouertures of peace: which caused Philip to returne home quietly. The Romans had not so great cause to be displeased with the Aetolians, as had Philip, to take in euill part the demeanour of the Carthaginians. For notwithstanding the Royall offer that hee made them, to serue their turne in Italie, and assist them in getting their hearts desire, before hee would expect any requital: they had not sent any fleet, as in reason they ought, and as (considering his want of sufficient abilitie by Sea) it is likely they were bound, either to secure the transportation of his Armie, or to free his coast from the Roman and Aetolian Pyracies. Only once they came to his helpe, which was, at his last iournie into Achaia. But they were gone againe before his arriuall: hauing done nothing; and pretending feare of being taken by the Romans, euen at such time as Philip, with his owne Naue, durst boldly passe by Sea, and found none that durst oppose him. This relesse dealing of the Carthaginians, may therefore seeme to haue bene one of Hannibal's tricks; whereof Hannibal do bitterly complained. For it could not but grieue this malicious man exceedingly; to heare, that so great a King made offer to serue in person vnder

Hannibal,

Hannibal, and required the assistance of the same Hannibal, as of a man likely to make Monarchs, and alter the affaires of the World at his pleasure. Therefore hee had reason, such as Enue could suggest, to perswade the Carthaginians vnto a safe and thirritie course: which was, not to admit into the fellowship of their Italian warres for mightie a Prince, whom change of affection might make dangerous to their Empire; or his much affection vnto Hannibal, more dangerous to their libertie. Rather they should doe well to saue charges; and feede the Macedonian with hopes; by making many promises of sending a fleet, and some other succours. This would cost nothing: yet would it serue to terrifie the Romans, and compell them to send part of their forces from home; that might finde this Enemie worke abroad. So should the Roman Armies be lessened in Italie; and Philip, when once he was engaged in the warre, be vrged vnto the prosecution, by his owne necessitie: putting the Carthaginians to little or no charges; yea scarce to the labour of giuing him thanks. Now if it might come to passe, as Hannibal euery day did promise, that Rome, and all Italie, should within awhile bee at the deuotion of Carthage: better it were that the Cite should be free, so as the troublesome Greekes might addresse their complaints vnto the Carthaginians, as competent Iudges betweene them and the Macedonian, than that Hannibal, with the power of Africa, should wait vpon Philip as his Executioner, to fulfill his will and pleasure, in doing such injuries, as would both make the name of a Carthaginian hateful in Greece, and oblige Philip to be no lesse impudent, in fulfilling all requests of Hannibal. Whether the counsaile of Hanno and his fellows, were such as this; or whether the Carthaginians, of their owne disposition without his aduice, were too sparing, and carelesse, the matter (as farre as concerned Philip) came to one reckoning. For they did him no manner of good: but rather dodged with him; even in that little courtlike which they most pretended. And this perhaps was part of the reason, why hee begonne the building of an hundred Gallies, as if hee would let them and others know, whereto his proper strength would haue reached, had hee not vainely giuen credit to faithlesse promises. When therefore the Ætolians had submitted themselves alreadie: and when the Romans desired his friendship, as might be thought, for very feare of him; with reputation enough, and not as a forsaken Client of the Carthaginians, but a Prince able to haue succoured them in their necessitie, He might giue over the warre, and, without reprehension, leaue them to themselves. For hee had wilfully entred into trouble for their sakes: but they despised him, as if the quarrell were merely his owne, and hee vnable to manage it. The vanitie of which their conceits would appeare vnto them: when they should see, that with his proper strength he had finished the warre, and concluded it highly to his honour. So the year following it was agreed, by mediation of the Epirots, Acarnanians, and others, That the Romans should retaine three or foure Townes of Illyria, which they had recovered in this warre, being part of their old Illyrian Conquest: Places no way belonging to the Macedonian; and therefore perhaps inserted into the covenants, that somewhat might seeme to haue been gotten. On the other side, the Atinians were appointed to returne vnder the obedience of Philip: who, if they were (as Ortelius probably conjectures) the people of the Countie about Apollonia, then did the Romans abandon part of their gettings; whereby it appeares, that they did not giue peace, as they would seeme to haue done, but accepted it, vpon conditions somewhat to their losse.

The Confederates and Dependents of the Macedonian, comprehended in this Peace, were Prusias King of Bithynia, the Achaens, Boeotians, Thessalians, Acarnanians, and Epirots. On the Roman side were named, first, the People of Illyria, as an honorable remembrance of the Romans descent from Troy; then, Attalus King of Pergamus; Pleuratus, an Illyrian Prince; and Nabis, the Tyrant of Lacedæmon; together with the Eleans, Messenians, and Athenians. The Ætolians were omitted, belike, as hauing agreed for themselves before. But the Eleans and Messenians, followers of the Ætolians, (and by them, as is most likely, comprised in their League with Philip) were were also infected by the Romans; that were neuer slow in offering their friendship to small and feeble Nations. As for the Athenians, they stood much vpon their old honour; and loued to beare a part, though they did nothing, in all great Actions. Yet the setting downe of their name in this Treatie, serued the Romans to good purpose: forasmuch as they were a bulke people; and ministred occasion to renew the Warre, when meanes did better serue to follow it.

§. XIII.

How the Romans beganne to recover their strength by degrees. The noble affection of the Romans, in relieuing the publike necessities of their Common-wealth.

It was a great fault in the Carthaginians, that embracing so many Enterprises at once, they followed all by the halues; and wasted more men and monie to no purpose, than would haue serued (if good order had bene taken) to finish the whole warre in farre shorter space; and make themselves Lords of all that the Romans held. This error had bene the lesse harmefull, if their care of Italie had bene such as it ought. But they suffered Hannibal, to wearie himselfe with expectation of their promised supplies: which being still deferred from yeare to yeare, caused as great opportunities to be lost, as a Conquerour could haue desired. The death of Polibonius, and destruction of his whole Armie in Gaul; the begunne rebellion of the Sardinians; the death of Hiero their friend in Syracuse; with great alterations, much to their prejudice, in the whole Ile of Sicily; as also that Warre, of which we last spake, threatened from Macedon; happening all at one time; and that so nearely after their terrible ouerthrow at Cannæ, among so many reuolts of their Italian Confederates; would vtterly haue sunke the Roman State, had the Carthaginians, if not the first year, yet atleast the second, sent ouer to Hannibal the forces that were decreed. It is not to be doubted, that euen this diuersitie of great hopes, appearing from all parts, admitted matter vnto Hanno, or such as Hanno was, wherupon to worke. For though it were in the power of Carthage, to performe all that was decreed for Italie: yet could not that proportion hold, when so many new occurrences brought each along with them their new care; and required their severall Armies. This had not bene a very bad excuse, if any one of the many occasions offered had bene thoroughly prosecuted: though it flood with best reason, that the foundation of all other hopes and comforts, which was the prosperitie of Hannibal in his Italian warre, should haue bene strengthened; whatsoever had become of the rest. But the slender troups, wherewith the Carthaginians fed the warre in Spain; the lingering aide which they sent, to vp-hold the Sardinian rebellion, when it was alreadie well neare beaten downe; their trifling with Philip; and (amongst all these their attempts) their hastic catching at Sicily: little deferred to be thought good reasons of neglecting the maine point, whereto all the rest had reference. Rather every one of these Actions, considered apart by it selfe, was no otherwise to be allowed as discreetly vnder-taken, or substantially followed; than by making supposition, That the care of Italie, made the Carthaginians more negligent in all things else. Yet if these allegations would not serue to content Hannibal; then must hee patiently endure to know, that his owne Citizens were jealous of his Greatnesse, and durst not trust him with so much power, as should enable him to wrong the State at home.

Whatsoever he heard or thought, Hannibal was glad to apply himselfe to Necessitie, to feede his Italian friends with hopes; and to trifle away the time about Naples, Naples, Cuma, and other places: being loth to spend his Armie in an hard siege, that was to be referred for a worke of more importance. Many offers hee made vpon upon Nola; but alwaies with bad successe. Once Marcellus fought a battaile with him there: yet vnder the very walls of the Towne; hauing the assistance of the Citizens, that were growne better affected to the Roman side, since the Heads, that inclined them to rebellion, were cut off. About a thousand men Hannibal in that fight lost: which was no great meruaile; his forces being then diuided, and imployed in sundrie parts of Italie at once. Naples was, euen in those daies, a strong Citie; and required a yeares worke to haue taken it by force. Wherefore the earnest desire of Hannibal to get it, was alwaies frustrate. Vpon the Towne of Cuma they of Capua had their plot; and were in hope to take it by cunning. They sent to the chiefe Magistrates of the Cumans, desiring them (as being also Campans) to be present at a solemn sacrifice of the Nation, where they would consult about their general good: promising to bring thither a sufficient guard, to assure the whole Assembly, from any danger that might come by the Romans. This motion the Cumans made them to entertaine; but priuily sent word of all to T. Sempronius Gracchus the Roman Consul.

Gracchus was a very good man of warre; and happily chosen Consul in so dangerous a time. His Colleague should haue bene Posthumus Albinus, that was lately slaine by the Gauls: after whose death Marcellus was chosen; as being judged the fittest man to encounter with Hannibal. But the Roman Augures either found some religious impediment, that nullified the election of Marcellus; or at least they feared so to haue done: because this was the first time, that euer two Plebeian Consuls were chosen together. Marcellus therefore gaue ouer the place: and Q. Fabius Maximus the late famous Dictator, was substituted in his room. But Fabius was detained in the Citie, about matters of Religion, or Superstition: wherewith Rome was commonly, especially in times of danger, very much troubled. So Gracchus alone, with a Conular Armie, waited vpon Hannibal among the Campans: not able to meet the Enemy in field; yet intenuie to all occasions, that should be presented. The Volones, or slaves, that lately had bene armed, were no small part of his followers. These, and the rest of his men, hee continually trained: and had not a greater care, to make his Armie skilfull in the exercises of warre; than to keepe it from quarrells, that might arise by vbraiding one another with their base condition.

Whilest the Consul was thus busied at Linternum; the Senators of Cuma sent him word, of all that had passed betweene them and the Capuans. It was a good occasion to flesh his men, and make them confident against the Enemy; of whom hitherto they had bad experience. Gracchus therefore put himselfe into Cuma: whence he issued at such time, as the Magistrates of that Citie were expected by the Campans. The Sacrifice was to be performed by night, at a place called Hana, three miles from Cuma. There lay Marius Alfius the chiefe Magistrate of Capua, with foureteene thousand men; not wholly intent either to the Sacrifice, or to any danger that might interrupt it; but rather deuising how to surprize others, than fearing himselfe to be assailed. The Consul therefore, suffering none to goe forth of Cuma, that might beare word of him to the Enemies, issued out of the Towne when it grew darke: his men being well refreshed with meat and sleepe, the day before, that they might hold out the better in this nights seruice. So he came vpon the Capuans vnawares: and slew more than two thousand of them, together with their Commander; loosing not about an hundred of his owne men. Their campe he tooke: but taried not long to rise it, for feare of Hannibal; who lay not farr off. By this his prouidence, he escaped a greater losse, than he had brought vpon the Enemies. For when Hannibal was informed how things went at Hana, forthwith he marched thither: hoping to finde those yong souldiers, and slaues, busied in making spoile, and loading themselves with the bootie. But they were all gotten safe within Cuma; which partly for anger, partly for desire of gaining it, and partly at the vrgent entreatie of the Capuans, Hannibal assailed the next day. Much labour, and with ill successe, the Carthaginian and their fellows spent about this Towne. They raised a wooden Tower against it: which they brought close vnto the walls; and thinking thereby to force an Entrie. But the Defendants, on the inside of the wall, raised against this an higher Tower: whence they made resistance; and found meanes at length, to consume with fire the worke of their Enemies. While the Carthaginians were busied in quenching the fire; the Romans, falling out of the Towne at two gates, charged them valiantly, and draue them to their Trenches, with the slaughter of about foureteene hundred. The Consul wisely founded the Retreat; ere his men were too farr engaged, and Hannibal in a readinesse to requite their seruice. Neither would He, in the pride of this good successe, adventure forth against the Enemy; who presented him battaile the day following, neare vnto the walls. Hannibal therefore, seeing no likelihood to preuaile in that which he had taken in hand, brake vp the siege; and returned to his old Campe at Tifata. About these times, and shortly after, when Fabius the other Consul had taken the field; some small Townes were recovered by the Romans, and the people feuerly punished for their revolt.

The Carthaginian Armie was too small, to fill with Garrisons all places that had yielded; and withall to abide (as it must doe) strong in the field. Wherefore Hannibal, attending the supplic from home, that should enable him to strike at Rome it selfe, was driven in the meane time to alter his course of warre: and, in stead of making (as formerly he had done) a general inuasion vpon the whole Country, to passe from place to place; and wait vpon occasions, that grew daily more commodious to the enemy, than to him. The Country of the Hirpines and Samnites was grievously waied by Marcellus, in the absence of Hannibal: as also was Campania, by Fabius the Consul; when Hannibal hauing followed Marcellus to Nola, and received there the losse before mentioned, was gone to Winter in Apulia. These people shewed not the like spirit in defending their lands, and fighting for the Carthaginian Empire, as in former times they had done; when they contended with the Romans, in their owne behalfe, to get the Souerainty. They held it reason, that they should be protected, by such as thought to haue dominion ouer them: whereby at once they overburdened their new Lords; and gaue vnto their old the more easie meanes, to take reuenge of their defection.

The people of Rome were very intenuie, as necessitie constrained them, to the worke that they had in hand. They continued Fabius in his Consulship: and ioyred with him M. Claudius Marcellus; whom they had appointed vnto that honour the yeare before. Of these two, Fabius was called the Shield; and Marcellus, the Roman Sword. In Fabius it was highly, and vpon iust reason, commended, That being himselfe Consul, and holding the Election, he did not stand vpon nice points of formalitie, or regard what men might thinke of his ambition, but caused himselfe to be chosen with Marcellus; knowing in what neede the Citie stood of able Commanders. The great name of these Consuls, and the great preparations which the Romans made; serued to put the Campans in feare, that Capua it selfe should be besieged. To prevent this, Hannibal at their earnest entreatie came from Arpi: (where he lay, hearkening after news from Tarentum), and, hauing with his presence comforted these his friends, fell on the sudden vpon Puteoli, a Sea towne of Campania; about which he spent three dayes in vaine, hoping to haue wonne it. The Garrison in Puteoli was fixe thousand strong: and did their ducie so well, that the Carthaginian, finding no hope of good successe, could onely shew his anger vpon the fields there; and about Naples; which hauing done, and once more (with as ill successe as before) assailed Nola, he bent his course to Tarentum: wherin he had verie great intelligence.

Whilest he was in his progresse thither; Hanno made a iourne against Beneuentum; and T. Gracchus the last yeares Consul, hauing from Aueris, met him there; and fought with him a battaile. Hanno had with him about seauenteene thousand Foot, Britians and Lucans for the most part: besides twelue hundred Horse; verie few of which were Italians, all the rest, Numidians and Moors. He held the Roman works four hours ere it could be perceived, to which side the victorie would incline. But Gracchus his souldiers, which were all (in a manner) the late-armed flaues, had received from their Generall a peremptorie denunciation; That this day, or neuer, they must purchase their libertie, bringing every man, for price thereof, an Enemies head. The sweet reward of libertie was so greatly desired, that none of them feared any danger in earning it; howbeit that vaine labour, imposed by their Generall, of cutting off the flaine Enemies heads, troubled them exceedingly; and hindered the seruice, by employment of so many hands, in a worke so little concerning the victorie. Gracchus therefore finding his owne error, wisely corrected it; proclaiming a loude, That they should cast away the heads, and spare the trouble of cutting of any more; for that all should haue libertie immediatly after the battaile, if they wanne the day. This encouragement made them run headlong vpon the Enemy; whom their desperate furie had soone ouerthrowne, if the Roman Horle could haue made their part good against the Numidian. But though Hanno did what hee could, and pressed so hard vpon the Roman battaile, that foure thousand of the flaues, (for feare either of him, or of the punishment which Gracchus had threatned before the battaile, vnto those that should not valiantly beaue themselves) retired vnto a ground of strength: yet was hee glad at length to faue himselfe by flight, when the Grosse of his Armie was broken; being vnable to remedie the losse. Leaving the field, hee was accompanied by no more than two thousand: most of which were Horle; all the rest were either flaine or taken. The Roman Generall gaue vnto all his souldiers that reward of libertie, which hee had promised: but vnto those foure thousand, which had recoiled vnto the Hill, he added this light punishment; That as long as they serued in the warres, they should neither eate nor drinke otherwise than standing, vnlesse sicknesse forced them to breake his Order. So the victorious Armie returned to Beneuentum: where the newly enfranchised souldiers were seales in public by the townsmen; some sitting, some standing, & all of them hauing their heads couered (as was the custome of flaues manumised) with Caps, or white wooll. The picture of this Feast (as a thing worthe of remembrance) was afterward hung vp in a Table by Gracchus, in the Temple of Libertie; which his father had built and dedicated. This was indeede the first Battaille, worthe of great note, which the Carthaginians had lost since the coming of Hannibal into Italie: the victories of Marcellus at Nola, and of this Gracchus before at Flame, being things of small importance.

Thus the Romans through industrie, by little and little, repaired that great Breach in their Estate, which Hannibal had made at Canna. But all this while, and long after this, their Treasurie was so poore, that no industrie nor art could serue to helpe it. The fruits of their grounds did onely (and perhaps hardly) serue, to feede their Townes and Armies; without any surpluse, that might be exchanged for other needfull commodities. Few they were in Italie, that continued to pay them tribute: which also they could worke doe than before; as liuing vpon the same Trade, and subiect to the same inconueniences, which enfeebled Rome it selfe. Sicily and Sardinia, that were wont to yield great profit, hardly now maintained the Roman Armies, that lay in those Prouinces, to hold them safe and in good order. As for the Citizens of Rome, every one of them suffered his part of the detriment, which the Common-wealth sustained, and could now doe least for his Countrey, when most need was: as also the number of them was much decreased; so as if money should be raised vpon them by the poll, yet must it be farre lesse, than in former times. The Senate therefore, diligently considering the greatnes of the war within the bowels of Italie, that could not be thence expelled without the exceeding charge of many good Armies; the perill, which Sicily and Sardinia stood, both of the Carthaginians, and of many a mong the Naturals declining from the friendship or subiection of Rome; the threats of the Macedonians, readie to land in the Easterne parts of Italie, if they were not at the coile to finde him worke at home; the greater threats of Asdrubal, to follow his brother ouer the Alpes, as soone as he could rid himselfe of the Scipio in Spain; and the pueritie of the Common-wealth, which had not monie for any one of these mortall dangers: were driuen almost euen to extreme want of counsaile. But being urged by the violence of swift necessitie, signified in the letters of the two Scipio from Spain; they resolved vpon the only course, without which the Citie could not haue subsisted.

They called the people to Assembly: wherein Q. Fabius the Pretor laide open the publique wants; and plainly said, That in this Exigent, there must be no taking of monie for victuaile, weapons, apparrell, or the like things needfull to the Souldiers: but that such as had stiffe, or were artificers, must truft the Common-wealth with the Loane of their commodities, and labours, vntill the Warre were ended. Hereunto hee so effectually exhorted all men, especially the Publicans or Customers, and those which in former times had liued vpon their dening in the common Reuenues, that the charge was vnder-taken by private men; and the Armie in Spain as well supplied, as if the Treasurie had bene full. Shortly after this, M. Atilius Regulus, and P. Furius Philus the Roman Censors, taking in hand the redresse of disorders within the Citie, were chiefly intente to the correction of those, that had mis-behaued themselves in this present warre. They beganne with L. Cassius Metellus: who, after the battaile at Canna, had held discourse with some of his companions, about flying beyond the Seas; as if Rome, and all Italie, had bene no better than lost. After him they tooke in hand those, that hauing brought to Rome the message of their fellowes made prisoners at Canna, returned not back to Hannibal, as they were bound by oath; but thought themselves thereof sufficiently discharged, in that they had leaped once back into his campe; with pretence of taking better notice of the Captiues names. All these were now pronounced infamous by the Censors: as also were a great many more; euen whosoever had not serued in the warres, after the terme which the Lawes appointed. Neither was the note of the Censors at this time (as otherwise it had vied to bee) hurtfull only in reputation: but greater weight was added thereto, by this Decree of the Senate following; That all such as were noted with infamie by these Censors, should bee transported into Sicily, there to serue vntill the end of the Warre, vnder the same hard conditions, that were imposed vpon the Remainer of the Armie beaten at Canna. The Office of the Censors was; to take the List and account of the Citizens; to choose or displace the Senators; and to set notes of disgrace (without further punishment) vpon those, whose vnholiness or vicious behaviour fell not within compasse of the Law. They tooke also an account of the Roman Gentlemen: among whom they distributed the publique Horles of service, vnto such as they thought meet; or tooke them away for their misbehaviour. Generally, they had the ouer-sight of mens lues and manners: and their censure was much reuerenced and feared; though it extended no further, than to putting men out of ranke; or making them change their Tribe; or (which was the most that they could doe) causing them to pay some Duties to the Treasurie, from which others were exempted. But besides the care of this generall Taxe, and matters of Moraltie, they had the charge of all publique Workes; as mending of high waies, bridges, and water-courses, the reparations of Temples, Porches, and such other buildings. If any man encroched vpon the streets, high-waies, or other places that ought to bee common; the Censors compelled him to make amends. They had also the letting out of Lands, Customes, and other publique Reuenues, to farme: so that most of the Citizens of Rome were beholding vnto this Office; as maintayning themselves by some of the Trades thereto belonging. And this was no small helpe to conserue the dignitie of the Senate: to commonallie being obnoxious vnto the Censors; which were alwaies of that Order, and carefull to vp-hold the reputation thereof. But the Common-weale being now impouerished by warre, and hauing small store of Lands to let, or of Customes that were worth the farming, Regulus and Philus troubled not themselves much with perueling the Temples, or other decayed Places, that needed reparations: or if they tooke a view of what was requisite to be done in this kinde, yet forbore they to let any thing in hand, because they had not wherewith to pay. Herein againe appeared a notable generositie of the Romans. They that had bene accustomed, in more happie times, to vndertake such peeces of worke, offered now themselves as willingly to the Censors, as if there had bene no such want: promising liberally their cost and trauaile, without expectation of any payment, before the end of the warre. In like sort, the Masters of those slaues, that lately had bene enfranchised by Gracchus, were very well contented to forebear the price of them, vntill the Citie were in better case to pay. In this generall inclination of the Multitude, to relieue, as farre forth as euery one was able, the common necessitie; all the goods of Orphans, and of Widowes liuing vnder Patronage, were brought into the Treasurie; and there the Quæstor kept a booke, of all that was laied out for the sustenance of these Widowes and Orphans: whilēt the whole stock was vsed by the Citie. This good example of those which remained in the Towne, preuailed with the Souldiers abroad: so that (the poorer sort excepted) they refused to take pay, and called those Martinsvies, that did accept it, when their countrie was in so great want.

The twelue hundred Talents, wrongfully extorted from the Carthaginians, nor any injuries following, done by the Romans in the height of their pride, yielded halfe so much commoditie, as might bee laied in balance against these miseries, wherinto their Estate was now reduced. Neuerthelesse if wee consider things aright; the calamities of this Warre did rather enable Rome to deale with those Enemies, whom shee forth-with vnder-tooke, than abate or slacken the growth of that large Dominion, whereto shee attained, ere the yongest of those men was dead, whose names wee haue already mentioned. For by this hammering, the Roman metall grew more hard and solide: and by paring the branches of priuate fortunes, the Root and Heart of the Common-wealth was corroborated. So grew the Citie of Athens; when Xerxes had burnt the Towne to ashes, and taken from euery particular Citizen all hope of other felicitie, than that which rested in the common happinesse of the vniuersalitie. Certaine it is, (as Sir Francis Bacon hath judiciously obserued) That a State whose dimension or stemme is small, may aptly serue to be foundation of a great Monarchie: which chiefly comes to passe, whereall regard of domestical prosperitie is laied aside; and euery mans care addressed to the benefit of his countrie. Hereof I might say, that our Age hath scene a great example, in the vniited Provinces in the Netherlandes; whose present riches and strength, grew chiefly from that ill assurance, which each of their Townes, or almost of their Families, perceiued it selfe to hold, whilēt the Generalltie was oppressed by the Duke of Alva; were it so, that the people had thereby growne as warlike, as by extreme indurie, and straining themselves to fill their publike Treasurie, they are all growne wealthy, strong at Sea, and able to wage great Armies for their seruices by Land. Wherefore if wee valew at such a rate as we ought, the patient Resolution, conformitie to good Order, obedience to Magistrates, with many other Vertues, and, aboue all other, the great loue of the Common-weale, which was found in Rome in these dangerous times: we may truly say, That the Citie was neuer in greater likelihood to prosper. Neither can it be deemed otherwise, than that if the same affections of the people had lasted, when their Empire, being growne more large and beautifull, should in all reason haue bene more deare vnto them; if the riches and delicacies of Africa had not infected infected them with sensuality, and carried their appetites mainly to those pleasures, wherein they thought their well-being to consist; if all the Citizens, and Subjects of Rome, could haue believed their owne interest to be as great, in those wars which those latter Emperours made for their defence, as in these which were managed by the Consuls: the Empire, founded vpon so great vertue, could not haue bene throwne downe by the hands of rude Barbarians, were they neuer so many. But vnto all Dominions God hath set their periods: Who, though hee hath giuen vnto Man the knowledge of those waies, by which Kingdomes rise and fall; yet hath left him subject vnto the affections, which draw on these fatall changes, in their times appointed.

§. XIII.

The Romans winne some Townes back from HANNIBAL. HANNIBAL winnes Tarentum. The siege of Capua. Two victories of HANNIBAL. The iourne of HANNIBAL to the gates of Rome. Capua taken by the Romans.

As the People of Rome strained themselves to the vtmost, for maintayning the warre: so their Generals abroad omitted no part of industrie, in seeking to recouer what had bene lost. The Towne of Castine, Fabius beleiged. It was well defended by the Carthaginian Garrison; and likely to haue bene relieved by those of Capua, if Marcellus from Nola had not come to the assistance of his Colleague. Neuerthelesse the place held out so obdutely, that Fabius was disposed to giue it ouer: saying, that the enterprise was not great; yet as difficult, as atting of more importance. But Marcellus was of a contrarie opinion. He said, That many such things, as were not at first to haue bene vnder-taken by great Commanders, ought yet, when once they were taken in hand, to bee prosecuted vnto the best effect. So the siege held on: and the Towne was pressed so hard, that the Campanians dwelling therein grew fearefull, and craved parlee; offering to giue it vp, so as all might haue leaue to depart in safetie, whither they pleased. Whilēt they were thus treating of conditions: or whilēt they were issuing forth, according to the composition already made; (for it is diuersly reported) Marcellus, seizing vpon a Gate, entred with his Armie, and put to sword that came in their way. Fiftie of those that were first gotten out, ranne to Fabius the Consul: wo saved them, and sent them to Capua in falcie; all the rest were either slaine, or made prisoners. If Fabius deserued commendations, by holding his word good vnto these fiftie; I know not how the slaughter of the rest, or imprisonment afterward of such, as escaped the heat of execution, could bee excused by Marcellus. It may be that he helped himselfe, after the Roman fashion, with some quiuocation, but he shall pay for it hereafter. In like sort was Mount Marfan in Gallie taken by the Marshall Manlius, when I was a yong man in France. For whilēt he entertained parlee about composition; the besieged ranne all from their severall guards, vpon hastie desire of being acquainted with the conditions proposed. The Marshall therefore discouering a part of the walls vnguarded, entred by Sedala; and put all due the Gouverneur vnto the sword. Herein that Gouverneur of Mount Marfan committed two grosse errors; the one, in that hee gaue no order for the Capitaines and Companies, to hold themselves in their places; the other, in that he was content to parlee, without pledges for assurance giuen and received. Some such ouer-sight, the Gouverneur of Castine seemeth to haue committed; yet neither the aduantage taken by Marcellus, or by Manlius, was very honourable. When this worke was ended, many small Townes of the Samnites, and some of the

Lucans and Apulians, were recovered: wherein were taken, or slaine, about five and twentie thousand of the Enemies; and the Countrey grievously waited by Fabius, Marcellus lying sick at Neola.

Hannibal in the meane while was about Sirientum; waiting to heare from those, that had promised to giue vp the Towne. But M. Valerius, the Roman Propretor, had thrust for many men into it, that the Traitors durst not stirre. Wherefore the Carthaginian was faine to depart, hauing wearied himselfe in vaine with expectation. Yet he waited not the Countrey; but contented himselfe with hope, that they would please him better in time following. So he departed thence toward Salapia: which he chose for his wintering place; and beganne to victualle it, when Sommer was but halfe past. It is said, that he was in loue with a yong Wench in that towne: in which regard if he beganne his Winter more timely, than other wise needed requir'd, He did not like the Romans; whom necessity enforced, to make their Sommer last as long, as they were able to trauaile vp and downe the Countrey.

About this time beganne great troubles, in Sicily; whither Marcellus the Consul was sent, to take such order for the Province, as neede should require. Of the doings there, which were out more time than his Consulship, we will speake hereafter.

The new Consuls, chosen at Rome, were Q. Fabius the sonne of the present Consul, and T. Sempronius Gracchus the second time. The Romans found it needfull for the publicke seruice, to employ often-times their best able men: and therefore made it lawfull, during the warre, to recontinue their Officers, and chosse such, as had lately held their places before; without regarding any dilance of time, which was otherwise required. The old Fabius became Lieutenant vnto his sonne: which was perhaps the respect, that most commended his sonne vnto the place. It is noted, That when the old man came into the campe, and his sonne rode forth to meet him: eleven of the twelve Liſtors, which carried each an axe with a bundle of rods before the Consul, suffered him, in regard of due reuerence, to passe by them on horse back; which was against the custome. But the sonne perceiving this, commanded the last of his Liſtors to note it: who thereupon bad the old Fabius alight, and come to the Consul on his feet. The father chearefully did so, saying, It was my minde, sonne, to make triall, whether thou diddest understand thy selfe to bee Consul. Cassius Attinius a wealthie Citizen of Arpi, who, after the battaile at Canna, had holpen the Carthaginian into that Towne, seeing now the fortune of the Romans to amend; came priuily to this Consul Fabius, and offered to render it back vnto him, if he might bee therefore well rewarded. The Consul purposed to follow old examples: and to make this Attinius a patterne to all Traitors; vſing him, as Camillus and Fabius had done those, that offered their vnfaithfull seruice against the Falſci, and King Pyrhus. But Q. Fabius the father, was of another opinion: and said, it was a matter of dangerous consequence, That it should be thought more safe to reuolt from the Romans, than to turne vnto them. Wherefore it was concluded, that hee should be sent to the Towne of Cales, and there kept as prisoner; vntill they could better resolue, what to doe with him, or what vse to make of him. Hannibal, vnderstanding that Attinius was gone, and among the Romans, tooke it not sorrowfully; but thought this a good occasion, to seize vpon all the mans riches, which were great. Yet, that he might seeme rather seuerer, than couctous, He sent for the wife and children of Attinius into his campe: where hauing examined them by torment, partly concerning the departure and intentions of this fugitiue, partly, and more strictly, about his riches, what they were, and where they lay, He condemned them, as partakers of the Treason, to be burnt aliue; and tooke all their goods vnto himselfe. Fabius the Consul shortly after came to Arpi: which he wanne by Scalade, in a stormie and rainie night. Five thousand of Hannibals Souldiers lay in the Towne; and of the Arpines themselves, there were about three thousand. These were thrust forth by the Carthaginian Garrison; when it was vnderstood, that the Romans had gotten ouer the wall, and broken open a Gate. For the souldiers held the townsmen suspected:

ſuſpected; and therefore thought it no wiſedome, to truſt them at their backs. But after ſome little reſiſtance, the Arpines gaue ouer fight, and entertained parlee with the Romans: proteſting, that they had beene betrayed by their Princes; and were become ſubject to the Carthaginians, againſt their wills. In proceſſe of this diſcouriſe, the Arpine Pretor went vnto the Roman Conſul: and receiuing his faith for ſecuritie of the Towne, preſently made head againſt the Garriſon. This notwithstanding; like it is, that Hannibals men continued to make good reſiſtance. For when almoſt a thouſand of them, that were Spaniards, offered to leaue their companions, and ſerue ouer the Roman ſide; it was yet couenanted, That the Carthaginians ſhould be ſuffered to paſſe forth quietly, and returne to Hannibal. This was performed: and ſo Arpi became Roman againe; with little other loſſe, than of him that had betrayed it. About the ſame time, Cliternum was taken by Sempronius Tuditanus, one of the Pretors: and vnto Cneius Fulvius, another of the Pretors, an hundred and twelue Gentlemen of Capua offered their ſeruice; vpon no other condition, than to haue their goods reſtored vnto them, when their Citie ſhould bee recovered by the Romans. This was a thing of ſmall importance: but conſidering the generall hatred of the Campans toward Rome, it ſerued to diſcouer the inclination of the Italians in thoſe times; and how their affections recoiled from Hannibal, when there was no appearance of thoſe mightie ſuccours, that had beene promiſed from Carthage. The Conſentines alſo, and the Thurines, people of the Bruttians, that had yielded themſelves to Hannibal; returned againe to their old allegiance. Others would haue followed their example; but that one L. Pomponius, who of a Publican had made himſelfe a Capitaine, and gotten reputation by ſome petty exploits in forraging the countrey, was ſlaine by Hanna, with a great multitude of thoſe that followed him. Hannibal in the meane while had all his care bent vpon Tarentum; which if hee could take, it ſeemed that it would ſtand him in good ſtead, for drawing out that helpe out of Aſaden, which his Carthaginians failed to ſend. Long he waited, ere he could bring his deſire to paſſe: and being loth to hazard his forces, where hee hoped to preuaile by intelligence; He contented himſelfe, with taking in ſome poore Townes of the Salentines. At length, his Agents within Tarentum found means to accompliſh their purpoſe, and his wiſh. One Phileas, that was of their conſpiracie, who lay at Rome as Embaſſador, praſtiſing with the Hoſtages of the Tarentines, and ſuch as had the keeping of them, conuiged them by night out of the Citie. But hee and his companie were the next day ſo cloſely purſued, that all of them were taken, and brought back to Rome; where they ſuffered death, as Traitors. By reaſon of this crueltie, or ſecuritie, the people of Tarentum grew to hate the Romans, more generally and earnestly than before. As for the Conſpirators, they followed their buſineſſe the more diligently; as knowing what reward they were to expect, if their intention ſhould happen to be diſcouered. Wherefore they ſent againe to Hannibal: and acquainting him with the manner of their plot, made the ſame compoſition with him for the Tarentines, which they of Capua had made before. Nico and Philomenes, two the chief among them, vſed much to goe forth of the Towne on hunting by night, as if they durſt not take their pleaſure by day, for feare of the Carthaginians. Seldome or neuer they miſſed of their game: for the Carthaginians prepared it readie for their hands, that they might not ſeeme to haue been abroad vpon other occaſion. From the campe of Hannibal, it was about three daies iourne to Tarentum, if hee ſhould haue marched thither with his whole Armie. This cauſed his long abode in one place the leſſe to be ſuſpected: as alſo to make his Enemies the more ſecure. He cauſed it to be giuen out, that he was ſick. But when the Romans within Tarentum, were growne careleſſe of ſuch his neighbourhood, and the Conſpirators had ſet their buſineſſe in order; He tooke with him ten thouſand the moſt expedite of his horſe and foot; and long before breake of day, made all ſpeede thitherward. Fourſcore light horſe of the Numidians ranne a great way before him, beating all the waies, and killing any that they met, for feare left he, and his troupe following him, ſhould be diſcouered.

covered. It had beene often the manner of some few Numidian horse, to doe the like in former times. Wherefore the Roman Governour, when he heard tell in the evening, that some Numidians were abroad in the fields, tooke it for a signe, that Hannibal was not as yet dillodged; and gaue order, that some companies should be sent out the next morning, to itrip them of their bootie, and send them gone. But when it grew darke night; Hannibal, guided by Philemenes, came close to the towne: where, according to the tokens agreed vpon, making a light to shew his arrival; Nico, that was within the Towne, answered him with another light, in signe that he was readie. Presently Nico beggan to set vpon one of the Gates, and to kill the watchmen. Philemenes went toward another gate: and whistling (as was his manner) called vp the Porter; bidding him make haste, for that hee had killed a great Bore, so heaue, that scarce two men could stand vnder it. So the Porter opened the wicket: and forthwith entred two yong men, loaden with the Bore, which Hannibal had prepared large enough, to bee worthe the looking on. While the Porter stood wondering at the largenesse of the beast, Philemenes ranne him through with his Bore-speare: and letting in some thirtie armed men, fell vpon all the watch; whom when he had slaine, he entred the great gate. So the Armie of Hannibal, entring Tarentum at two gates, went directly toward the Market-place; where both parts met. Thence they were distributed by their Generall, and sent into all quarters of the Citie, with Tarentines to be their guides. They were commanded to kill all the Romans, and not to hurt the Citizens. For better performance hereof Hannibal willed the Conspirators, that when any of their friends appeared in fight, they should bid him be quiet, and of good cheare. All the Towne was in an vprore: but few could tell what the matter meant. A Roman trumpet was vnskillfully founded by a Greece in the Theater: which helped the suspition, both of the Tarentines, that the Romans were about to spoile the Towne; and of the Romans, that the Citizens were in commotion. The Governour fled into the Port: and taking boat, got into the Citadell, that stood in the mouth of the Haven; whence hee might easily perceiue the next morning, how all had passed. Hannibal, assembling the Tarentines, gaue them to vnderstand, what good affection hee bore them; inuighed bitterly against the Romans, as tyrannous oppressors; and spake what else he thought fit for the present. This done: and hauing gotten such spoile as was to bee had of the Souldiers goods in the Towne, he addrest himselfe against the Citadell; hoping that if the Garrison would fall out, he might giue them such a blow, as should make them vnable to defend the Peerce. According to his expectation it partly fell out. For when he beganne to make his approaches, the Romans in a brauerie falling forth, gaue charge vpon his men: who fell back of purpose according to direction, till they had drawne on as many as they could, and so farre from their strength, as they durst adventure. Then gaue Hannibal a signe to his Carthaginians, who lay prepared readie for the purpose: and fiercely setting vpon the Enemy, draue him back with great slaughter, as fast as he could runne; so that afterwards he durst not issue forth. The Citadell stood vpon a Demi-Iland, that was plaine ground; and fortified only with a ditch and wall against the Towne, whereunto it was ioyned by a cawsey. This cawsey Hannibal intended to fortifie in like sort against the Citadell; to the end that the Tarentines might be able, without his helpe, to keepe themselves from all danger thence. His worke in few daies went so well forward, without impediment from the besieged, that hee conceiued hope of winning the Peerce it selfe, by taking a little more paines. Wherefore he made readie all sorts of engines, to force the place. But whilet he was busied in his workes, there came by Sea a strong supply from Metapontum: which tooke away all hope of preuailling; and made him returne to his former counsaile. Now forasmuch as the Tarentine fleet lay within the Haven, and could not passe forth, whilet the Romans held the Citadell: it seemed likely, that the Towne would suffer want, being debarred of accustomed trade and provisions by Sea; whilet the Roman Garrison, by helpe of their shipping, might easily be relieued.

lieued, and enabled to hold out. Against this inopuenience, it was rather willed by the Tarentines, than any way hoped, that their fleet could get out of the Haven, to guard the mouth of it, and cut off all supply from the Enemy. Hannibal told them, that this might well be done: for that their Towne standing in plaine ground, and their streets being faire and broad, it would bee no hard matter to draw the Gallies ouer Land, and lanch them into the Sea without. This he vnderooke and effected: whereby the Roman Garrison was reduced into great necessitie; though with much patience it held out, and found Hannibal often-times otherwise busied, than his affaires required.

Thus with mutuall losse on both sides, the time passed; and the Roman fortress growing daily stronger, Q. Fulvius Flaccus, with Appius Claudius, lately chosen Consuls, prepared to besiege the great Citie of Capua. Three and twentie Legions the Romans had now armed. This was a great and halfe growth from that war of men, and of all necessities, whereinto the losse at Canna had reduced them. But to fill vp these Legions, they were faine to take vp yong Boyes, that were vnder seuentene yeares of age: and to send Commissioners aboute fiftie miles round, for the seeking out of such Lads as might appeare seruicable, and pressing them to the warres, making yet a Law, that their yeares of seruice, whereunto they were bound by order of the Citie, should be reckoned, for their benefit, from this their beginning so yong, as if they had beene of lawfull age. Before the Roman Armie drew neare, the Capuans felt great want of victualles, as if they had alreadye bene besieged. This happened partly by sloth of the Nation, partly by the great waste and spoile, which the Romans had in foregoing yeares made vpon their grounds. They sent therefore Embassadors to Hannibal, desiring him to succour them: ere they were closed vp, as they feared to bee shortly. Hee gaue them comfortable wordes: and sent Hanno with an Armie to supply their wants. Hanno appointed a day; against which they should be readie with all manner of carriages, to store themselves with victualles, that he would provide. Neither did he promise more, than he performed. For hee caused great quantitie of graine, that had bene leied vp in Capua round about, to be brought into his campe, three miles from Beneuentum; Thither at the time appointed came no more than fortie Cartes or Wagons, with a few pack-horses; as if this had beene enough to victualle Capua. Such was the carelesse of the Capuans. Hanno was exceeding angry hereat: and told them they were worse than very beasts; since hunger could not teach them to haue greater care. Wherfore hee gaue them a longer day, against which hee made provision to store them thoroughly. Of all these doings word was sent to the Roman Consuls, from the Citizens of Beneuentum. Therefore Q. Fulvius, the Consul, taking with him such strength as hee thought needfull for the seruice, came into Beneuentum night; where with diligence he made inquirie into the behaviour of the Inhabitants. He learned, that Hanno with part of his Armie was gone abroad, to make provisions; that some two thousand Wagons, with a great rabble of Carters and other Varlets, lay among the Carthaginians in their campe; so that little good order was kept: all thought being set vpon a great Haruest. Hereupon the Consul bade his men prepare themselves, to assault the Enemies campe: and leauing all his impediments within Beneuentum, he marched thitherward so early in the morning, that hee was there with the first breake of day. By comming so vnspected, hee had well neare forced the campe on the sudden. But it was very strong, and very well defended: so that the longer the fight continued, the lesse desire had Hanno to looke more of his men in the attempt; seeing many of them cast away, and yet little hope of doing good. Therefore he said, that it were better to goe more leisurely and substantially to worke; to send for his fellow-Consul with the rest of their Armie; and to let betwene Hanno and home; that neither the Capuans should depart thence, nor the Carthaginian be able to relieue them. Being thus discouraging, and about to found the retreat; hee saw, that some of his men had gotten ouer the Enemies Rampart. There

There was grear bootie; or (which was all one to the souldier) an opinion of much that might be gotten in that campe. Wherefore some Ensigne-bearers threw their Ensignes ouer the Rampart, willing their men to fetch them out, vnlesse they would endure the shame and dishonour following such a losse. Feare of such ignomie, than which none could bee greater, made the Souldiers aduenture fo desperately; that Fulvius, perceiving the heat of his men, changed purpose, and encouraged those that were somewhat backward, to follow the example of them, that had already gotten ouer the Trenches. Thus the campe was wonne: in which were slaine aboue like thousand; and taken, aboue seven thousand; besides all the store of victualles, and carriages, with abundance of bootie, that Hanno had lately gotten from the Roman Confederates. This misadventure, and the nearer approach of both the Consuls, made them of Capua send a pittifull Embassage to Hannibal: putting him in minde of all the loue, that he was wont to protecl vnto their Citie; and how he had made shew, to affect it no lesse than Carthage. But now, they said, it would be losse, as Aspi was lately, if he gaue not strong and speedie succour. Hannibal answered with comfortable wordes: and sent away two thousand horse, to keepe their grounds from spoile; whilst hee himselfe was detained about Tarentum, partly by hope of winning the citadell, partly by the disposition, which he saw in many townes adjoining, to yeeld vnto him. Among the Hostages of the Tarentines, that lately had fled out of Rome, and, being ouer-taken, suffered death for their attempt; were some of the Metapontines, and other Cities of the Greekes, inhabiting that Easterne part of Italy, which was called of old Magna Græcia. These people tooke to heart the death of their Hostages; and thought the punishment greater, than the offence. Wherefore the Metapontines, as soone as the Roman Garrison was taken from them, to defend the citadell of Tarentum, made no more adoe, but opened their gates to Hannibal. The Thurians would haue done the like, vpon the like reason: had not some companies slaine in their Towne; which they feared that they should not be able to master. Neuertheless they helped themselves by cunning: inuiting to their gates Hanno and Mago, that were neare at hand: against whom whilst they proffered their seruice to Atinius, the Roman captaine; they drew him forth to fight; and recoyling from him, closed vp their gates. A little formalitie they vsed, in pretending feare, lest the Enemy should breake in together with the Romans; in saving Atinius himselfe, and sending him away by Sea; as also in consulting a small while (because perhaps many of their chiefe men were vnacquainted with the practise) whether they should yeeld to the Carthaginian, or no. But this disputation lasted not long: for they that had remoued the chiefe impediment, easily preuailed in the rest; and deliuered vp the Towne to Hanno and Mago. This good successe, and hope of the like, detained Hannibal in those quarters; whilst the Consuls, fortifying Benueventum to secure their backs, addressed themselves vnto the siege of Capua.

Many disasters befell the Romans, in the beginning of this great enterprise. T. Sempronius Gracchus, a very good man of warre; that had of late bene twice Consul, was slaine either by trecherie of some Lucans, that drew him into an ambush; or by some Carthaginian straglers, among whom he fell vnawares. His bodie, or his head, was very honorably interred; either by Hannibal himselfe, or (for the reports agree not) by the Romans; to whom Hannibal sent it: He was appointed to lie in Benueventum, there to secure the back of the Armie that should besiege Capua. But his death happened in an ill time; to the great hindrance of that businesse. The Volantes, or Slaves lately manumitted, forooke their Ensignes, and went euery one whether hee thought good, as if they had bene discharged by the decease of their Leader; so that it asked some labour to seeke them out, and bring them back into their campe. Neuertheless the Consuls went forward with their worke; and drawing neare to Capua, did all acts of hostilitie which they could. Mago the Carthaginian, and the Citizens of Capua, gaue them an hard welcome; wherein aboue fifteene hundred Romans were slaine. Neither was it long, ere Hannibal came thither: who fought with the Consuls, and

and had the better; inasmuch that he caused them to dislodge. They remoued by night, and went severall waies: Fulvius toward Cuma; Claudius, into Lucania. Hannibal followed after Claudius: who hauing led him a great walke, fetched a compaile about, and returned to Capua. It so fell out, that one M. Centenius Penula a stout man, and one that with good commendations had discharged the place of a Centurion, lay with an Armie not farre from thence, where Hannibal rested, when hee was wearie of hunting after Claudius. This Penula had made great vants to the Roman Senate, of wonders which he would worke, if he might be trusted with the leading of five thousand men. The Fathers were vnwilling in such a time, to reject the vertue of any good Souldier; how meane soeuer his condition were. Wherefore they gaue him the charge of eight thousand: and hee himselfe, being a proper man, and talking brauely, gathered vp so many voluntaries, as almost doubled his number. But meeting thus with Hannibal, he gaue prooffe of the difference, betweene a stout Centurion, and one able to command in chiefe. Hee and his fellows were all (in a manner) slaine; scarce a thousand of them escaping. Soone after this Hannibal had word, that Cn. Fulvius, a Roman Pretor with eightene thousand men, was in Apulia, very carelesse, and a man insufficient for the charge which he held. Thither hee therefore hastened, to visit him: hoping to deale the better with the maine strength of Rome, which pointed at Capua, when he should haue cut off those forces, that lay in the Prouinces: as vnder men of small abilitie. Comming vpon Fulvius, He found him and his men so jollie, that needes they would haue fought the first night. Wherefore it was not to be doubted, what would happen the day following. So hee bestowed Clatago with three thousand of his lightest armed, in places they about most fit for ambush. Then offering battaile to Fulvius, Hee soone had him in the trap: whence hee made him glad to escape aliue; leaving all, save two thousand of his followers, dead behinde him.

These two great blowes, receiued one presently after the other, much astonished the Romans. Neuertheless all care was taken, to gather vp the small reliques of the broken Armies: and that the Consuls should goe substantially forwards with the siege of Capua; which was of great consequence, both in matter of reputation, and in many other respects. The two Consuls fate downe before the towne: and C. Claudius Nero, one of the Pretors, came with his Armie from Suessula to their assistance. They made Proclamation, That whosoever would diffuse forth of Capua before a certain day prefixed, should haue his pardon, and be suffered to enjoy all that vnto him belonged: which day being past, there should be no grace expected. This offer was contumeliously rejected; the Capuans relying on their owne strength, and the succours attended from Hannibal. Before the citie was closed vp, they sent Messengers to the Carthaginian; which found him at Brundisium. He had made a long iourne, in hope of gaining the Tarentine citadell: of which expectation failing, He turned to Brundisium; vpon aduertisement that he should be let in. There the Capuans met him; told him of their danger with earnest wordes; and were with wordes as braue recomfited. He bad them consider, how a few daies since he had chased the Consuls out of their fields; and told them, that we would presently come thither againe, and send the Romans going, as fast as before. With this good answer the Messengers returned: and hardly could get back into the citie; which the Romans had almost entrenched round. As for Hannibal himselfe; He was of opinion, that Capua, being very well manned, and heartily deuoted vnto his friendship, would hold out a long time; and thereby giue him leisure, to doe what he thought requisite among the Tarentines, and in those Easterne parts of Italy; whilst the Roman Arme spent it selfe in a tedious siege. Thus he lingered; and thereby gaue the Consuls time, both to fortifie themselves at Capua, and to dispatch the election of new Magistrates in Rome; whilst hee himselfe pursued hopes, that neuer found successe.

Claudius and Fulvius, when their terme of Office was expired, were appointed to continue the siege at Capua; retaining the same Armies, as Proconsuls. The towne men men often fallied out: rather in a brauerie, than likelihood to worke any matter of effect; the Enemie lying close within his Trenches, as intending, without other violence, to subdue them by famine. Yet against the Campan horle (for their foot was easily beaten) the Romans vied to thrust out some troups, that should hold them skirmish. In the exercise the Campan vially had the better, to the great griefe of their proud Enemie; who scorned to take foile at the hands of such Rebels. It was therefore deuised, that some active and courageous yong men, should learne to ride beinde the Roman men at armes; leaping vp, and againe dismounting lightly, as occasion serued. These were furnished like the Volter, hauing each of them three or foure small darts; which alighting in time of conflict, they discharged thick vpon the Enemies horle; whom vanquishing in this kinde of seruice, they much disheartened in the maine. The time thus passing, and famine daily increasing within the Citie; Hannibal came at length, not expected by the Romans; and taking a Fort of theirs, called Galatia, fell vpon their campe. At the same time the Capuans issued with their whole power, in as terrible manner as they could deuise: letting all their multitude of vnseruiceable people on the walls; which, with a loud noise of Pannes and Basons, troubled those that were occupied in fight. Appius Claudius opposing himselfe to the Campan, easily defended his Trenches against them; and so well repressed them, that he draue them at length back into their Citie. Neuerthelesse, in pursuing them to their gates, he received a wound, that accompanied him in short space after to his graue. Q. Fuluius was held harder to his taske, by Hannibal and the Carthaginian Armie. The Roman campe was euen at point to haue bene lost: and Hannibal his Elephants, of which he brought with him three and thirtie, were either gotten within the rampart, or else (for the report varies) being some of them slaine vpon it, fell into the ditch; and filled it vp in such sort, that their bodies serued as a bridge vnto the Asiatics. It is said, that Hannibal in this tumult caused some fugitives, that could speake Latine well, to proclaim aloud, as it were in the Consuls name, That every one of the Souldiers should shift for himselfe, and flie betimes vnto the next Hills, forasmuch as the campe was alreadye lost. But all would not serue. The fraud was detected: and the Armie, hauing stiren there so long, had at good leasure strongly entrenched it selfe; so as little hope there was to raise the siege by force.

This did extremely perplex the Carthaginian. The purchase of Capua had (as was thought) with-held him from taking Rome it selfe: and now his desire of winning the Tarentine Citadell, had well-nere lost Capua; in respect of which, neither the Citadell, nor Citie of Tarentum, were to haue bene much regarded. Failing therefore into a desperate anger with himselfe and his hard fortune, that of so many great victories he had met with no greater vfe: on the sudden he entertained an haughtie resolution, euen to set vpon Rome; and carrie to the walls of that proud Citie, the danger of warre that threatned Capua. This he thought would be a meane, to draw the Roman Generalls, or one of them at least, vnto the defence of their owne home. If they rose from the siege with their whole Armie; then had he his desire: If they diuided their forces; then was it likely, that either he, or the Campan, should well enough deale with them apart. Neither did he despair, that the terror of his coming might so astonish the multitude within Rome, as he might enter some part or other of the Citie. His only feare was, lest the Campan, being ignorant of his purpose, should think he had forsaken them; and thereupon forthwith yield themselves to the Enemie. To prevent this danger, He sent letters to Capua by a subtle Numidian: who running as a fugitiue into the Roman campe, conueighed himselfe thence into the innermost Trenches into the Citie. The iourney to Rome, was to be performed with great celeritie: no small hope of good successe, resting in the suddenesse of his arriual there. Wherefore he caused his men, to haue in a readinesse ten daies victualles; and prepared as many boats, as might in one night transport his Armie ouer the Riuer of Fulturnus. This could not be done so closely, but that that the Roman Generalls by some fugitiues had notice of his purpose. With this danger therefore they acquainted the Senate: which was therewith afflicted, according to the diuersitie of mens opinions, in a case of such importance. Some gaue counsaile to let alone Capua, yea and all places else, rather then to put the Towne of Rome into perill of being taken by the Enemie. Others were loth to loose from allowing of this, as they wondered how any man could thinke, that Hannibal, being vnable to relieue Capua, should iudge himselfe strong enough to winne Rome; and therefore stoutly said, That, those Legions, which were kept at home for defence of the Citie, would serue the turne well enough, to keepe him out, and fend him thence; if he were lo vnwise, as to come thither. But it was finally concluded, that letters should be sent to Fuluius and Claudius, acquainting them perfectly with the forces, that at the present were in Rome: who, since they knew best, what the strength was which Hannibal could bring along with him, were best able to iudge, what was needfull to oppose him. So it was referred vnto the discretion of these Generalls at Capua, to doe as they thought behouefull: and if it might conueniently be, neither to raise their siege, nor yet to put the Citie of Rome into much aduenture. According to this Decree of the Senate, Q. Fuluius tooke fiftene thousand foote, and a thousand horse, the choice of his whole Armie: with which he halted toward Rome; leaving App. Claudius, who could not trauell by reason of his wound, to continue the siege at Capua.

Hannibal, hauing passed ouer Fulturnus, burnt vp all his boats; and left nothing that might serue to transport the Enemie, in case he should order to pursue or coast him. Then halted he away toward Rome; staying no longer in any one place, then he needs must. Yet found he the bridges ouer Liris broken downe, by the people of Fregelle: which as it stopped him a little on his way; so it made him the more grieuouly to spoile their lands, whiles the bridges were in mending. The nearer that he drew to Rome, the greater waste he made: his Numidians running before him; druing the Countrey, and killing or taking multitudes of all sorts and ages, that fled out of all parts round about. The messengers of these newes came apace, one after another, into the Citie; some few bringing true aduertisements; but the most of them reporting the conceits of their owne feare. All the streets, and Temples in Rome, were pestered with women, crying and praying, and rubbing the Altars with their haire, because they could doe none other good. The Senators were all in the great Market, or place of Assemblie, readie to giue their aduice, if it were asked, or to take directions giuen by the Magistrates. All places of most importance were stuffed with souldiers: it being vncertaine, vpon which part Hannibal would fall. In the midst of this trepidation, there came newes that Q. Fuluius, with part of the Armie from Capua, was halting to defence of the Citie. The Office of a Proconsul did expire, at his returne home, and entrie into the Gates of Rome. Wherefore, that Fuluius might lose nothing by coming into the Citie in time of such need, an Act was passed, That He should haue equall power with the Consuls, during his abode there. He and Hannibal arriued at Rome, one foone after another: Fuluius hauing bene long held occupied in passing ouer Fulturnus; and Hannibal recieving impediment in his iourney, as much as the Countrey was able to giue. The Consuls, and Fuluius, incamped without the Gates of Rome; attending the Carthaginian. Thither they called the Senate: and as the danger grew nearer and greater; so tooke they more carefull and especial order, against all occurrences. Hannibal came to the Riuer Anio or Anien, three miles from the Towne: whence He aduanced with two thousand Horle, and rode along a great way vnder the walls; viewing the sitethereof, and considering how he might best approach it. But He either went, or (as the Roman Storie saith) was driuen away: without doing, or recieving any hurt. Many tumults rose in this while among the people; but were suppressed by care and diligence of the Senators. About the rest, one accident was both troublesome, and not without perill. Of Numidians that had shifted side, and fallen (vpon some displeasures) from Hannibal to the Romans, there were some twelve hundred then in Rome: who were appointed by the Consuls, to passe through the Towne, from the Mount Aventine to the Gate Collina, wherewith was thought that their service might be usefull among broken wayes, and Garden walls lying in the suburbs. The faces of these men, and their furniture, wherein they differed not from the followers of Hannibal; bred such mistaking, as caused a great vprore among the people: all crying out, that Aventine was taken, and the enemy gotten within the walls. The noise was such, that men could not be informed of the truth: and the streets were full of cartrails, and husbandmen, which were fledde thither out of the Villages adjoining, that the passage was stopp'd up: and the poore Numidians pitifully beaten from the house-toppes, with stones and other weapons that came next to hand, by the desperate multitude, that would haue run out at the gates, had it not bene certaine who lay vnder the walls. To remedie the like inconueniences, it was ordained, That all which had bene Dictators, Consuls, or Censors, should haue authoritie as Magistrates, till the Enemy departed. The day following, Hannibal passed ouer Anien, and presented battaile to the Romans, who did not wisely if they vnderooke it. It is said, that a terrible shewre of raine, caused both Romans and Carthaginians to returne into their feuerall Camps: and that this happened two daies together, the weather breaking vp, and clearing, as soone as they were departed alund'r. Certaine it is, that Hannibal, who had brought along with him no more than ten daies prouision, could not endure to stay there, vntill his victuals were all spent. In which regard, the Romans, if they suffered him to wait his time and prouisions, knowing that hee could not abide there long, did as became well-advised men: if they offered to fight with him, and either had the better, or were parted (as is said) by some accident of weather; the commendations must be giuen to their fortune. The terror of Hannibals comming to the Citie, how great focus it was at the first, yet after some leisure, and better notice taken of his forces, which appeared lesse than the first apprehension had formed them, was much and soone abated. Hereunto it helped well, that at the same time, the supplee appointed for Spain, after the death of the two Scipios, was sent out of the towne, & went forth at one gate, whilst the Carthaginians lay before another. In all Panick terrors, as they are called, wherof there is either no cause known, or no cause answerable to the greatnesse of the sudden consension; it is a good remedie, to doe somewhat quite contrarie to that which the danger would require, when it such, as men haue fashioned it in their anasled conceits. Thus did Alexander cause his souldiers to disarme themselves, when they were all on a sudden in a great feare of they knew not what. And thus did Clearchus pacifie a foolish vprore in his Armie, by proclaiming a reward vnto him, that could tell who had sent the Athenians to the Campe. But in this present example of the Romans, appeares withall a great magnanimitie: whereby they sustained their reputation, and augmented it no lesse, than by this bolde attempt of Hannibal: it might seeme to haue bene diminished. Neither could they more finely haue checked the glorious conceits of their Enemies, and taken away the disgrace of that feare, which clouded their valour at their first comming; than by making such demonstrations, when once they had recovered spirit, how little they esteemed him. To this purpose therefore that vertue of ground, on which the Carthaginians lay incamped, was sold in Rome: and sold it was nothing vnder the value, but at a good rate, as it had bene in time of peace. This indignitie comming to his care, incensed Hannibal so much, that he made Port-fale of the Silver-smiths shops, which were neare about the Market or Common place in Rome; as if his owne title to the houles within the Towne, were no whit worse, then any Roman Citizens could be vnto that piece of ground, wherewith hee raised his Tent. But this counter-paist was nothing worth. The Romans did seek to manifest that assurance, which they iustly had conceined Hannibal, to make shew of continuing in an hope, which was alreadye past. His victuals were almost spent: and of those ends, that he had propoos'd vnto himselfe, this iourney had brought forth forth none other, than the fame of his much daring. Wherefore hee brake vp his campe: and doing what spoile he could in the Roman Territorie, without sparing religious places, wherein wealth was to be gotten, He passed like a T'empest ouer the Countrey; and ranne toward the Easterne Sea, so fast that hee had almost taken the Citie of Rhegium before his arrival was feared or suspected. As for Capua hee gaue it lost: and is likely to haue cursed the whole faction of Hanno, which thus disabled him to relieue that faire Citie; since hee had no other way to vent his griefe.

Q. Fulvius returning back to Capua, made Proclamation anew, that who so would yeeld, before a certaine day, might safely doe it. This, and the very returne of Fulvius, without any more appearance of Hannibal, gaue the Capuans to vnderstand, that they were abandoned, and their case desperate. To truit the Roman pardon proclaimed, every mans conscience of his owne euill doers, told him that it was a vanitie: and some faint hope was giuen, by Hanno and Boetius, Captaines of the Carthaginian Garrison within the Towne, that Hannibal should come againe; if means could only be found, how to conuey such letters vnto him, as they would write. The carriage of the letters was vnderaken, by some Numidians: who would write, as fugitiues, out of the Towne, into the Roman campe, waited fit opportunitie to make an escape thence with their packets. But it hapned, ere they could conceiue themselves away, that one of them was detected by an Harlot following him out of the Towne; and the letters of Boetius and Hanno, were taken and opened; containing a vehement entreatie vnto Hannibal, that he would not thus forsake the Capuans and them. For (said they) we came not hither to make warre against the Capuans and Tarentum, but against the Romans: whose Legions wheresoever they lie, there also should the Carthaginian Armie be readie to attend them; and by taking of such course, haue we gotten those victories at Trebia, Thrasymene, and Cannae. In fine, they besought him, that he would not dishonour himselfe, and betray them to their enemies, by turning an other way; as if it were his only care, that the Citie should not be taken in his full view: promising, to make a desperate sallie; if he would once more aduenture to set vpon the Roman camp. Such were the hopes of Boetius and his fellow. But Hannibal had alreadye done his best: and now beganne to faint vnder the burden of that warre, wherein (as afterward he protested) he was vanquished by Hanno and his Partisans in the Carthaginian Senate, rather than by any force of Rome. It may well be, as a thing incident in like cases, that some of those who were besieged in Capua, had bene sent ouer by the Hannoniens, to obscure the doings of Hannibal, and to check his proceedings. If this were so; iustly might they curse their owne malice, which had cast them into this remedielesse necessitie. How soeuer it were, the letters directed vnto Hannibal, fell (as is shewed) into the Roman Proconsuls hands; who cutting off the hands of all such counterfeit fugitiues, as carried such messages, whipt them back into the Towne. This miserable spectacle brake the hearts of the Capuans: so that the Multitude crying out vpon the Senate, with menacing termes, caused them to assemble, and consult, about the yeelding vp of Capua vnto the Romans. The brauest of the Senators, and such as a few yeares since had bene most forward in joining with Hannibal, vnderstood well enough whereunto the matter tended. Wherefore one of them invited the rest home to supper: telling them, that when they had made good cheare, he would drinke to them such an health, as should set them free from that cruell reuenge, which the Enemy sought vpon their bodies. About euen and twentie of the Senators there were, that liking well of this motion, ended their liues together, by drinking poison. All the rest, hoping for more mercie than they had deserued, yeelded simply to discretion.

So one of the Towne-gates was set open: wherat a Roman Legion with some other companies, entring, disarmed the Citizens; apprehended the Carthaginian Garrison; and commanded all the Senators of Capua to goe forth into the Roman campe. At their comming thither, the Proconsuls laid yrons vpon them all: and commanding them to tell what store of gold and siluer they had at home, sent them into safe custodie;

custodie, some to Cales, others to Thesnum. Touching the generall Multitude; they were referred vnto the discretion of the Senate: yet so hardly vsed by Fulsius in the meane while, that they had little cause of hope or comfort in this aduertice. Ap. Claudius was brought euen to the point of death, by the wound which he had lately received: yet was hee not inexorable to the Campani; as hauing loued them well in former times, and hauing giuen his daughter in marriage to that Pacuruius, of whom we spake before. But this facilitie of his Colleague, made Fulsius the more hattie in taking vengeance: for feare, lest, vpon the like respects, the Roman Senate might proue more gentle, than he thought behouefull to the common faictie, and honour of their late. Wherefore he tooke the paines, to ride by night vnto Thesnum, and from thence to Cales: where hee caused all the Campan prisoners to suffer death; binding them to stakes, and scourging them first a good while with rods; after which hee struck off their heads.

This terrible example of vengeance, which the Carthaginians could not hinder, made all Townes of Italie the lesse apt to follow the vaine hope of the Campani: and bred a general inclination, to returne vpon good conditions to the Roman side. The Atellans, Calatines, and Sabatinens, people of the Campani, that in the former change had followed the fortune of Capua, made also now the like submission, for very feare, and want of abilitie to resist. They were therefore vsed with the like rigour, by Fulsius: who dealt so extremely with them all, that he brought them into desperation. Wherefore some of their yong Gentlemen, burning with fire of reuenge, got into Rome: where they found means by night-time, to set on fire so many houses, that a great part of the Citie was like to haue bene consumed. The beginning of the fire in diuers places at once, argued that it was no casualitie. Wherefore libertie was proclaimed vnto any slave, and other sufficient reward vnto any free man, that should discouer who those Incendiaries were. Thus all came out: and the Campani, being detected by a slave of their owne (to whom, about his libertie promised, was giuen about the summe of an hundred markes) had the punishment answerable to their defaults. Fulsius hereby being more and more incensed against this wretched people, held them in a manner as prisoners within their walls: and this extreme securitie caused them at length to become Suppliants vnto the Roman Senate; that some period might be set vnto their miseries. That whereupon the Senators resolved in the end, was worse than all that which they had suffered before. Only two poore women in Capua (of which one had bene an Harlot) were found not guiltie of the late rebellion. The rest were, some of them, with their wiues and children sold for slaves, and their goods confiscated; others laid in prison, and referred to further desolation: but the generallitie of them, commanded to depart out of Campania by a certaine day; and confined vnto seuerall places, as best liked the angrie Victors. As for the Towne of Capua, it was suffered to stand, in regard of the beautie and commodious site: but no corporation, or forme of policie, was allowed to be therein; only a Roman Prouest was euerie yeare sent, to gouerne ouer those that should inhabit it, and to doe iustice. This was the greatest act, and most important, hitherto done by the people of Rome, after many great losses in the present warre. After this, the glorie of Hannibal beganne to shine with a more dimme light, than before: his oile being farre spent; and that, which should haue reuiued his flame, being vnfortunately shed; as shall be told in place conuenient.

§. XV.

How the Carthaginians, making a partie in Sardinia and Sicill, held warre against the Romans in these Islands; and were ouer-come.

Hilleit things passed thus in Italie; the commotions raised in Sardinia and Sicill by the Carthaginians and their friends, were brought to a quiet and happie end, by the industrious valcur of the Romans. The Sardinian rebellion was great and sudden: about thirtie thousand being vp in armes, ere the Roman forces could arrive there to suppress it. One Harficoras with his sonne Hilistus, mightie men in that land, were the Ring-leaders, being incited by Hanno a Carthaginian, that promised the assistance of his Countrie. Neither were the Carthaginians in this enterprise so carelesse, as in the rest of their maine vndertakings, about the same time. Yet it had bene better, if their care had bene directed vnto the prosecution of that maine buisinesse in Italie; whereon this, and all other hopes depended. For it would haue sufficed, if they could haue hindered the Romans from sending an Armie into Sardinia. Harficoras with his followers might well enough haue serued to drie out Q. Matius the Pretor; who lay sick in the Province; and not more weake in his owne bodie, than in his traine. But whilest they sought reuenge of that particular iniurie, whereof the sense was most grievous: they neglected the opportunitie of requiting those that had done them wrong, and of the securing themselves from all iniuries in the future. Their fortune also in this enterprise was such; as may seeme to haue discouraged them from being at the like charge, in cases of more importance. For where as they sent ouer Asdrubal, surnamed the bald, with a competent fleet and armie; assisted in this Expedition by Hanno the Author of the rebellion, and by Margo a Gentleman of the Barthine house, and neare kinsman to Hannibal: it fo fell out, that the whole fleet by extremitie of foule weather was cast vpon the Baleares; so beaten, and in such cuill plight, that the Sardinians had euen spent their hearts, and were in a manner quite vanquished, ere these their friends could arrive to succour them.

Titus Manlius was sent from Rome with two and twentie thousand foot, and twelue hundred horse, to settle the estate of that land, which he had taken in, and annexed vnto the Roman Dominion, long before this, in his Consulship. It was a laudable custome of the Romans, to preserue and vp-hold in their seuerall Provinces, the greatest effe and reputation of those men, and their families, by whom each Province had bene first subdued vnto their Empire. If any iniurie were done vnto the Prouincialls, if any grace were to be obtained from the Senate; or whatsoever accident required the assistance of a Patron: the first Conqueror, and his race after him, were the most readie and best approved meanes, to procure the benefit of the people subdued. Hereby the Romans held very fire intelligence euery Province, and had alwaies in readinesse fit men to reclaim their Subjects, if they fell into any such disorder, as would otherwise haue required a greater charge and trouble. The coming of Manlius, retayned in obedience all that were not already broken too farre out. Yet was Harficoras so strong in field, that Manlius was compelled to arme his Mariners: without whom he could not haue made vp that number of two and twentie thousand, whereof we haue spoken before. He landed at Calaris or Carallis, where mooring his ships, he passed vp into the Countrie, and fought out the Enemy. Hylstus, the sonne of Harficoras, had then the command of the Sardinian Armie left vnto him by his father, who was gone abroad into the Countrie, to draw in more friends to his side. This yong Gentleman would needes aduerture to get honor, by giuing battaile to the Romans at his owne discretion. So hee rashly adu ventured to fight with an old Souldier: by whom hee received a terrible overthrow; and lost in one day about thirtie thousand of his followers. Hylstus himselfe, with the rest of his broken troops, got into Cornus, the chiefe Towne of the Island: whither Manlius pursued them. Very soone after this defeat came Astrubal with his Carthaginians: too late to winne all Sardinia, in such halte as he might haue done, if the tempest had not hindered his voyage; yet soone enough, and strong enough to saue the Towne of Cornus, and to put a new spirit into the it ebells. Manlius hereupon with-drew himselfe back to Calariis: where he had not staid long, ere the Sardinians (such of them as adhered to the Roman partie) craued his assistance; their Countre being waied by the Carthaginians, and the Rebels, with whom they had refused to ioyne. This drew Manlius forth of Calariis: where if he had staid a little longer, Astrubal would haue fought him out with some blemish to his reputation. But the fame of Astrubal and his companie, appears to haue been greater than was their strength. For after some triall made of them in a few skirmishes; Manlius aduentured all to the hazard of a battaile: wherein he slew twelue thousand of the enemies; and tooke of the Sardinians and Carthaginians three thousand. Four hundred the battaile lasted: and victorie at length fell to the Romans, by the flight of the Islanders; whose courages had beene broken in their vnprosperous fight, not many daies before. The death of yong Hyspilius, and of his father Hastorias, that slew himselfe for griefe, together with the captiuitie of Astrubal himselfe, with Meago and Hanno the Carthaginians; made the victorie the more famous. The vanquished Armie fled into Cornus: whither Manlius followed them; and in short space wanne the Towne. All other Cities of the Ile that had rebelled, followed the example of Cornus, and yielded vnto the Roman: who imposing vpon them such increase of tribute, or other punishment, as best suited with the nature of their feallall offences, or their abilitie to pay, returned back to Calariis with a great bootie, and in short time to Rome; leaving Sardinia in quiet.

The warre in Sicil: was of greater length, and euery way more burdenfome to Rome: as also the victorie brought more honour and profit; for that the Romans became thereby not only fauers of their owne, as in Sardinia; but Lords of the whole Countre; by annexing the Citie and Dominion of Syracuse, to that which they enjoyed before. Soone after the battaile of Canna, the old King of Syracuse died: who had continued long a stedfast friend vnto the Romans; and greatly relieved them in this present warre. He left his Kingdome to Hieronymus his grand-child, that was about fiftene yeares of age; Gelo his sonne, that should haue bene his heire, being about fiftene yeares of age; Gelo his sonne, that should haue bene his heire, being about fiftene yeares of age; Gelo his sonne, that should haue bene his heire, being about fiftene yeares of age. To this yong King his successor, Hiero appointed fiftene tutors: of which the principall were Andronodorus, Zotius, and Themistius; who had married his daughters, or the daughters of Gelo. The rest were such, as he judged most likely to preferre the Kingdome, by the same arte, whereby himselfe had gotten and so long kept it. But within a little while; Andronodorus, waxing wearie of so many Coadjutors, beganne to commend the sufficiency of the yong Prince, as extraordinary in one of his yeares; and said, that he was able to rule the Kingdome without helpe of any Protector. Thus by giuing ouer his owne charge, he caused others to doe the like: hoping thereby to get the King wholly into his hands; which came to passe in a sort as hee desired. For Hieronymus, laying aside all care of gouernement, gaue himselfe wholly ouer to his pleasures: or if he had any regard of his Royall dignitie, it was only in matter of exterior shew, as wearing a Diademe with ornaments of purple, and being attended by an armed guard. Hereby he offended the eyes of his people; that had neuer seene the like in Hiero, or in Gelo his sonne. But much more hee offended them, when by his insolent behaviour, futable to his outward pompe, he gaue proofe, that, in course of life, he would reuiue the memorie of Tyrants dead long since, from whom he tooke the patterne of his habit. Hee grew proud, lustfull, cruell, and dangerous to all that were about him: so that such of his late Tutors as could escape him by flight, were glad to liue in banishment: the rest, being most of them put to death by the Tyrant; many of them dying by their owne hands, to auoid the danger of his displeasure, that seemed worse than death it selfe.

Only

Only Andronodorus, Zotius, and one Thraiso continued in grace with him, and were his Counsaillers, but not of his Cabinet. These, howsoeuer they agreed in other points, were at some dissension about that maine point, of adhering, either to the Romans, or to the Carthaginians. The two former of them, were wholly for the Kings pleasures, which was set on change: but Thraiso, hauing more regard of his honour and profit, was very earnest to continue the amitie with Rome. Whilest as yet it remained somewhat doubtfull, which way the King would incline: a conspiracie against his Person, was detected by a groom of his; to whom, one Theodorus had broken the matter. Theodorus hereupon was apprehended, and tormented; thereby to wring out of him the whole practise, and the names of the vnder-takers. Long it was ere he would speake any thing: but yielding (as it seemed) in the end, vnto the extremitie of the torture; he confessed, that he had bene set on by Thraiso, whom hee appeached of the treason, together with many more, that were neare in loue or place vnto Hieronymus. All these therefore were put to death, being innocent of the crime wherewith they were charged. But they that were indeede the Conspirators, walked boldly in the streets, and neuer shrunke for the matter: assuring themselves, that the resolution of Theodorus would yeeld to no extremitie. Thus they all escaped, and soone after found means to execute their purpose. The King himselfe, when Thraiso was taken out of the way, quickly resolved vpon siding with the Carthaginians; whereto he was very inclinable before. Yong men, when first they grow Masters of themselves, loue to seeme wiser than their fathers, by taking different courses. And the liberalitie of Hiero to the Romans, in their great necessity, had of late bene such, as might haue bene termed excecious; were it not in regard of his prouidence; wherein hee tooke order for his owne estate, that depended vpon theirs. But the yong Nephew, taking little heed of dangers farre off; regarded only the things present; the weaknesse of Rome; the present fortunes of Carthage; and the much monie that his grand-father had laied out in vaine, to shoulder vp a falling house. Wherefore hee dealt with Hannibal: who readily entred into good correspondence with him; that was maintained by Hippocrates & Epidides, Carthaginians borne, but grand-children of a banished Syracusan. These grew into such fauour with Hieronymus, that they drew him whither they listed. So that when Appius Claudius the Roman Pretor, hearing what wast towards, made a motion of renewing the Confederacie, betwene the People of Rome and the King of Syracuse; his Messengers were dismissed with an open scotte. For Hieronymus would needs haue them tell him, the order of the fight at Canna; that hee might thereby learne how to accommodate himselfe: saying, ag. That hee could hardly beleue the Carthaginians; so wonderfull was the victorie as they reported it. Hauing thus dismissed the Romans, hee sent Embassadors to Carthage, where hee concluded a league; with condition, at first, that a great part of the Island should be annexed to his Dominion; but afterward, that hee should raigne ouer all Sicil, and the Carthaginians rest satisfied, with what they could get in Italic. At these doings Appius Claudius did not greatly stirre: partly for the indignities that were offered, partly for that it behoud not the Romans, to entertaine more quarrells, then were enforced vpon them by necessity; and partly (as may seeme) for that the reputation, both of himselfe, and of his Citie, had receiued such blemish, by that which happened vnto him in his iourne, as much discountenanced him when he came into Sicil, and forbad him to looke big. The monie that Hiero had bestowed vpon the Romans, wherewith to relieue them in their necessity, this Appius was to carrie back vnto him: it being refused by the Roman Senate, with greater brauerie than their present fortune would allow. But in stead of returning the monie with thanks, as he had bene directed, and as it had bene noised abroad that hee should doe: the warre against Philip King of Macedon (whereof we haue spoken before) compelled the Romans to lay aside their vaine glorie, and send word after him, that he should consign that monie ouer to Marcus Valerius; of whose voyage into Greece, the Citie had not otherwise wherewith to beare bear the charge. This was done accordingly: and hereby Claudius (which name in the whole continuance of that Familie, is taxed with pride) his errand was changed, from a glorious ostentation of the Roman magnanimities; into such a pittifull tune of thanksgiving, as mult needs haue bred sorrow and commiseration, in lo true a friend as Hiero; or, if it were deliuered after his death, matter of poeisme and corne, in Theronimus the new King.

But whilst Theronimus was more desirous of warre, than well resolu'd how to bequigne it: his owne death changed the forme of things, and bred a great inuouation in the state of Syracuse; which thereby might haue prospered more than euer, had it bene wisely gouerned. Hippocrates and Epicles, of whom we spake before, were sent about the Countrey with two thousand men; to sollicite the Townes, and perswade them to shake off their obedience to the Romans. The King himselfe with an Armie of fifteene thousand horse and foot, went to Leontium, a Citie of his owne Dominion: hoping that the fame of his preparation, would make the whole Island fall to him in all haile, and accept him for Soueraigne. There the Conspirators tooke him on the sudden, as hee was passing through a narrow street; and rushing betwene him and his guard, strooke him dead. Forthwith libertie was proclaimed: and the found of that word so joyfully answered by the Leontines, that the guard of Theronimus, had little courage to enuenge their Masters death. Yet for feare of the worth, a great largesse was promised vnto the Souldiers, with rewards vnto their Captaines; which wrought so effectually; that when many wicked acts of the murdered King were reckon'd vp; the Armie, as in detestation of his bad life, suffered his carcase to lie vnburied. These newes, ranne quickly to Syracuse: whither some of the Conspirators, taking the Kings horses, polled away; to signifie all that had passed; to stirre vp the people to libertie; and to preuent Andronodorus, if he, or his fellowes would make offer to vsurpe a Tyrannie. The Syracusians hereupon presently tooke Armes, and made themselues masters of their owne Citie. Andronodorus on the other side fortified the Palace, and the Island: being yet vnertaine what to doe; betwene desire of making himselfe a fouraigne Lord; and feare of suffering punishment, as a Tyrant, if his enterprise miscarried. His wife Demarata, that was the daughter of Hiero, cherished him in his hopes: putting him in minde of that well knowne Prouerbe, which Demofylus had said; That a Tyrant should keepe his place, till he were haled out of it by the heeles, and not ride away from it on horse-back. But feare, and better counsaile prevailed so farre, that Andronodorus, hauing slept vpon the matter; dissembled his affections, and deferred his hope, vnto better opportunitie. The next day he came forth, and made a speech vnto the People: telling them; That hee was glad to see, how prudently they behaued themselues in so great a change; that he had stood in feare, least they would not haue contained themselues within bounds of discretion; but rather haue sought to murder all without difference, that any way belonged to the Tyrant; and that since he beheld their orderly proceeding, and their care, not to rauish their libertie perforce, but to wred it vnto them for euer; he was willingly come to them forth of his strength, and surrendered vp the charge, committed vnto him, by one that had bene an euill Maister, both to him and them. Hercupon great joy was made; and Pretors chosen (as in former times) to gouerne the Citie; of which Andronodorus was one, and the chiefe. But such was his desire of Soueraignetie; and so vehement were the insitiuations of his wife; that shortly he beganne to practise with Hippocrates, Epicles, and other Captaines of the Mercenaries: hoping to make himselfe strong, by their helpe, that were least pleased with the change. Hippocrates and Epicles, had bene with the Syracusian Pretors, and told them, that, being sent from Hannibal to Theronimus, they according to instructions of their Captaine, had done him, whilst he liued, what service they could; and that now they were desirous to returne home. They requested therefore that they might be friendly dismissed: and with a conuoy; that might keepe them from falling into the hands of the Romans, and set them safe at Leori. This was easily easily granted: both for that the Syracusian Magistrates were well contented to earne thanks of Hannibal, with such a little curtesie; and for that they thought it expedient, to rid their Towne quickly of this troublesome couple; which were good souldiers, and gracious with the Armie, but otherwise lewd men. It was not the desire of these two Sicilians, to be gone so hastily as they made thewest they were more mindfull of the businesse, for which Hannibal had sent them. Wherefore they insinuated themselues into the boloms of such as were most likely to fill the Armie with tumult: especially of the Roman fugitiues, and those that had cause to mistrust what should become of themselues, when the Romans and Syracusians were come to agreement. Such instruments as these, Andronodorus had great need of: as also of many other, to helpe him in his dangerous attempt. Hee found Themistius, that had married Harmonia the sister of Theronimus, ready to take his part; as being carried with the like passions of his owne, and of his wife. But in seeking to increase the number of his adherents; hee revealed the matter to one, that revealed all to the rest of the Pretors. Hereupon it followed, that he, and Themistius, entering into the Senate, were slaine out of hand; and afterward accused to the People, of all the euill which they had done, whilst Theronimus liued, as by his authoritie; and now since attempted, in seeking to vsurpe the tyrannie themselues. It was also declared that the daughters of Hiero and Gela, were accessarie to this dangerous treason: and that the vnquiet spirits of these women, would neuer cease to worke; vntill they had recovered those Royall ornaments, and Soueraigne power, whereof their familie was now dispossest. These daughters therefore of Hiero and Gela, were also condemned to die; and executioners presently sent by the enraged people, to take away their liues. Demarata, and Harmonia, had perhaps deferred this heauie sentence: but Heraclea, the daughter of Hiero, and wife of Sossippus, being altogether innocent; was murdered together with her two yong daughters, in the hasty execution of this rash judgement. Her husband Sossippus was a lover of the Common wealth; and in that respect so hated by Theronimus, that being sent Embassador to King Ptoleme, he durst not returne home; but staid in Egypt as a banished man. This consideration, when it was too late, together with some other pittifull accidents accompanying the slaughter, so affected the multitude; that (pardoning themselues) all cryed out vpon the authors of so foule a butchery. Being thus incensed against the Senate; and knowing not otherwise how to satisfie their anger; they called for an election of new Pretors, in the roome of Andronodorus and Themistius, that were lately slaine: meaning to substitute such in their places, as the Senators should haue little cause to like. At the election were present a great rowt, not only of the poorer Citizens, but of souldiers that pressed into the throng. One of these, named Epicles Pretor; another named Hippocrates: and the lesse that the old Pretors and Senators approved this nomination, the more eager was the multitude; and by a generall cry forced them to be accepted. These being made Pretors, did what they could to hinder the agreement that was in hand, betwene the Syracusians and the Romans. But hauing striven in vaine, and seeing that the People stood in feare of Ap. Claudius, and of Marcellus, that was lately come into Sicily; they gaue way vnto the time, and suffered the old league of Hiero to be reconfirmed; which afterward they purposed to dissolue by practise. The Leontines had some need of a Garrison: and to them was sent Hippocrates the Pretor attended, by such fugitiues, and mercinarie souldiers, as were most burdnesome to Syracuse. Thither when he came, hee beganne to doe many acts of hostilitie against the Romans: first in secret, afterward more openly and boldly. Marcellus, rightly vnderstanding the purpose of these two brethren, sent word vnto the Syracusians, that they had already broken the league; and that the peace would neuer be kept sincerely, vntill this turbulent paire of brethren were expelled the Island. Epicles, fearing to sustaine the blame of his brothers proceedings, and more desirous to set forward the warre, than to excuse any breach of peace; went himselfe vnto the Leontines, whom he perswaded to rebell against the Syracusians.

ians. For he said, that since they had all of late serued one Maister; there was little reason why the Leontines should not be enfranchised by his death, as well as the Syracusanians; yea or much rather, all things considered; since in their firsts the Tyrant was laine, and libertie first proclaimed. Wherefore, since they of Syracuse were not contented, to enjoy the freedome purchased among the Leontines; but thought it good reason, that they should beare Dominion over those that had broken the chaine, wherewith both the one, and the other were bound; his aduise was, that such their arrogance should be checked betimes, ere it could get any colour of right by prescription. Hereunto occasion was given by one article of the league, made of late by the Romans and Syracusanians. For it was agreed, That all which had been 10 subject to Hiero and Hieronymus, should henceforth, be Vassals vnto the state of Syracuse. Against this article, if the Leontines would take exception, and thereby challenge their owne due; Epicles told them, that in this noueltie of change, they had fit opportunitie to recouer the freedome, which their fathers had lost not many ages before. Neither was it vnreasonable, which this craftie Carthaginian propounded; if the Leontines had beene subdued by the same hand, which tooke libertie from the Syracusanians. But seeing they had long since yielded vnto Syracuse, and beene subject vnto that Citie, by what forme soeuer it was gouerned; this claime of libertie was rather reasonable than iust. Neuerthelesse the motion of Epicles was highly approued: in so much that when messengers came soone after from Syracuse, 20 to rebuke the Leontines, for that which they had done against the Romans; and to denounce vnto Hippocrates and Epicles, that they should get them gone, either to Lacedaemon, or whither else they listed, so that they staid not in Syde: word was returned, That they of Leontium had not requested the Syracusanians, to make any bargaines for them with the Romans, nor thought themselves bound to obserue the couenants, which others without warrant had made in their names. This peremptorie answer, was forth-with reported vnto Marcellus by the Syracusanians: who offered him their assistance in doing iustice vpon the Leontines their Rebels; with condition that when the Towne was taken, it might be theirs againe. Marcellus required no better satisfaction: but forth-with tooke the businesse in hand; which he dispatched in one 30 day. At the first assault, Leontium was taken: all saue the Castle, whereinto Hippocrates and Epicles fled; and stealing thence away by night coueited themselves into the Towne of Herbesus. The first thing that Marcellus did, when hee had wonne the Towne, was the same, which other Roman Captaines vsed after victorie; to seeke out the fugitiue Roman slaues and renegados, whom he caused all to die: the rest both of the Townsmen and Souldiers, he tooke to mercie; forbearing also to strip or spoile them. But the fame of his doings was bruted after a contrarie sort. It was said, that he had slaue, Man, Woman, and Child, and put the Towne to sack. These newes met the Syracusanian Armie vpon the way, as it was going to ioine with Marcellus, who had ended his businesse before. About eight thousand Mercenaries there were, that had bene sent forth of Syracuse, vnder Solis and Dinamenes two of 40 the Pretors, to serue against the Leontines and other Rebels. These Captaines were honest men, and well affected to their Countrey: but the souldiers that followed them, had those diseases, with which all mercenaries are commonly infected. They tooke the matter deeply to heart, that their fellow-souldiers (as now they termed those against whom they went) had bene so cruelly butchered: and hereupon they fell to mutinie; though what to demand, or with whom to be angrie, they could not tell. The Pretors therefore thought it best, to turne their vnquiet thoughts another way, and let them aworke in some place else: for as much as at Leontium there was no neede of their seruice. So toward Herbesus they marched: where lay 50 Hippocrates and Epicles, the architects of all this mischief, deuiling what further harme they might doe; but now so weakly accompanied, that they seemed vnable to escape the punishments belonging to their offences past. Hereof the two brethren were no lesse well aware; and therefore aduertured vpon a remedie little lesse desperate desperate than their present case. They issued forth of Herbesus vnarmed, with oliue branches in their hands, in manner of suppliants; and so presented themselves to the Armie. Sixe hundred men of Creete were in the vanguard; that had bene well used by Licentymus; and some of them greatly bound vnto Hannibal; who had taken them prisoners in the Italian warre, and lowly dimissed them. These Creetans therefore welcomed the two bretheren, and bad them be of good cheare; saying, that no man should doe them harme, as long as they could vse their weapons. Herewithall the Armie was at a stand; and the rumor of this accident, ranne swiftly from man to man, with generall approbation. The Pretors thought to helpe the 10 matter by seueritie; which would not serue. For when they commaunded these two Traitors to be laid in yrons: the exclamation was so violent against them, that saue they were to let all alone, and returne, vncertaine what course to take, vnto Megaras, where they were lodged the night before. Thither when they came, Hippocrates deuised a trick; whereby to helpe himselfe, and better the vncertaine case wherein he stood. He caused letters of his owne penning, to be intercepted by some of his most trustie Creetans; directed (as they made them) from the Syracusanian Pretors, to Marcellus. The contents hereof were, That Marcellus had well done, in committing all to the sword among the Leontines: but that it farther behoued him, to make the like dispatch of all the Mercenaries belonging to Syracuse; which were 20 all vniuie, all of them in generall, to the libertie of the Citie, and the peace with Rome. When this counterfait Epistle was openly rehearsed: the vpror was such, that Solis and his fellow Pretor, were glad to forsake the campe, and flee for their liues. All the Syracusanians remayning behinde, had bene cut in peeces by the enraged souldiers, if the two artificers of the sedition had not faued their liues; rather to keepe them as pledges, and by them, to winne their friends within the Towne than for any good will. They perfwaded also a mischieuous knaue that had seru'd among the Leontines, to iustifie the bruit of Marcellus his crueltie; and to carrie home the newes to Syracuse, as an eye-witnesse. This incensed not only the multitude, but some of the Senate; and filled the whole Towne with causelesse indignation. In 30 good time (said some) was the auarice and crueltie of the Romans detected: who, had they in like sort gotten into Syracuse, would haue dealt much worse; where their greedy appetites might haue bene tempted with a farre greater bootie. Whilst they were thus discouraging, and deuiling how to keepe out the wicked Romans, Hippocrates with his Armie came to the gates; exhorting the Citizens to let him in, vnlesse for want of helpe, they would be betrayed to their enemies. The Pretors with the best and wisest of the Senate, would faine haue kept him out: but the violence of the souldiers to force a gate, was no whit greater, than the headstrong furie of those within the Towne; so that laboured to breake it open. So he entered, and immediately fell vpon the Pretors; whom (being forfaken by all men) he put to the sword, and 40 made slaughter of them and their followers vntill night. The next day he went openly to worke: and after the common example of Tyrants, gaue libertie to all slaues and prisoners; and being fortified with adherents of the worst and basest sort, made himselfe and his brother Pretors, in Title, but in effect, Lords of Syracuse.

When Marcellus was aduertised of this great alteration, hee thought it no time for him to sit still, and attend the further issue. He sent embassadors to Syracuse; that were not admitted into the Haven, but chafed out as enemies. Then drew hee neare with his Armie: and lodging within a mile and a halfe of the Towne, sent before him, some to require a parlee. These were entertained without the walls by the two new Pretors: to whom they declared, That the Romans were come thither, not with purpose to doe hurt, but in fauour of the Syracusanians, which were oppressed by Tyrants; and to punish those, that had murdered and banished so many of the principall Citizens. Wherefore they required, that those worthe men, their Confederates, which were chafed out of the Towne, might be suffered to returne and enjoy enjoy their owne; as also that the Authors of the great slaughter lately committed, might be deliuered vp. Hereto Epicides briefly answered, That if their errand had bene to him, he could haue told what to say to them: but since it was directed vnto others, they should doe well to returne, when those to whom they were sent, had the gouernement in their hands. As for the warre which they threatned; hee told them, they should finde by experience, that to besiege Syracuse was an other manner of worke, than to take Leontium. Thus hee sent them gone; and returned back into the Citie. Immediately beganne the siege, which endured longer than the Romans had expected. The quick and easie winning of Leontium did put Marcellus in hope, that so long a Circuit of walls, as compassed Syracuse, being manned with no better kinde of Souldiers, than those with whom hee had lately dealt, would in some part or other, be taken at the first assault. Wherefore he omitted no violence or terrour in the very beginning; but did his best, both by Land and Sea. Neuerthelſe all his labour was disappointed; and his hope of preuailling by open force, taken from him by the ill successe of two or three of the first assaults. Yet was it not the vertue of the Defendants, or any strength of the Citie, that bred such despair of battie victorie. But there liued at that time in Syracuse, Archimedes the noble Mathematician: who at the request of Hiero the late King, that was his kinsman, had framed such engines of warre, as being in this extremitie put in vse, did more mischief to the Romans than could haue bene wrought by the Canon, or any instruments of Gunne-powder; had they in that age bene knowne. This Archimedes discourſing once with Hiero, maintained, That it were possible to remove the whole earth out of the place wherein it is, if there were some other earth, or place of sure footing, whereon a man might stand. For prooffe of this bold assertion, he performed some strange workes; which made the King entreat him to conuert his studie vnto things of vse; that might preserue the Citie from danger of enemies. To such Mechanicall workes, Archimedes, and the Philosophers of those times, had little affection. They held it an iniurie done vnto the liberall sciences, to submit learned Propositions, vnto the workmanship, and gaine, of base handicrafts men. And of this opinion Plato was an author: who greatly blamed some Geometricians, that seemed vnto him to profane their science, by making it vulgar. Neither must we rashly taske a man so wise as Plato, with the imputation of supercilious auerſitie, or affected singulartie in his reprehension. For it hath bene the unhappie fate of great inuentions, to be vilified, as idle fancies, or dreames, before they were published: and being once made knowne, to be vnder-valued; as falling within compass of the meanest wits and things, that euery one, could well haue performed. Hercof (to omit that memorabile example of Columbus his discoverie, with the much different sorts of neglect, which hee vnder-went before and after it) in a familiar and most homely example, we may see most apparent prooffe. He that looks vpon our Englishe Brewers, and their Seruants, that are daily exercised in the Trade; will thinke it ridiculous to heare one say, that the making of Malt, was an inuention, proceeding from some of an extraordinary knowledge in natural Philoſophie. Yet is not the skill of the inuention any whit the lesse, for that the labour of workmanship growes to be the Trade of ignorant men. The like may be said of many handicrafts: and particularly in the Printing of Bookes; which being deuised, and bettered, by great Scholars and wise men, grew afterward corrupted by those, to whom the practise fell; that is, by such, as could flubber things easily ouer, and feede their workemen at the cheapeſt rate. In this respect therefore, the Alchymists, and all others, that haue, or would seeme to haue any secret skill, whereof the publication might doe good vnto mankind, are not without excuse of their close concealing. For it is a kinde of iniustice, that the long trauells of an vnderstanding braine, beside the losse of time, and other expence, should be cast away vpon men of no worth; or yeeld lesse benefit vnto the Author of a great worke, than to meeke strangers; and perhaps his enemies. And surely, if the passion of Enuie, haue in it any thing allowable

and naturall, as haue Anger, Feare, and other the like Affections: it is in some such case as this; and serueth against those, which would vspire the knowledge, where-with, God hath denied to endue them. Neuerthelſe if we haue regard vnto common charitie, and the great affection that euery one ought to beare vnto the generall reliefe of mankind, altho the example of him that suffereth his Science to liue vpon the rust and vnuſed: it will appeare more commendable in wise men, so to enlarge these places, and to publish vnto the world, those good things that lie buried in their own bosomes. This ought especially to be done, when a profitable knowledge hath not pauerced to it some dangerous cunning; that may be peruerſed, by unskill men to a mischievous vse. For if the secret of any rare science, contained in the skill of blind ſome deadly and irrecoverable payson: better it were, that such a jewell remaine close in the hands of a wise and honest man; than being made common, blind all men to vs the remedie, by teaching the worst men how to doe mischief. But the workes which Archimedes published, were such as tended to very commendable ends. They were engines, seruing vnto the defence of Syracuse; not fit for the Syracusan to carry abroad, to the hurt and oppression of others. Neither did he altogether publish the knowledge, how to vse them, but reserved so much to his own direction; that after his death more of the same kinde was made, nor those, of his owne making were employed by the Romans. He diffused vnto this worthy man, that hee had approved, euen vnto the vulgar, the dignitie of his Science; and done especiall benefit vnto his Countrey. For to enrich a Mechanicall trade; or teach the art of murdering men, it was besides his purpose.

Marcellus had caused certaine of his Quinquagene Gallies to be fastned together, and Towers erected on them, to beat the defendants from the wall. Against these, Archimedes had fundrie deuices; of which any one sort might haue repelled the assaultants: but all of them together shewed the multiplicitie of his great wit. He shot heauie stones and long peeces of timber, like vnto the yards of ships, which brake some of the Gallies by their force and weight. These cast such such as lay farre off. They that were come nearer the walls, lay open to a continual volley of shot, which they could not endure. Some with an yron grapple were taken by the prow and hoisted vp; shaking out all the men; and afterward falling downe into the water. Some by strange engines were lifted vp into the ayre; where turning round a while, they were broken against the walls, or cast vpon the rocks: and all of them were so beaten, that they durst neuer come to any second assault. In like sort was the Land-armie handled. Stones and timber, falling vpon it like Haile; did not only ouerwhelme the men, but brake downe the Roman engines of battery; and forced Marcellus to giue ouer the assault. For remedie hercof it was conceived, that if the Romans could earely before day get neere vnto the walls: they should be (as it were) vnder the point blank, and receiue no hurt by these terrible Instruments; which were wound vp hard to shoote a great compass. But this vaine hope cost many of the assaultants liues. For the shot came downe right vpon them; and beating them from all parts of the wall, made a great slaughter of them, all the way as they fled, (for they were vnable to stay by it) euen till they were gotten very farre off. This did so terrifie the Romans; that if they perceived any peece of timber, or a ropes end, vpon the walls, they ranne away, crying out, that Archimedes his engines were readie to discharge. Neither knew Marcellus how to overcome these difficulties, or to take away from his men, that feare; against the cause whereof he knew no remedie. If the engines had stood vpon the walls, subiect to firing, or any such annoyance from without; he might haue holpen it by some deuice, to make them vnseruiceable. But all, or the most of them were out of sight, being erected in the streets behinde the walls, where Archimedes gaue directions how to vse them. Wherefore the Roman had none other way left, than to cut off from the Towne all prouision of victualls, both by Land and by Sea. This was a desperate peece of worke.

For

For the enemies hauing so goodly an Haven; the Sea in a manner free; and the Carthaginians; that were strong by Sea; willing to supply them: were not likely loosoone to bee consumed with famine; as the besiegers to bee wearied out; by lying in Leaguers before so strong a Citie; hauing no probability to carrie it.
Yet, for want of better counsell to follow; this was thought the best; and most honourable course.

In the meane while, Himilco; Admirall of a Carthaginian fleet, that had waited long about Sicily, being by Hippocrates advertised of these passages, went home to Carthage; and there to dealt with the Senate; that rose and twentie thousand foot, threethousand horse, and twelue Elephants; were contraiued vnto his charge;
wherewith to make warre vpon the Romans in Sicily by Land. Hee tooke many Townes; and many, that had anciently belonged vnto the Carthaginians; did yield vnto him. To remedie this mischiefe, and to stay the inclination of men, which following the current of Furthure, beganne to turne vnto the Carthaginians; Mar- cellus with a great part of his Armie; rose from Syracuse, and went from place to place about the Island. Hee tooke Pelorus and Heraclea, which yielded vnto him.
Hee tooke also Megara by force and sackt it: either to tenthe others; that were obstinate, especially the Syracusans; or else because Rome was at this time poore; and his Armie must haue somewhat to keepe it in heart. His especiall desire was to haue sued Agrirentum: whither hee came too late; for Himilco had gotten it before.
Therefore he returned back toward Syracuse; carefully, and in as good order as he could; for feare of the Carthaginian that was too strong for him. The circumsp-ection that he vsed, in regard of Himilco; stood him in good stead, against a danger that he had not mistrusted. For Hippocrates, leauing the charge of Syracuse vnto his brother, had lately issued out of the Citie, with ten thousand foot and five hundred horse; intending to ioine his forces with Himilco. Marcellus fell vpon him, ereether was aware of the other; and the Romans, being in good order, got an euauictorie, against the disperd and halfe vnarmed Syracusans. The reputation hereof helped a litle to keepe the Sicilians from rebellion. Yet it was not long, ere Himilco, ioining with Hippocrates, ranne ouer all the Island at his pleasure; and presented battelle to Marcellus, euen at his Trenches; but the Romans wisely refused it. Bomilcar also a Carthaginian, entred with a great fleet into the Haven of Syracuse; and victu-aled the Citie. After this, the disposition of the Islanders changed so againe; that although another Legion was come from Rome, which escaped from Himilco, and safely arrived at Marcellus his campe: yet many places resorted vnto the Carthagi- nians; and thus or betraied the Roman Garrison.

In the midst of these troubles, Winter enforced both parts to take breath awhile;
and Marcellus leauing some of his Armie before Syracuse, that he might not seeme to haue giuen ouer the siege, went vnto Leontium; where he lay intencue to all occasions. In the beginning of the Spring he flood in doubt; whether it were better to continue the laborious worke of besieging Syracuse; or to turne all his forces to continue the laborious worke of besieging Syracuse; or to turne all his forces to Agrirentum, against Himilco and Hippocrates. But it would greatly haue impaired his reputation, if he had gone from Syracuse, as vnable to preuaile: and he himselfe was of an eager disposition, euer vnwilling to giue ground, or to quit, as not fauile, an enterprise, that he had once taken in hand. Hee came therefore to Syracuse: where though he found all the difficulties remaining as before; and no likelihood to take the Citie by force or famine; yet was hee not without hope, that continuance of faile to preuaile by treason; against which no place can hold out. And to this end, he dealt with the Syracusan Gentlemen that remained in the Citie. This was not ealie for them practise with their friends that remained in the Citie. This was not ealie for them to doe because the towne would hearken to no parlee. At length a slave vnto one of the banished men, making them to runne away from his Master, got into Syracuse; where where he talked in priuate with some few, as he had bene instructed. Thus beganne Marcellus to haue intelligence within the Citie: whence the Conspirators vied to send him aduertisement of their proceedings, by a fisher-boat that passed forth in the night. But when they were growne to the number of fourescore, and thought themselues able to effect somewhat of importance: all was discouered; and they, like Traitors, put to death. In the meane while, one Damasippus a Lacedemonian, that had bene sent out of the Towne as an Embassadour to Philip King of Macedon, was fallen into the hands of Marcellus. Epicles was very desirous to ransom him:

and many meetings were appointed for that purpose, nor farre from the walls.
There, one of the Romans, looking vpon the wall, and wanting the more compendious arte of Geometrie, fell to numbring the stones: and, making an estimate of the height, judged it lesse than it had bene formerly deemed. Herewith hee acquainted Marcellus: who causing better notice to be taken of the place, and finding, that ladders of no extraordinarie length would reach it; made all things readie, and waited a conuenient time. It was the weakest part of the Towne, and therefore the most strongly garded: neither was there hope to preuaile by force against Archime- des, if they failed to take it by surpris. But a fugitiue out of the Towne brought word, that a great feast was to be held vnto Diana, which was to last three dayes:
and that, because other good cheare was not so plentifull within the Citie, as in former times, Epicles, to gratifie the People, had made the more large distribution of wine. A better opportunitie could not bee wished. Wherefore Marcellus, in the dead of the festiuall night, came vnto the walls; which hee tooke by Scalado. Syracuse was diuided into foure parts (or five, if Epicles were reckoned as one) each of which were fortified as distinct Cities. When therefore Marcellus had gotten some peeces, he had the commoditie of a better and safe lodging, with good store of bootie; and better opportunitie than before, to deale with the rest. For there were now a great many, as well of those in Acradina and the Island, inner parts of the Towne, as of those that were already in the hands of Marcellus, that beganne to hearken vnto compulsion; as being much terrified by the losse of those parts, which the Romans had taken and sackt. As for the weapons of Archimedes, little harme, or none they did, vnto those, that were sheltered vnder strong houses: although it may seeme, that the inner walls were not altogether vnfortified of his helpe; since they held out a good while, and were not taken by force. The Roman fugitiues, and Renegados, were more carefull than euer to defend the rest of the Citie: being sure to be rewarded with a cruell death, if Marcellus could preuaile. Hippocrates and Himilco, were daily expected; and Bomilcar was sent away to Carthage, to bring helpe from thence.
It was not long ere Hippocrates and Himilco came: who fell vpon the old camp of the Romans, whilst Epicles sallied out of Acradina vpon Marcellus. But the Romans made such defence in each part, that the Assailants were repelled. Neuertheless, they continued to beset Marcellus: whom they held in a manner as freightly belie-ged, as he himselfe did besiege the Towne. But the pestilence at length consumed, together with the two Captaines, a great part of the Armie, and caused the rest to dillodge. The Romans were (though somewhat lesse) afflicted with the same pestilence, in so much that Bomilcar did put the Citie of Carthage in hope, that he might be taken where he lay, if any great forces were sent thither. This Bomilcar wanted no desire to doe his Countrie service: but his courage was not answerable to his good will. Hee arrived at Pachynus with a strong fleet: where he staid; being loath to double the Cape; for that the winde did better serue the enemy than him.
Thither sallied Epicles out of Syracuse: to acquaint him with the necessities of the Citie; and to draw him on. With much intreatie, at length hee came forward:
but meeting with the Roman fleet, that was readie for him, he stood off into the deeper; and sailed away to Tarentum, bidding Sicily farewell. Then durst not Epicles returne into Syracuse, but went to Agrirentum: where he expected the issue; with a very faint hope of hearing any good newes.

The Sicilian souldiers, that remained aliue of Hippocrates his Armie, lay as neare as they could fafely, vnto Marcellus; and some of them, in a ftrong Towne three miles off. These had done what good they could to Syracuse, by doing what hurt they could vnto the Romans. But when they were informed, that the itate of Sicily was giuen as desperate by the Carthaginians: they sent Embassadors to treat of peace; and made offer to compound, both for themselves, and for the Towne. Hereunto Marcellus willingly gaue care: for he had staied there long enough; and had cause to feare, that after a little while, the Carthaginians might come thither frowning againe. He therefore agreed, both with the Citizens, and with the Souldiers that lay abroad; That they should be Masters of their owne, enjoying their libertie and proper lawes; yet suffering the Romans to possesse, whatsoeuer had belonged vnto the Kings. Hereupon they, to whom Epicles had left his charge, were put to death; new Pretors chosen; and the gates euen readie to be opened vnto Marcellus: when suddenly the Roman fugitiues disturbed all. These perceiving their owne condition to be desperate, perfwaded the other Mercinarie souldiers, That the Citizens had bargained only for themselves, and betrayed the Armie to the Romans. Wherefore they presently tooke armes, and fell vpon the new-chosen Pretors: whom they flue; and made election of fixe Captaines that should command ouer all. But shortly it was found out, that there was no danger at all to the souldiers; excepting only the fugitiues. The treatie therefore was againe set on foot, and wanted little of conclusion: which yet was delaied; either by some feare of the Citizens, that had seene (as they thought) proofe of the Roman auarice in the sack of Epipole, Tyche, and Neapolis, the parts already taken; or by some desire of Marcellus to get the Towne by force, that he might vse the libertie of a Conqueror, and make it wholly subject vnto Rome. Merius a Spaniard was one of the fixe Captaines, that had bene chosen in the late commotion: a man of such faith, as vsually is found in Mercinaries; holding his owne particular benefit aboue all other respects. With this Captaine, Marcellus dealt secretly: hauing a fit instrument of the same Nation, one Religenes; that went in companie with the Roman Embassadors, daily passing too and fro. This craftie Agent, perfwaded Merius, That the Romans had already gotten all Spaine: and that if euer he purposed to make his owne fortune good, either at home in Spaine, or any where else; it was now the only time to doe it; by conforming himselfe to the will of the Roman Cencrall. By such hopes the Spanish Captaine was easily wonne: and sent forth his owne brother among the Syracusan Embassadors, to ratifie the couenant with Marcellus.

This vnder-hand dealing of Marcellus against the Syracusians, cannot well be commended as honest: neither was it afterwards thoroughly approved at his coming to Rome. For the benefits of Italy to the Romans had bene such, as deserved not to be requited with the ruine of his Countrey: much lesse, that the miseries of his people, oppressed (though partly through their owne follie) by an Armie of Mercinaries, should minister vnto the people of Rome, aduantage against them. The poore Citizens could not make good their parts against the hired souldiers; and therefore were faine to yeld vnto the time, and obey those Ministers of Hannibal, that ruled the Armie. But as long as they were free after the death of Hieronymus; and now of late, when they had gathered courage by the flight of Epicles: it had bene their chiefe care to maintaine amitie with the people of Rome. They had lately slaine many the principall of Epicles his followers; and many of themselves had also bene slaine, both lately and in former times, because of their desire vnto the peace. What though it were true, that the Rafalcitie, and some ill aduised Persons, joynd with the Souldiers in leaunting of the Romans, by occasion of the slaughter which they heard to be done at Leontium, and afterward beheld in those parts of their owne Citie which was taken? Ought therefore the Roman Generall, in a treatie of peace held with the Syracusians, to make a bargain vnder-hand against them, with a Captaine of the Mercinaries? These things were objected against Marcellus, at his returne turne home. But the Senators, thought it a great deale better, to comfort the Syracusians with gentle wordes, and promises of good vantage in time to come; than to restore the bootie, and giue ouer the Dominion of a Citie, so great, wealthie, ftrong, and many waies important. Neuerthelesse if we consider the many inuencions, and great mischiefs, whereunto Syracuse was obnoxious; both by cuill neighbours, and by that very forme of policie, after which it was gouerned: we may truly affirme, That it receiued no small benefit, by becoming subject vnto Rome. For thereby it was not only assured against all forraigne enemies, domesticall conspiracies, and such Tyrants as of old had reigned therein: but freed from the necessity of banishing, or murdering, the most worthe Citizens, as also from all factions, intestine seditions, and a thousand like miseries, that were wont to grow out of the iacobinie, wherein they held their libertie in vaine. Neither enjoyed that Citie, from her first foundation, any such long time of happinesse, as that wherein it flourished, when it reited secure vnder the protection of Rome; and was no more molested, by the disease of ambition; whercof by Marcellus his victorie it was thoroughly cured. But such benefit, arising from wrongs done, scrues not to make iniustice the more excusable: vntill we should approve the answer of that These, who being found to haue stolen a silver cup from a sick man, said, He neuer leaues drinking.

By the treason of Merius, the Roman Armie was let into possession of all Syracuse; wherein, the bootie that it found, was said to haue bene no lesse, than could haue bene hoped for, if they had taken Carthage it selfe; that maintained warre by Land and Sea against them. All the goodly works and Imageries, wherewith Syracuse was maruailously adorned, were carried away to Rome; and nothing left vntouched; save only the houses of those banished men, that had escaped from Hippocrates and Epicles, into the Roman campe. Among other pittifull accidents; the death of Archimedes, was greatly lamented, euen by Marcellus himselfe. He was so busie about his Geometrie, in drawing figures, that he hearkned not to the noise, and vprore in the Citie; no, nor greatly attended the rude Souldier that was about to kill him. Marcellus tooke heauily the death of him; and caused his body to bee honourably buried. Vpon his Tombe (as he had ordained in his life time) was placed a Cylinder and a Sphere, with an inscription of the proportion betwene them; which hee first found out. An Inuention of so litte vse, as this may seeme, pleased that great Artill better, than the deuiling of all those engines, that made him so famous. Such difference is betwene the iudgement of learned men, and of the vulgar sort. For many an one would thinke the monie lost, that had been spent vpon a sonne, whose studies, in the Vniuersitie had brought forth such fruit, as the proportion betwene a sphere and a Cylinder.

After the taking of Syracuse, all the Townes in Sicily yielded vnto the Romans; except Agirgentum and a few places thereabout. At Agirgentum lay Epicles with one Hanno a Carthaginian, and Mutines an African, that was lately sent from Hannibal. This Mutines, by many good peeces of seruite, had added some credit to the beaten Carthaginian side; and withall made his owne name great. By his perswasions, Hanno and Epicles aduencured to meet Marcellus without the Towne, and not be haue themselves as men expecting to be besieged. Neither was hee more valiant in counsell, than in execution. Once and againe he set vpon the Romans, where they lay encamped; and droue them fearefully into their Trenches. This bred enuie in Epicles and Hanno: especially in Hanno, that hauing bene lately sent from Carthage, with commission and authoritie from the State, thought him selfe wronged greatly by Hannibal; in that he had sent vnto him this Mutines, to be his Companion, and to take vpon him, like as good a man as himselfe. The indignitie seemed the greater, when Mutines, being to step aside vnto Heraclides, for the pacifying of some troubles there among the Numidians; aduised (as directing Hanno and Epicles) not to meddle with the enemy, vntill his returne. So much therefore the rather would Hanno fight: and offered battell vnto Marcellus, before hee fought it. It is like, that a great part of the Roman Armie was left behinde in Syracuse, as neede required: which made the Carthaginians the better able to deale with those that came against them. But whatsoever disproportion was betweene the two Armies; farre greater were the odds betweene the Capitaines. For howsoever the people of Carthage would give authority by fauour; yet could they not give worth, and abilitie, in matter of warre. The Numidians, hauing before conceived some displeasure against their Capitaines: and being therefore some of them gone away to Hanniball; were much more offended, when they saw that the vainglorious enuie of Hanno carried him vnto the light, vpon a foolish desire to get victorie, without the helpe of Mutines their Countreman. Wherefore they sent vnto the Roman Generall, and bad him be confident: for that it was not their purpose to shew themselves his enemies that day; but only looke on, and see the proud Carthaginians well beaten, by whom they had bene misused. They made good their promise; and had their desire. For Marcus, finding likelihood of truth in their message, did so lustily set vpon the Enemies, that he brake them at the first charge; and with the slaughter of many thousands, droue them back into Agrigentum.

If Hanno could haue bene contented, to follow the directions of one, that was a better man of warre than himselfe, and not haue hazarded a battaile without neede, the Romans would shortly haue been reduced into termes of great difficultie in their Sicilian warre. For Marcus, was shortly after to leaue the Province; and soone vpon his departure, there landed in the land a supply of eight thousand foot, and three thousand Numidian horse, that were sent from Carthage. The fame of this new Armie drew many of the Sicilians into rebellion. The Roman Armie, consisting (for the most part) of the Legions of Canna, tooke it very haينously, that no good seruice done, could bring them into the fauour of the Senate; but that, as banished men, they were sent farre from home, and not suffered to returne back to Rome with their Generall. Mutines had pacified his Countreman the Numidians; and, like an honest man, did the best that he could for those whom he serued, without contending against the foolish pride of Hanno; finding that there was a great alteration; and a greater might haue bene, if the Armie lately overthrowne had bene entire. M. Cornelius, the Roman Pretor, vsed all diligence, both to pacifie his owne men, and to hinder the Carthaginians. He recovered those inland Townes that had rebelled; and though he could not hinder Mutines from ouer-running all the Countrie; yet hee hindered the Countrie from recruiting vnto Mutines. Above three score Townes, great and small, the Carthaginians held in Sicily: of which, Agrigentum was the principall; and farre bigger than any of the rest. Thence issued Mutines as often as he pleased, in despite of the Romans: not only to the succour of his owne adherents; but to the great waste of those that followed the contrarie part. But Hanno, in stead of being pleased with all these good seruices, was filled more and more with enuie, against the man that performed them. He had (belike) receiued instructions from old Hanno at Carthage; not to suffer Hanniball, or any Hanniballian to haue share in the honour of these Sicilian warres: which were therefore perhaps the more diligently supplied; whilst Italy was neglected, that should haue bene regarded more then all the rest. Wherefore, to shew his authoritie, and that it was not in the power of Hanniball, to appoint vnto him an Assistant, or Director: Hee tooke away from Mutines his charge, and gaue it to his owne sonne; thinking thereby to discountenance the man, and make him little esteemed, as one out of Office, among his Numidians. But it fell out quite contrarie: and this spitefull dealing, occasioned the losse of whatsoever the Carthaginians held in Sicily. For the Numidians were so incensed by the indignitie offered vnto their Countreman, being such a braue Commander, that they offered him their seruice to requite the wrong; and were therefore absolutely at his owne disposition. M. Valerius Laetius, the Roman Consul, was newly come into the Province, when this fell out: and with him did Mutines enter into intelligence. For he could no longer brooke these indignities: but being neither a Carthaginian, nor fauoured by those that bore all the sway in Carthage; He thought it the wisest way, to play the best of his owne game, and forsake that Citie, which was likeli to perish by the euill counsell that gouerned it. He did not therefore, as his Countreman had lately done, content himselfe to see his Adversaries reape the bitter fruits of their owne malicious ouer-weening; and to suffer that harme, in doing whereof he would not beare a part; but conspired against them, to deliuer vp Agrigentum, and to helpe to expell them vterly out of Sicily. The Consul was glad of his friendship: and carefully followed his aduertisements. Neither was there much cunning needfull, to the performance of that which Mutines had vnder-taken. For he with his Numidians did forcibly seize vpon a gate; where-at they let in some Roman Companies, that lay neare in a readinesse for the purpose. Hanno, when first he heard the noyse, thought it had bene no worse matter, than some such tumult of the Numidians, as hee had bene well acquainted with of late. But when, making haste to pacifie the trouble, he saw and heard, the Romans intermixed, among those discontented followers of Mutines, forth with he betooke himselfe to flight: and saving himselfe, with Epistates, in a small Bark, let saile for Africa, leauing all his Armie and Adherents in Sicily, to the merie of the Romans; that henceforward continued masters of the whole land.

Laetius the Consul hauing taken Agrigentum, did sharpe execution of iustice vpon all the Citizens. The principall of them hee scourged with rods, and afterwards beheaded, as was the manner of the Romans: all the rest of them hee sold for slaues, and confiscated their goods; sending home to Rome the monie that was raised of the bootie. This was indeede a time, wherein Rome stood in no lesse necessitie of gold, than of Steele: which may haue bene the reason, why Laetius dealt so cruelly with the Agrigentines. Neuertheless the fame of such seueritie bred a terror among all the Dependants of the Carthaginians; so that in great haste they sought to make their peace. About fourtie Townes yielded themselves quickly vnto the Romans; twentie were deliuered vp by Treason; and fixe only staid to be wonne by force. These things done, Laetius returned home to Rome: carrying with him about foure thousand men from Agrigentum; that were a companie of out-laws, bankrupts, and banished men, accustomed to liue by spoile of others, in these trouble some times. He bestowed them about Rhegium in Italy, where they might exercise their occupation against the Bruttians; a thessell kinde of people, that were enemies vnto those of Rhegium, and to the Romans. As for Mutines, hee was well rewarded, and made Citizen of Rome: where hee liued in good account; accompanying the two Scipios in their iourne against Antiochus, and therein doing (as is said) very especiall seruice. So by this enterprize of Sicily, the Carthaginians wasted much of their forces, that with greater profit might haue bene employed in Italy: leauing yet vnto the Romans, in the end of this warre, the entire possession of this land; which they wanted when it beganne.

¶ XVI.

How the warre passed betweene the Romans and Hanniball in Italy, from the taking of Capua to the great victorie at Metellus.

Shortly after the winning of Capua, Metellus came to Rome: where, for his good seruices done in the land of Sicily, hee had granted vnto him the honour of the lesser Triumphe, which was called Ovation. The greater Triumphe was denied him: because hee had not finished the warre, but was faine to leaue his Armie behinde him in the Province. Hee staid not long in Rome, before hee was againe chosen Consul toger her with with M. Valerius Laetius, who succeeded him in the government of Sicill, and was, at the time of his election, making warre against King Philip in Greece. Great complaint was made against the Consul Marcellus, by the Syraculians, for that which he had done unto them: they alleging their great friendship to the people of Rome, in the time of their late King Hiero; and affirming, that their Citie did neuer willingly breake the alliance, excepting when it was oppressed by such Tyrants, as were not greater enemies to Rome, than to all good men that liued in Syracuse. The Consul, on the other side, reckoned vpon the labours and dangers wherunto they had put him: willing them to become themselves to the Carthaginians that had holpen them in their necessitie; and not vnto the Romans whom they had kept out. Thus each part having some good matter to allege, the Senate made such an end of the controuersie, as best agreed with the benefit of their owne Commonwealth: blaming the too much rigour of Marcellus; yet not restoring the bootie that he had taken, nor making the Syraculians free from their subiection, but comforting them, with gentle wordes, and hopefull promises, as hath beene shewed before. The two new Consuls, Marcellus and Laetius, were appointed to make warre, as their lots should fall out; the one in Italie, the other in Sicill. The Isle of Sicill, fell vnto Marcellus: which Prouince he willingly changed with his Colleague; to the end that the Syraculians (whose cause had not as yet beene heard in the Senate) might not seeme hindered by feare, from uttering their grieuances freely. Afterwards, when his businesse with them was dispatched, hee gently vnderooke the patronage of them; which remained long in his Familie, to the great benefit of their Countie in times following. So Valerius, the other Consul, was sent into Sicill, whose doings there haue bene already rehearsed: but Marcellus was employed against Hannibal.

Before the Consuls departed out of Rome, they were much troubled with pressing of Souldiers to the warre; and most of all, with getting Mariners for their Nauie. They were all of the poorer sort, that vied to be employed in Sea-seruices; especially in rowing. They could not liue without present wages: neither was there monie enough in the Treasurie to giue them pay: Wherefore, it was ordained, that they should be set out at the expence of priuate men; who, in this necessitie of the state, were driuen to sustaine all publike charges. Hereat the People murmured: and were ready to fall into sedition; had not the Consuls deferred the matter vnto further consideration. The Senate could ill tell, what to determine or doe, in a case of such extremities. For manifest it was, that the multitude had already endured so much, as well it could vnder-goe; and somewhat more, than could with honesty haue been imposed vpon it. Neuertheless it was impossible to maintaine the warre against the Carthaginians, or to keepe the Macedonian out of Italie, without a strong fleet. Wherefore, some were of opinion; That, since the common Treasurie was so empty, the people must be forced, by right or wrong, to take the burden vpon them. At last the Consuls beganne to say, That no perswasions would be so effectuall with the people, as good examples: and that if the Senators would follow the Consuls, like it was, that the People also would follow the Senate. Wherefore they propounded, and it was immediately concluded, That every one of them should bring forth, and put into the Treasurie, all the monie that he had; and that no Senator should keepe any vessell of gold, or plate whatsoeuer; excepting one salt-seller, and a boule wherewith to make their offerings vnto the Gods: as also a Ring for himselfe, with such other tokens of ingenuitie for his wife and children, as euery one did vse, and those of as small value as might be. This aduice of the Consuls was not more thankfully accepted by the Senate, than the ready performance thereof by the Senate was highly applauded; and hastily followed by the Gentlemen of Rome. Neither did the Commonalty refuse to doe that, which their betters had openly done before them. For since the publike necessitie could no otherwise be holpen, euery one was contented, that his priuate estate should runne the same fortune with the Common-wealth; which if it suffered wreck, in vaine could any particular man man hope to enjoy the benefit of his proper subsistence. This magnanimitie delerued well that greatnesse of Empire, wherof it was the foundation.

Coniunct order being thus taken for an Armie and Fleet: Marcellus went forth of the Citie against Hannibal; and Laetius toward Sicill. The armie of Hannibal was greatly diminished, by long and hard seruice: neither did his Carthaginians seeme to remember him, and thinke vpon sending the promised supply, or any such proportion as he needed. His credit also among his Italian friends, was much weakened, by the losse of Capua: which gaue them cause to looke vnto themselves; as ill in his helpe there were little trust to be reposed, when they should stand in neede. This he well perceived; yet could not tell how to remedie. Either he must thrust Garrison into all Townes that he suspected, and thereby so diminish his armie, that he should not be able to keepe the field: or else hee must leaue them to their owne fidelitie; which now beganne to wauer. At length his ieioultie grew so outrageous, that he sacked, and wasted, those places that he was vnable to defend: thinking that the best way to enrich himselfe, and make vnprofitable, to his enemies, the purchase from which he could not hinder them. But by this example, many were quite alienated from him; and some of those, whom before he had least cause to doubt. The towne of Salapia yielded vnto Marcellus; and betraied vnto him a gallant Regiment of Numidian horse, the best of all that serued vnder Hannibal; which was a greater losse, then the Towne it selfe. Blasius the author of this rebellion; could not bring his designe to effect; without getting the consent of one Dalsus, that was his bitter enemy. Wherefore he brake the matter to this Dalsus in priuate; and was by him accused vnto Hannibal. But when he was conuicted, and charged of Treason, he so stoutly denied it, and by way of recrimination, so vehemently pressed his accuser with the same fault: that Hannibal thought it a matter deuised out of meere malice; knowing well what enemies they were; and seeing, that neither of them could bring any proofe of what he affirmed. This notwithstanding, Blasius did not cease to presse his aduersarie anew, and vrge him from time to time, with such lively reasons; that hee who could not be belieued by Hannibal, was contented at length to winne the fauour of Marcellus. Presently after this, the Consul rooke by force, Marenza and Meles, Townes of the Samnites: wherein hee slew about three thousand of Hannibal his men.

Hannibal could not looke to all at once: but was faine to catch advantages, where he might get them; the Romans now being growne stronger in the field than hee. The best was, that his Carthaginians, hauing wearied themselves with ill speede in many pottie enterprises, and laid aside all this while the care of Italie, to follow businesse of farre lesse importance; had now at length resolved, to send presently the great supply, that had bene so long promised and expected. This if they had done in better season, Rome it selfe might haue bene stricken downe, the next year after that great blow recieued at Canna. But since that which is past cannot be amended: Hannibal must force himselfe to make a good countenance; and tell his followers, that this mightie succour would come time enough. For Masaniissa was at Carthage with five thousand Numidians, ready to set saile for Spaine: whither when hee came, it was appointed, that Asdrubal should forthwith take his iourne into Italie; of which there had bene so long talke. These newes did not more comfort Hannibal and his followers, than terrifie the Romans. Wherefore each did their best: the Romans to prevent the threatening mischiefe, and winne as much as they could vpon Hannibal, before the coming of his brother; Hannibal, on the contrary, to hold his owne, and weaken the Romans as much as he was able. He had intelligence, that Cn. Fuluius, a Roman Pretor, lay neare vnto Herranca to get the Towne by practise. It was not long, since, neare vnto the same place, another Cn. Fuluius had lost his armie. Therefore Hannibal made great marches thitherward; and came to Herranca ere Fuluius heard newes of his approach. As soone as he came, he offered battle to the Roman Pretor: who accepted it with more haste than good speede. The Roman Legions made good resistance awhile, till they were compassed round with the Carthaginian horse. Then fell they to rowts; and great slaughter was made of them. Fulvius himselfe, with twelve Tribunes or Centurions, were loit: of the common souldiers that were slaine, the number is vncertaine; some reporting fiftie, others thirtee thousand. The Towne of Herdonia, because it was at point to haue yielded vnto Fulvius, Hannibal did set on fire; and putting those to death that had practised with the Enemy, carried away the multitude; whom he bestowed among the Thurians and Adelpinians. The Consul Marcellus hearing of this, wrote vnto the Senate: and exhorted them to be of a good cheare; for that he would shortly slay the enemies pride. He followed the Carthaginian space; and ouer-taking him at Nunifiro in the countrey of the Lucans, fought with him a battaile: which beginning at nine of the clock in the morning, lasted vntill night; and ended, by reason of the darknesse, with vncertaine victorie. Afterward Hannibal departed thence into Apulia, whither Marcellus followed him. At Venusia they met, and had many skirmishes; but none of importance. Hannibal remoued often, and fought to bring the enemy within danger of some ambush. But Marcellus, though he was very eager of battaile, would yet aduenture nothing, but by open day-light and vpon faire ground.

Thus passed the time away, vntill Q. Fabius Maximus, and Q. Fulvius, he that lately had taken Capua, were chosen Consuls. Fabius, considering how much the Roman affairs were bettered by the taking of Capua, purposed that year to besiege Tarentum: which if he could winne, ike it was, that scarce one good Citie would afterwards remaine true to Hannibal. Wherefore he vehemently exhorted his Colleague, and Marcellus, to whom was continued the command of those Legions that served vnder him the year before) to presse the Carthaginian so hard, as he might haue no leisure to helpe Tarentum. Marcellus was very glad of this charge; for hee thought no Roman fitter than himselfe, to deale with Hannibal in open field. Hee followed him therefore to Cannusium, and thence from place to place: desiring cuer to come to battaile, but vpon equal termes. The Carthaginian had not minde to hazard much in fight: but thought it enough to entertaine his enemy with skirmish; as being desirous to keepe his Armie strong vntill the coming of Aldubal. Yet could he not auoide the importunite of Marcellus; nor brooke the indignitie of being daily braued. He therefore bade his men to be lustie, and to beat soundly this hot-spirited Roman Captaine, that would neuer suffer them to be at quiet; vntill they once had cooled well his courage, by letting him blood. Hereupon followed a battaile: wherein Hannibal had the victorie; tooke sixe Ensignes; and slue of the Romans almost three thousand, among which were some of make. Marcellus was so impatient of this dishonour, that he rated his men, as Pefants, and base cowards: telling them, that they were the first of the Roman Legions, which had been beaten by Hannibal, by plaine force and manhood; without being circumvented by any stratagem. With these, and many other the like wordes, which they were ashamed to heare, he did so vex them; that thinking themselves better able to endure any violence of the enemy, than such displeasure of their Generall; they besought him to pardon them, and leadeth them forth once againe to fight. He did so: and placing those Companies foremost, that had lost their Ensignes the day before, bade them be carefull to winne a victorie; wherein the newes might be at Rome, before the report of their shamefull ouerthrow. Hannibal was angrie, to see that nothing could make this Enemy quiet: and therefore was redie to fight againe, since all other motives continued the same, and his men had been heartned by the late victorie. But the Romans were tired vp with desire of reuenge, and of repairing their honour, which affections gaue a sharpe edge vnto their valour: whereas the Carthaginians were growne dull, and wearie by seeing themselves disappointed of their hope; and the enemy, notwithstanding their late victorie, as redie to molest them as before. In this second battaile Marcellus got the victorie: which hee purchased at so deare a rate; that neither he, nor Hannibal, had great cause to vaunt; the second night. For if eight thousand of the Carthaginians were slaine, and three thousand of the Roman side, in this next battaile, the difference was no greater, than vnto to recompence the late receiued ouerthrow: especially since the number of the Romans that were wounded, was so great, as disabled Marcellus from pursuing Hannibal; who dislodged by night. Neuertheless it sufficed, that Fabius the Consul hereby got leisure, to follow his businesse at Tarentum without any disturbance. Q. Fulvius the other Consul, about the same time, tooke in many of the Thurians, Lucans, and Adelpinians, that willingly yielded themselves, and betrayed the Garrisons of Hannibal that lay in their Townes: whom Fulvius entertained in louing sort; gently rebuking them for their errors past, without punishing those that had been authors, or bulie doers in the rebellion. Tharabble of Sicilian theues, which Laonius had lately brought from Agaturna, was then also set on worke to besiege Cabulus, a towne of the Brutians: and nothing was omitted; that might serue to duert Hannibal, from the succour of Tarentum.

Q. Fabius the Consul, having taken Mahdoris a Towne of the Salentines, late downe before Tarentum: making all preparation that seemed needfull to carrie it, either by assault or long siege. Of the Garrisons in the Towne a good part were Brutians, placed there by Hannibal, vnder a Captaine of their owne Nation. This Captaine fell in loue with a Tarentine wench; whose brother serued vnder Fabius. Hereof, hee gaue notice by letters to her brother, as thinking belike to draw him from the Roman side; by telling him how rich, and of what great accompt her louer was. But her brother made the Consul acquainted with these newes: and said, that if the Brutian were farre in loue, he might perhaps be wonne, by intreatie of his Mistres, to doe what these would haue him. The Consul hearing this: and finding likelihood in the matter, willed his souldier to conuey himselfe into the Towne as a fugitive; and trie what good might be done. It fell out, according to his desire. The souldier grew acquainted with this Brutian Captaine: and partly by his owne persuasions, partly by the flattering entreatie of his sister; wanne him to betray the Towne to the Romans. When they had agreed vpon the businesse, and resolved how to order it; the same souldier got out of the Towne by night, and acquainted the Consul with his proceedings: telling him, in which part that Brutian kept watch, and what might conueniently be done. So in the night time, Fabius gaue an alarme to the Citie; especially about those parts of the wall, which were farthest from the place where he meant to enter. The Captaines in the Towne, prepared to make resistance in those places, where the noise did threaten them with greatest likelihood of danger. But Fabius himselfe, with the choice of his men, came in great silence to the quarter of the Brutians: who being wrought by their Captaine, helped the Romans to get vp, and brake open the next gate; whereto the Armie was let in. The Tarentines, and Carthaginian souldiers, made head against Fabius in the Market-place: but (as hapneth in like cases, where the maine confidence is already taken away) not very obstinately. Nico, Democrates, and Philomenes, with those that before had let in Hannibal, vsed now the last of their courage in dying against the Romans. Carthale, who commanded the Garrison within the Towne, offered himselfe prisoner: hoping to be well vsed, because of hospitalitie that had passed betwene his Father and the Consul. But he was slaine by the way, ere he could come at Fabius. The Romans did put all indifferently to the sword: in such sort, that they spared few of the Brutians. This slaughter of the Brutians, was thought to haue bene made by appointment of the Consul, to the end that he might seeme to haue wonne the Towne by force and not by treason: though he thereby failed of his purpose; and neither had the glorie which he expected, nor preserved his reputation of faithfull dealing, and keeping his word. The bootie found in Tarentum was very great: whereof the Roman Treasure, whither it was carried, had great neede. As for the Imageries, and other curiosities that were in the Citie, Fabius was contented to let them alone: and being told of some Idolls, that seemed worthe to be carried away, being very goodly peeces, in such habit and posture as if they were fighting: he said, let vs leave vnto the Tarentines their angie Gods.

Hannibal being gotten cleare from Marcellus, fell vpon those that besieged Canusina. They fled at his coming; but he was so neare, that they were faine to be take them to a Hill, which seru'd to no other purpose, than to beare off the first brunt. There they defended themselves a litle while, and then they yielded. When this businesse was done, he halted away to relieue Tarentum. But when hee came within fife miles of the Citie, he had newes that it was lost. This grieved him; yet he said no more than this: The Romans haue also their Hannibals; wee haue lost Tarentum in such sort as we got it. That he might not seeme to turne back amafed, or in any feare of the victorious Consuls, he incamped a few daies together, so neare as he was vnto Tarentum: and thence departing to Metapontum, he thought himselfe how to take Fabius in a trap. He caused the chiefe of the Metapontines to write vnto Fabius, and offer to betray into his hands, the Carthaginian Garrison; with condition, that he should in that respect, forgive them all offences past. These letters were sent by two young men of the same Citie: who did their errand so well, that the Consul wrote back by them vnto the Metapontines, and appointed the day, when they should expect him. Hereof Hannibal was exceeding glad: and at good leisure, made readie his ambushes for the warie Fabius. But whether some secret notice of the plot were giuen; or whether in deede (as it is related) some tokens in sacrificing, terrified the superstitious Romans; the iourne to Metapontum was deferred. Hereupon the same two Messengers were employed againe: but being apprehended, and threatened with torture, they discouered all.

This yeare was happy to the Romans, in all their warres: for they got euerie where; saue only at Canusina; where they lost a companie of such lewd fellows, that it may seeme good fortune, to haue so bene rid of them. But their common povertie, and disabilitie to maintaine their charge, continued, and grew greater than it was before. Thirteen Roman Colonies were then in Italie: of which, twelue refused to contribute any longer to the warres. For it was considered; that the Legion and those vnhappie Companies, that had bene beaten vnder the one and the other Caesar, were transported into Sicily; where they liued, in a sort, as banished men. This grieved their friends at home, and made them reckon vpon the more diligently those other miseries which they daily felt. Ten yeares together they had bene exhausted with leues of men, and impositions of monie: in euerie which yeares, they had receiued some notable ouerthrow. In this case the least that they could feare; or rather the best which they could hope; was, to fall into the hands of the Enemy to be made prisoners. For Hannibal did gently send home their people that was taken by him: whereas the Romans did banish from their homes, those that had escaped. It was therefore likely to come to passe with in awhile, that they should be all consumed: since new Souldiers were daily pressed forth of their Townes; and the old ones neuer did returne. Such talke was frequent among those of the Colonies: especially where they that were transported into Sicily, had most compassionate friends. Wherefore it was concluded by the people of Ardea, Sutrium, Alba, and other good Townes, to the number of twelue, That they should boldly denie vnto the Romans, their farther helpe. This was thought the likeliest way to obtaine peace: whereof otherwise they saw little hope; as long as Hannibal liued. When the Consuls heard the Embassadors of these townes make such declaration, and protest their disabilitie of giuing any farther helpe; they were much amafed. They willed the Embassadors to returne home, and bring a better answer: forasmuch as this, was none other than reason: they bade them to consider, that their people were not Campanians, or Tarentines, but the offspring of the Romans; and no lesse partakers of the Empire, than they that inhabited the Mother-Citie. But all would not serue: the Embassadors continuing to protest, that they

they had already done what they could; and that they had remayning, neither men, nor money. It was well for the Romans, that the other eighteen Colonies did not imitate these twelue; but shewed themselves willing to vndergoe whatsoever should be layed vpon them, without shrinking vnder the burden. This their offer was so highly pleasing to the Consuls; that the Embassadors of those faithfull Colonies, were brought vnto the Senate, and produced into the Assembly of the people: where, with commemoration of all their former good seruices, this their present loue vnto the State was magnified, and thanks accordingly bestowed vpon them; with promise, that it should not be forgotten. As for the Embassadors of those twelue Colonies, that refused to contribute; it was thought best, neither to retaine them in the Citie, nor yet to dismisle them, nor to take any notice of them at all; but leave them to their owne consideration of their ill deserting.

It may greatly be doubted, what the example of these twelue People would haue wrought, in those that were so willing to helpe the State, if Asdrubal had bene then coming into Italie. For then must the Romans haue betaken themselves wholly to their owne defence; whereas now, to the great comfort of their subiects, they employed their forces in the conquest of Italie, with hopefull and fortunate success. Neuertheless, they were faine to open their most priuie treasure; and thence take out the golde, that had bene layed vp to serue them in cases of greatesse extremitie. Of the money thus extracted, one quarter was deliuered to Fabius, the Consul, to set him well out against the Tarentines; all the rest, was sent into Spain to Scipio, for the maintenance of his Armie; and to prouide, that Asdrubal might not passe from thence into Italie. It is like that Fabius did not spend all his money; finding such easie success at Tarentum, as was shewed before. But to stop the iourney of Asdrubal, neither the money sent into Spain, nor any victories wonne by Scipio could suffice. Neuertheless it fell out happily for the People of Rome, that this yeare, and the next, were spent, before his coming; and they better prepared, than at lesse warning they could haue bene, to entertaine him. Here it were not amisse to note, That since the Romans, being in so great necessitie of money, were driuen to furnish the Armie in Spain, with the greatest part of all their stocke that was left: it must needs be, that either the bootie taken in new Carthage, was farre lesse then fame had reported it; or else that Scipio had not as yet wonne it: howsoeuer Liue rather inclines to those, who say that he got it soone after his arruall.

M. Claudius Marcellus, and T. Quintius Crispinus, were chosen Consuls after Fabius and Fulvius. In their yeare it was, that Asdrubal tooke his iourney out of Spain, though he came not into Italie vntill the yeare following. After the great battaile at Canna, Hannibal had lost much time about Cuma and Naples, in seeking to make himselfe Master of a good haven, for the landing of those succours that were promised from Carthage. The hope that he reposed in Philip, caused him to turne his principall care to the Easterne parts of Italie; where he made readie a faire entrance for the Macedonian, if he had bene readie to come. But since this hope was vanished, and the long promised succour of Asdrubal was (though farre later than had bene expedient) readie to arriue: he began to deale with the people of Hetruria, through whose Countries his brother was to passe, that therein hee might make a partie against the Romans. The losse of Capua, Tarentum, and many other Townes, might haue terrified all other of the Italian Townes, from hearkning to any sollicitation of the Carthaginians. Yet the povertie of the Romans, and the wearines of their adherents, together with the fame of a greater Armie coming, than that which Hannibal brought into Italie; did embolden many of the Hetrurians, especially the Arretines, to take such counsell as they thought most expedient for themselves; without regard of their fidelitie to Rome. The Roman Senat, hearing the rumour of their conspiracy, sent Marcellus the new chosen Consul into Hetruria: whose coming did so terrifie them, that they rested quiet for a while. All the yeare following they were devising how to breake out: as contrariwise the Roman Propretors; partly by terror of severe judgements and inquisitions; and partly by the force of two or three Legions, with which they visited all suspected places, kept them honest against their wills; and tooke many Hostages for better assurance. The two Consuls had an earnest desire, to make strong warre vpon Hannibal without more temporizing; perswading themselves, that in battaile they should be too strong for him. Crispinus had further his particular desire, to make his Consulship notable by the winning of some good Towne: as Falvius and Fabius had gotten honour by Capua and Tarentum. Therefore he went about the siege of Loeri; one of the best Cities which the Carthaginians then held in Italia: and brought thither all sorts of engines; sending for a fleet out of Sicily to helpe him. But Hannibal was not slow to relieue the Citie: the same of whose approach, made Crispinus desist from his enterprize, and retire vnto his Colleague, that lay at Venusia. Thither followed Hannibal; to whom the Consuls daily offered battaile. This great man of Warre had no neede to stand vpon his reputation: which was already so confirmed, that his refusing to fight, was not likely to be ascribed vnto feare; but rather deemed as part of his wisdom. He enterained the Consuls with many light skirmishes, and fought to take them at some advantage, reseruing his owne numbers as full as he could, vnto a time of greater employment. In this lingering manner of Warre, Marcellus tooke no pleasure; but sought to compell the Enemy to battaile, whether he would or no. The Admiral of the Roman fleet about Sicily, L. Cincius, was commanded againe to assaile the Towne of Loeri: which might well enough be forced, if Hannibal continued as he beganne, to trifle away the time at Venusia. To the same purpose a part of the Garrison that lay in Tarentum, was appointed to goe by Land to the assistance of Cincius. But Hannibal had an eye behinde him. He laid an ambush in the way, betwene Tarentum and Loeri, wherinto the Romans fell: and hauing lost about three thousand of their companie, were well glad, the rest of them, to quit their enterprize, and save their owne liues within Tarentum. As for the Consuls, it was the desire of Hannibal, to waste their Army by little and little: which to doe, he neglected Hannibal. There lay betwene him and them an Hillock, ouer-grown with wood, that seemed fit to couer a number of men: who lying there vnder cover, might fall vpon such, as should straggle from the Roman campe; and cut them off. Therefore he sent thither by night some companies of Numidians: whom he willed to keepe themselves close, and attend their best advantage. To this peece of ground, the Consuls thought it fit to remoue their campe: Marcellus thinking that he neuer lay neare enough vnto Hannibal. Thither therefore both of them rode, to view the place, accompanied with the sonne of Marcellus, a few Colonells, and other principall men; and not many more than two hundred horse, most of them Hetrurians. The Numidian Centinell gaue warning of their approach to his fellows; who discovered not themselves, vntill they had surrounded the Consuls and their traine. The Consuls, as necessity compelled them, defended themselves: hoping to be quickly relieved from their campe that was neare at hand. But the Hetrurians ranne away from them, at the first: and left them in that great danger, to the weak assistance of no more than fortie horse-men, that were of the Colonie of Fregelle. These Fregellans abode by the Consuls; and did what they could to haue brought them safe off. But when Marcellus was stricken through with a Lance, and fell downe dead; then beganne euery one to shift for himselfe, and escape as they might. Crispinus the other Consul, had his death wound, being stricken with two Darts; and yong Marcellus was likewise wounded; yet these two recovered their campe. The rest of the Colonells and Officers, together with the Lictors that carried the bundells of Rods and Axes before the Consuls, were all slain or taken. To the dead bodie of the Consul Marcellus, Hannibal gaue honourable Funerall; according to the custome of those times: and bestowing bestowing his ashes in a silver pot, covered it with a crowne of gold; and so sent them to yong Marcellus, to be by him interred, where he thought good.

Presently after this, Crispinus bethought himselfe, how that the signet Ring of Marcellus, was fallen into the custodie of Hannibal; who might vie it, to his owne purposes, ere that which had hapned were well knowne abroad. Wherefore he lent word vnto all the Townes about; that his Colleague was slain, and that Hannibal had gotten his Ring: wiling them in that regard, to giue no credit vnto any letters therewithall signed. This prouidence of Crispinus, was not more than requisite. For his Messenger was but a little before come to Salapia, when another Messenger arrived there from Hannibal, bringing letters in the name of Marcellus, and sealed with the capite Ring: whereof the contents were, That it was his purpose to come the same night vnto Salapia; where he willed, that the Souldiers of the Garrison should be in a readinesse, for such employment as hee should thinke needfull. The device was plaine: and no lesse plaine was the reuengefull minde, which he bare against that Citie; because of his braue Numidian companies, that had therein bene betrayed. The Salapians hereupon bethought themselves, how to take their Enemy in his owne snare. They sent back the Messenger which was a Roman fugitiue; without letting him perceiue any signe of distrust in them. This done, they prepared all things in a readinesse, for the entertainment of such a friend. Late in the night he came thither; with a troupe of Roman fugitiues, armed Roman like, leading the way. These all talking Latin together, called vnto the Watch, and bade open the gates; for the Consul was there. The gate was opened, faire and leisurely, and the Port-cullis drawne vp no higher than needes it must be, to let them enter. But when fixe hundred of them were gotten in, downe fell the Port-cullis againe: and they that thought to haue taken others, were taken themselves; being laied at on all hands by the Salapians; that quickly made an end with them.

Hannibal being thus ouer reached with this stratagem, hasted away to Loeri; whereunto Cincius the Admiral of the Roman fleet about Sicily, did lay hard siege. The first appearance of the Numidians, Hannibal his Vauccurors, made the Romans, in all confus'd haste, runne to their ships: leauing all their engines, and whatsoever was in their campe, to the enemies disposition.

The Roman Senate, hearing of these accidents, sent vnto Crispinus the suruiuing Consul, and requested him to name a Dictator: that might take charge of the Commonwealth, and dispatch the election of new Magistrates, with other businesse; whereunto himselfe was disabled by his hurts. Hee did so: and soone after died. Then was it thought needfull, that new Consuls should be chosen out of hand: forasmuch as two Roman Armies, lay lo neare vnto the Enemy, without any General. Especially it was desired, that election should be made of such men, as were not only valient, but well aduised: since the best, and most fortunate of their great Darcers, M. Marcellus, by looting himselfe so strangely, had giuen them a faire warning, not to commit their Armie vnto rash heads. Among those that stood for the Consulship, C. Claudius Nero was the most eminent. Hee was of great Nobilitie, a good Souldier, and one, whose many seruices in this present warre, did forcibly commend vnto the place. Yet he seemed a little too violent; and one, whose temper needed the allay of a more staid wit. The Fathers therefore endeuoured to ioyne vnto him in the Consulship M. Linius: one that had borne the same Office, long before. This M. Linius had bene Consul with L. Aemilius Paulus, in the yeare foregoing the beginning of this warre. After their Consulship, wherein they did so good seruice, they had both of them been called into iudgement by the People: and this Linius condemned, Aemilius hardly escaping. Though it hath bene once already noted; yet I cannot forbear to remember it againe: how it pleased God, to vpbraid the vnthankfull Romans, with the malicious iudgement, giuen by their multitude vpon honorable men. For in the battaile of Cannae, it was apparant, what lamentable effects, the memorie of their iniustice wrought: when L. Æmilius rather chofe to yield to the froward ignorance of his Colleague; and afterward to die in the great overthrow, that euer fell vpon the State of Rome, than by resisting the pernicious courtes of Tullius Tarre, to cast himselfe anew vpon the danger of the popular furie. As for M. Linius, he is euen now readie, and will so continue, to tell the People of their faults in a diuers manner. Eight yeares together after his condemnation had beene absent out of the Citie, and liued in his Countrie Grange; vexing himselfe with the indignitie of his condemnation. Marcellus and Launius, being Consuls two or three yeares agoe, had brought him into Rome: where he liued in discontented fort, as might appeare, both by his carelesse in apparell, and by the wearing of his long haire and beard; which in that age were the badges of men afflicted. Very lately he was compelled by the Censors, to poll his haire, and come into the Senate: where he vied to sit silent, and signifie his assent or dislike to what was propofed; either in short formall wordes, or in passing from side to side, when the house was diuided. At length it hapned, that in some buisinesse weightily concerning one that was his kinsman, he stood vp, and made a set speech: whereby he drew all the Fathers to attention; and bade them inquire of him, and take better notice, what he was, and what he had bene. The Senate was much altered since he had let it; many braue men were lost; new ones were chosen; such as rather crued to fill vp the number, than to answer to the dignitie of the place: and they that were left of ancient standing, had euen spent their Vertues to no great effect. Wherefore, all beganne to say; that it was great pittie, so worthie and able a man, as this Linius, had bene all this while forgotten; one, of whom the Common-wealth stood in great neede, yet had not vied, in this dangerous warre. Now seeing that the Consuls ought, one of them, to be chosen a Patrician, the other, of necessitie a Plebeian: and since, neither Fabius, nor Valerius Launius, being both of them Patricians, could be joynted with Clauius Nero: euery one was of opinion, that there could not be chosen and coupled together, two fitter men than C. Claudius, and this Marcus Linius. But Linius would not endure to heare of this. He said it was vnreasonable, that one condemned as a dishonest man, should afterwards be chosen Ruler of the Citie. If they had done ill to trust him with one Consulship, what meant they then to offer him another? With these, and the like phrases hee resisted their desires: till by perswasions, and examples rehearfed, of such as had patiently digested injuries done by the People, and repaid good for euill; he was contented to accept the honour.

Here we may behold a true figure of that Embleme, with which Themistocles checked the ingratitude of the Athenians: resembling himselfe to a Plane tree, the branches and boughes whereof men breake in faire weather; but raine vnder it for shelter in a storme. Such vnthankfulnesse, to well-deseruing men, is not rarely found in the outrageous multitude. Neither was the late example hereto much vnlike, of Philip the second King of Spain in dealing with the Duke of Alca. For although he had committed the Duke to prison, vpon some small offence conceived, without all regard of his former deserts: yet when his intended conquest of Portugal, required the seruice of a man, more then ordinarily sufficient; he stood no longer vpon the scanning of late displeasures; but employed the same Duke, whom he had newly disgraced. Thus is wilddome often taught by necessity.

It was a dangerous yeare toward, when C. Claudius Nero, and M. Linius were chosen Consuls. Asdrubal was alreadie come into France, and waited only, to haue the waies of the Alpes thawed by warme weather, for his passage into Italie. The Romans vied at this time the seruice of three and twentie Legions: and wanted not employment, for many more, if they had knowne how to leue and maintaine them. Of these which they had, foure serued in Spain, two in Sicily, and two in Sardinia: the rest were so disposed, in severall parts of Italie, where neede seemed to require, that only two Legions were left to each of the Consuls. But the Consuls were men of execution, execution: and would not be tied to the punctuall obseruance of what the Senate thought fit. M. Linius would not stirre out of Rome, against so mightie a power as followed Asdrubal; vntill hee had first obtained, that hee might carrie with him as many as could well be spared from other employments; and chofe, or the most of them, chosen Companies: It was true, that two Legions, appointed to serue vnder Lucius Porcius a Pretor of that yeare, among the Cisalpine Gauls, might be reckoned as an additament to the forces of Linius; to whom the warre against Asdrubal was allotted. So might also two other Legions, that were among the Salentines, neare vnto Tarentum, vnder another of the Pretors, be accounted a part of Claudius his Armie; that was sent against Hannibal. Neuertheless the Consuls, by the especial instance of Linius, did obtaine, that all might be left to their owne discretion. For newes came, that Asdrubal was alreadie passing the Alpes; the Ligurians, who dwelt in the Countrie about Genua, with their Neighbour people, were in readinesse to joyne with him; and L. Porcius sent word, that he would adventure no further, than hee safely might. When all was ordered, as themselves thought best, the two Consuls went forth of the Citie, each, his seuerall way. The People of Rome were now quite otherwise affected, than they had bene, when L. Æmilius Paulus, and C. Terentius Varro, were sent against Hannibal. They did no longer take vpon them, to direct their Generalls; or bid them dispatch, and winne the victorie betimes: but rather they stood in feare; least all diligence, wilddome, and valour, should proue too little. For since few yeares had passed, wherein some one of their Generalls had not bene slaine; and since it was manifest, that if either of these present Consuls were delected, or put to the worst; the two Carthaginians would forthwith joyne, and make short worke with the other: it seemed a greater happinesse than could be expected, that each of them should returne home Victor; and come off with honour, from such mightie opposition, as he was like to finde. With extreme difficultie had Rome held vp her head, euer since the battaile of Cannae: though it were so, that Hannibal alone, with little helpe from Carthage, had continued the warre in Italie. But there was now arrived another sonne of Amilcar; and one, that in his present Expedition, had seemed, a man of more sufficiencie than Hannibal himselfe. For, whereas in that long and dangerous march, through barbarous Nations, ouer great Rivers, and Mountaines, that were thought vnpassable, Hannibal had lost a great part of his Armie: this Asdrubal, in the same places, had multiplied his numbers; and gathering the people that he found in the way, descended from the Alpes like a rowling Snow ball, farre greater than he came ouer the Pyrenees at his first setting out of Spain. These considerations and the like, of which feare presented many vnto them; caused the People of Rome, to wait vpon their Consuls out of the Towne; like a penitente traine of Mourners: thinking vpon Marcellus and Crispinus, vpon whom in the like fort they had giuen attendance the last yeare, but saw neither of them returne aliuie, from a lesse dangerous warre. Particularly, old Q. Fabius gaue his accustomed aduise to M. Linius, that he should abstaine from giuing, or taking battaile, vntill hee well vnderstood the Enemies condition. But the Consul made him a froward answer, and said, That he would fight the very first day: for that he thought it long, till he should either recover his honour by victorie; or by seeing the overthrow of his owne vnjust Citizens, satisfie himselfe with the joy of a great, though not an honest, reuenge. But his meaning was better than his words.

Of the overthrow that Asdrubal receiued in Spain, by Scipio, a little before hee tooke his iourne into Italie, such mention hath alreadie bene made, as agreed with the report of that noble Historian Linius. Yet I thinke it not amiss to adde in this place, what may be gathered out of the remaining fragments of Polybius his historie, concerning that accident. Asdrubal had wrestled with many difficulties in Spain; by reason of those Caprains that were sent from the Citie of Carthage to joyne with him in the administration of that Province: they being, as it may seeme, of the Hannibalic faction; which is to say, thus farre forth Traitors, that they preferred the ad-

namage of their owne tide, before the good of their Commonwealt. In what particulars they wronged this worthy sonne of Amilcar, and how they hindered his courtes vnder taken, it can not be knowne: since of those bookes, wherein Polybius hath exactly handled these matters; there are vs remaining, only a few broken peeces. But by the pightfull dealing of Hanno in Sicili with Antinice, a better man of warre than himselfe, whom Hannibal had sent into the Iland: we may conceiue, that against the brother of Hannibal it was thought needfull, by these malicious Partitions of Hanno, to vse the violent opposition of more carnell malice. Neuertheless, Asdrubal was a good Patriot: and therefore endured patiently such indignities, as Antinice could not long digest. His journey into Italie being resolved vpon: he lay with part of the Armie at Betulia, not farre from the mines of Iliuer; whence he was to furnish his Expedition. Thither came Scipio: and draue him out of his Campe, though he were strongly lodged, before the other Carthaginian Captaines could, or would, come to his assistance. The ouerthrow seemes not to haue bene so great, as it mult haue bene supposed, if no way lay open to those that fled. Rather it appears, that Asdrubal dealt like a prouident man: and seeing that his Campe was likely to bee forced, sent away all his monie, with his Elephants before him: but staied behinde himselfe to sustaine the *Roman*s awhile, vntill his carriages might bee out of danger. Herein he had his desire. Afterwards, he gathered his broken troops together: and retired in such sort, that Scipio thought it not good to pursue him, and so passed ouer Tagus. Then taking vnto him the forces assigned for his Expedition, he marched away toward the Pyrenes: leauing the care of Spaine vnto his brother Asago, and to Asdrubal the sonne of Gefeo: that thought himselfe the fittest man for the administration thereof. Faine would Scipio haue stopp'd him on his journey, by sending to defend against him the ordinarie way of the Mountaines. But whether Asdrubal took another way, or whether he forced the guards that Scipio had set to keepe the Pyrenes (as the defence of hard passages commonly sorts to no good effect) he was not letted in his voiage by any such impediment. Comming into Gaul, and following the steps of his brother Hannibal: hee found the Nations that lay in his way, so well affected, either to him or to his monie, that no passages were defended against him, nor any fort of resistance made; but he, and his Armie, well entertained, and their numbers much increased, by accesse of such as were desirous to take his pay. Of these he had the better choice: for that hee was driuen to Winter in their Countrie; whilst that the passages of the Alpes were closed vp with Ice and Snow. The Mountaines likewise, that had so greatly molested Hannibal in his journey ouer the Alpes; were easily wonne to take part with Asdrubal, when he traualled through their Countrie. For these poore men, at the first comming of Hannibal, were verily perswaded, that it was his purpose to robbe them of their cattails; and to make spoile of that little wealth, which they had painefully scraped together out of the desolate rocks. But now in proccesse of time, they were better informed. Therefore vnderstanding, that there were two mightie Cities, farre disioyned asunder, which made warre vpon each other, by Land, and Sea; and that the Alpes did only lie in their way: they gladly condescended, to take their part in the fortune of the Inuaders. The like affection, vpon greater cause, was afterward found in the Cisalpine Gauls. The Ligurians also joyned with Asdrubal: and so would the Heretians haue done; if he had arrived in their Countrie. There was no other Roman Armie neare, than L. Porcius with his two Legions; of whom there was no great feare. Therefore did Asdrubal set vpon Placentia Roman Colonie: in hope to make his comming the more terrible; by the destruction of that Towne. But thereloe lost a great deale of time, and finally was driuen to quit the enterprise: by vnder taking which, he gaue the Roman Consuls leisure, to make readie for him; and caused his brother Hannibal (who vpon the first bruit of Asdrubal his so timely, and easily passing the Alpes, was about to leaue his wintering camps, and goe forth to meet with him) to sit still awhile, as well aware, that Placentia would not be taken in haste,

C. Claudius

C. Claudius Nero the Roman Consul, made what speede hee could, to meet with Hannibal, and stop him from ioyning with his brother. He had about forrie thousand foot, and five hundred horse: with which he daily offered battalle to the Carthaginian; and had of him the better in many skirmishes. Hannibal was once driuen to make a tedious march from the borders of the Salentinis and Apulians, into the Countrie of the Brutians; there to entreafe his forces; which were otherwise too weak for the iournie intended. Afterward comming to Grumentum, a Towne of the Lucani; he there fought vnprosperously with Nero the Consul. Neuertheless he got off, and marched away to Venusia. But Nero followed him; and had there againe the better of him. Wherefore hee was driuen to returne to Hydruntum: where ioyning with Hanno, that had made readie a good Armie; hee assisted againe to make way by force to his brother. So he passed onward, and came againe to Penusa, hauing Nero still at his heeles. Thence went he ouer the Riuier Uisula to Casunum, where he sate downe, not farre from the place in which he had obtained, his most memorable victorie. There also did Nero sit downe by him: and both of them rested, without making offer to fight. It seemed perhaps vnto Hannibal, who knew the Countrie very well, that his brother might, with little impediment, ouercome the way to Casunum: where if he could once againe deale with both the Consuls, and all the Roman forces together, he had reason to hope for such another victorie, as once he had gotten in the same open Countrie. If this had so fallen out; Rome would haue bene vndone for euer. But the Carthaginians should not haue heeded to with any second victorie, in the naked Champps about Canna; if such an artifice, as this which Asdrubal now brings, had come to second Hannibal, when hee was in his full strength; and the *Roman*s not able to keepe the field. Wherefore this worthy Generall had good reason afterward to say, that Hannibal was the man, who by delaying the supply, did beat him out of Italie; which else by power of the Romans could haue done.

Whilst Nero waited vpon the Carthaginians, and thought hee should be hindered from meeting with the Armie that was comming to their succour, he was notwithstanding of Asdrubal his approach; by Letters and Messengers intercepted, as they were going to Hannibal. These gaue notice, that Asdrubal had left the siege of Placentia, and drew onwards apace: being already come within two hundred miles of his brother; notwithstanding all opposition that could be made by the Consul. Of these newes Claudius Nero was nothing ioyfull. For if Hannibal could once be ioyned as head, vnto that great bodie of an Armie, which Asdrubal brought with him: it was most apparant, that howeouer the fortune of Rome should befall, for the present, any great calamitie; yet the very continuance of so long a warre at home, would enforce the Latines, and other faithfull Associates, to shift vnder the burden; as twelue of the thirtie Roman Colonies had already done. Wherefore hee resolved, that it were better to make any desperate adventure, than to suffer the conjunction of two such malevolent Planets: whose pestilence in influence, if not on the spot daie, yet within few yeares, was like to worke most lamentable effects. It seemed apparant, that his Colleague was vnable to stay the progresse of Asdrubal: neither were there any good Legions in a readinesse that could doe seruice in such a needfull case; excepting those, that were already employed vnder the two Consuls. Here, vpon hee concluded, that it was not expedient for him to tie himselfe to his owne charge, which was the warre against Hannibal: but rather that it belonned him, to helpe where more necessitie required; and to carrie part of his forces vnto his Colleague. This could not be without much danger. Yet since the meeting of the two Carthaginian brethren, was farre more dangerous to the Roman Common-wealth; it seemed the best way to put Fortune in trust, with that which was of the leesse importance. Sixe thousand foot, and a thousand horse he therefore tooke, that were the very choice of his Armie: and making these as if he would only step aside, to doe some small peece of seruice neare at hand; away hee posted as fast as hee could, to assist assist his fellow Consul. His Messengers ranne before him, to giue warning to all Townes by which he was to passe, that they should be readie to meet him, with vituallis, and all other necessaries for his Armie. Linus the other Consul, at that time, lay incamped, neare vnto Sena Gallica; and Asdrubal within halfe a mile of him. In fixe daies Nero had finished his iourne thither; and when he drew neare, sent Messengers before him, to giue notice of his coming. Linie thought it fittest that hee should stay in some place of couert vntill darke night, and then enter secretly into the campe: least the Enemy, perceiving this access of strength, should accordingly frame his counsailes. This was done: and a token giuen, that the Colonells, Captaines, and all Souldiers, aswell horse as foot, that Nero had brought with him; should bee lodged and entertained by men of their owne sort. Their Companie was somewhat increased by Voluntaries that joyned with them on the way. Neuer-thelesse, it was not needfull, that the Quarter which receiued them, should bee enlarged; since they had brought with them nothing but their armes. The next day they held a Counsaile of warre: wherein some were of opinion, that it was best for these new-arrived Companies, to refresh themselves a few daies after their wearie iourne, before they should be drawne forth to battaile. But against this, Nero was very earnest: and besought his Colleague, to make vse of him out of hand; that he might betimes returne to his owne Campe, ere Hannibal should haue notice of his absence. The souldiers also of Nero, were full of spirit; perceiving that the honour of the victorie was like to be theirs: inasmuch as the battaile would not haue beene undertaken, without their coming to helpe. Finally, it was agreed when the Counsaile brake vp, that the signe of battaile should be hung out; which was commonly a purple coate ouer the Generalls paulion.

Asdrubal was no lesse willing than the Romans to come to battaile: hauing long desired it, and hitherto not found occasion before. But when he had put his men in order, and was riding before the head of his Armie, to behold the Enemies countenance: it seemed to him, that they were more than they had beene; and some of their armes and horses, looked as though they had wanted dressing, after a long iourne. Hereupon, he beganne to with-draw his Armie back into the Campe: and gaue order, that if no prisoners could bee taken, by whom he might bee certified of the truth; yet should there good obseruation be made, whether the enemies campe were enlarged, or no; or what other alteration could be noted, that might shew their forces to be increased. The campe, as hath bene said, was not extended: but the trumpet, that sounded once in the quarter of L. Porcius the Pretor, did now, contrary to former custome, found twice in the quarter of Linus the Consul. Here-at Asdrubal greatly mused: and being well acquainted with the Roman orders; held this for a sure token, that the other Consul, was there arrived. How this might be, if Hannibal were alive, and in good case, he was not able to coniecture: but thought it the best way, to goe secretly to worke; till he might be better informed. Vpon confidence in his owne forces, he had not cared hitherto, how neare hee lay to the Romans: nor troubled himselfe perhaps with ouer-strongly fortifying his owne Campe. Yet when hee now perceived, that somewhat was fallen out beside his expectation: he changed his resolution; and held it no dishonour to remoue a little further off. So hee dislodged secretly by night: intending to get ouer the River
Metaurus; whereby to keepe himselfe as long as he could, from necessitie of battaile.
 But whether it were so, that his guides did steale away from him in the darke, so that he could not finde the way to the Foords; or whether his carriages were too heauie, and hindered his speede: farre hee had not gone, ere the Consul Nero was at his heeles with all the Roman horse, and staid him from passing any further. Soone after came L. Porcius with the light armature: whom the other Consul followed anon with all the Legions; in good order, and readie for battaile. Asdrubal, seeing himselfe ouer-taken with necessitie to fight; omitted no care and circumspection. His Gauls, in whom hee reposed least confidence, hee placed in his left wing vpon a Hill, which the Enemy should not, without much difficultie, be able to climbe: in the

 placed in the midst; and his Elephants, hee bestowed in the front of his battaile. On
 cius* of the battaile. Both Romans and Carthaginians well vnderstood, how much depended vpon the fortune of this day; and how little hope of safetie there was vnto the vanquished. Only the Romans herein seemed to haue had the better in conceipt, and opinion; That they were to fight with men desirous to haue fled from them.
 And, according to this presumption, came Linus the Consul with a proud brauerie, to giue charge on the Africans: by whom he was so sharply entertained, that the vi-ctorie seemed very doubtfull. The Africans and Spaniards were stout souldiers; and well acquainted with the manner of the Roman fight. The Ligurians also were a hardie Nation, and not accustomed to giue ground; which they needed the lesse, or were able now to doe, being placed in the midst. Linus therefore, and Porcius, found strong opposition: and with great slaughter on both sides, preuailed little or nothing. Besides other difficulties, they were exceedingly troubled by the Elephants, that brake their first ranks; and put them in such disorder, as the Roman Ensignes were driuen to fall back. All this while Claudius Nero, labouring much in vaine against a steepe Hill, was vnable to come to blowes with the Gauls; that stood opposite vnto him, but out of danger. This made Asdrubal the more confident; who seeing his owne left wing safe, did the more boldly and fiercely make impression on the other side, vpon the left wing of the Romans. But Nero, perceiving that the place wherein he stood, was such as would compell him to remaine idle till the fight were ended; tooke a part of his forces, and led them round behinde the forces of Porcius and Linus: which hauing compassed, he fell vpon Asdrubal, and charged him in the flanke. Here beganne the victorie to be manifest on the Roman side. For Nero, finding none to resist him in front, ranne all along the depth of Asdrubal his battaile:
 and falling vpon the skirts thereof, disordered the Enemies, and put all to rowt. Of the Spaniards therefore and Africans, that were laid at on euery side, the greatest part was slaine. The Ligurians and Gauls escaped as they could; and saved themselves by timely flight. Of the Elephants, foure were taken alive: the rest were slaine; some by the Enemies weapons; others by their owne guides that rode them. For when any of them, being fore wounded, beganne to wexe unruly, and rush back vpon their owne battailes following them: the guide had in readinesse a Mallet, and a Chizzell, wherewith he gaue them a stroke betweene the eares, in the ioynt of the neck, next vnto the head; wherewith hee killed the beast vpon the suddaine. This speedie way of preventing such harme as the Elephants, being hurt, were wont to doe to the squadrons following them; is said to haue bene the deuice of Asdrubal himselfe; who died in this battaile.

Great commendations are giuen to Asdrubal, both by Polybius, and by Linie.
 He is said at all times to haue shewed himselfe worthe of Amilcar his father, and Hannibal his brother; to haue striven with great patience, against many difficulties, whereinto he fell by the means of those Captaines, that were sent from Carthage into Spain; to haue performed in this last battaile all duties of a worthe Generall; and finally when hee saw the losse irreparable, to haue ridden manfully into the thickest of his Enemies; where fighting brauely, hee was slaine. Of the number that died with him in this battaile, the report of Linie, and of Polybius, doe very much disagree. For Linie saith, that the Carthaginians had no lesse an ourthrow, than was that, which they gaue to the Romans at Cannae; that fixe tie thousand of them were slaine, fixe thousand and foure hundred taken prisoners; and aboue four thousand Roman Citizens, whom they had captiues with them, deliuered, and set at libertie. He saith also, that of the Romans and their Associates there were slaine eight thousand: and of the bootie, that it was exceeding great; not only in other kindes;
 but in gold and siluer. Concerning the bootie; Polybius hath no mention of it.
 Likely

Likely it is to haue beene as rich as Linie reporteth it; for Asdrubal came well furnished with monie. But Polybius (who had no desire to make this battaile of Metaurus, a paralel vnto that of Cannae) reports no more than about ten thousand of the Carthaginians died, and two thousand of the Romans; to haue beene slaine. The number of the prisoners he doeth not mention; but only saith, That some of the Carthaginian Princes were taken alive; and that all the rest died in the battaile. Whereby it may seeme, that they were all Barbarians; forasmuch as they preferred the honour of themselves, and of their Countrey, aboue their liues.

The joy of this victorie, was no lesse in Rome, than had beene the feare of the enemy. For euer since it was knowne in what fort Nero had left his Armie; the whole Citie was troubled, as much as lately at Hannibal his coming thither. Men thought it strange, that the Consul should make such a great adventure, as thus to put the one halfe of all the Roman forces, vnto hazard of the Dice. For what if Hannibal should chauce to haue notice of this his departure; and either pursue him, or set vpon the Armie that staid behinde, much weakened, and without a Generall? Thus did they talke; yet referring their censure vnto the successe; with libertie to approve or condemn, according to the issue. In the meane while the People filled the Market-places; the Women ranne to the Temples, with Vowes and Prayers; and the Senators were daily in counsaile, waiting still readie at hand vpon the Magistrates; as if some great matter were likely to fall out, that would require euerie ones helpe. In briefe, they were all so full of melancholie, that when first newes of the victorie came, there were not many that would beleue it. Afterwards when Messengers arrived from the Consuls, with Letters containing all that had passed: there was not only great and joyfull concourse of all sorts of men vnto the Temple, but the very face of the Citie was altered; and men from thenceforth beganne to follow their priuate businesse; making contracts one with another (which they had long forborne to doe) and attending their owne affaires in such wise, as if Hannibal were alreadye driuen out of Italie.

Nero returning to his campe, threw forth openly the head of Asdrubal before the Carthaginians; and producing his African prisoners bound; sent two of them loose to giue Hannibal notice of what had hapned. These two prisoners, might haue serued well enough to certifie Hannibal of this misadventure, without doing wrong to the dead body of Asdrubal; especially since Hannibal, in honourable, and faire different manner, had giuen buriall to Gracchus and Marcellus; yea to all the Roman Generalls, whose carcases fell into his hands. But it may seeme, that howsoever the People of Carthage, wanted much of the generous disposition, which was found among the Romans, in their loue vnto the Commonweale; yet in dealing with Enemies, they were farre more ciuill, and lesse prone to the insolencie of reuenge. The best excuse of this outrage done by Nero, is, that hee hoped much more by the sudden terrour of such a spectacle, than by the simple relation of that which had passed, to make a deepe impression of feare into the Carthaginians. It may also be said, That he forgot himselfe, being ouer-joyed with the greatnesse of his prosperitie. For it was the battaile of Metaurus that weighed downe the balance, and turned the Tide of the Roman fortune; which being then at the lowell ebbe, ceased not afterwards to flow, till it could not be contained within any banks. Hannibal hauing lost in this vnhappie fight (besides that worthe Gentleman his Brother) all the hope that so long sustained him in Italie; with-drew himselfe into the Countrey of the Brutians; and thither hee caused all the Lucans that were of his partie to remoue; as likewise all that dwelt in Metapontum. For he wanted men to defend so many places as he held at the present, because they lay too farre asunder. Wherefore he drew them all into a lesse compass in the vtmost corner of Italie; it being a Countrey of much fastnesse, and the people exceedingly deuoted to his seruice. In this businesse Nero gaue him no memorable impediment: either because Hannibal was too strong for him, hauing all his forces vnited; or because it is likely that this remoue of the Lucans and Metapontines, was not before the end of Sommer, when their harvest was gathered in; at what time the Senate called him home to Rome. At Linus the other Consul carried among the Cisalpine Gauls; vntill the end of Sommer; there to set things in such order as he thought requisite: which done, hee wrote vnto the Senate, that there was no more neede of him and his Armie in that Prouince; but that L. Porcius, with the two Legions that were there before, might very well discharge the place. For this cause, hee desired leaue to returne home; and that he might bring his Armie with him. The Senate well vnderstood his meaning: which was to haue the honour of a triumph, as he well deserved. But forasmuch as it was well knowne, what interest Nero had in the late victorie: order was giuen, that not only Linus with his Armie should come home; but likewise Nero; though leauing his Armie behinde him, to confront Hannibal. So the honour of triumph was granted to them both: in the pompe whereof Linus made the greater shew, as riding in a Chariot, and followed by his Souldiers; because in his Prouince, and vpon his day of command, the victorie was gotten; his Armie also being present at the triumph. But Nero that rode on horse back, and without such attendance, was the more extolled both by the People and Souldiers; by whom, the victorie was in a manner wholly ascribed vnto his great worth. Neither wanted L. Veturius Plautus, and Q. Caelius Metellus, Lieutenants to the Generalls, the due acknowledgement of their good seruice. For they were commended vnto the People, as men worthe to be chosen Consuls; and Consuls they were chosen for the yeare following. But nothing was done by them, worthe of memorie, in their Consulship. Neither indeede from this yeare, which was the thirteenth of the present warre, vntill the eighteenth yeare wherein it ended, was there any matter of importance wrought in Italie; save only the taking of Lecri from the Carthaginians by surpris. For Hannibal wanted strength, wherewith to make any great offer: and the Romans had little minde to prouoke him; but thought it well that hee was quiet. Such opinion had they conceived of him; that though all about him went to ruine; yet in him alone they thought there was force enough to hold himselfe vpright. And surely very notable are the commendations giuen vnto him by Polybius; whom Linus therein follows: That making warre vpon a People, of all other the most warlike, hee obtained so many victories by his owne good conduct: and that leading an Armie, compounded of so many sundrie Nations, Africans, Spaniards, Gauls, Carthaginians, Italians, and Greekes; which were, neither in Language, Lawes, Conditions, or any other thing, one like to another; hee held them all in such good order, that they neuer fell to sedition among themselves, or against their Generall. But that which Linus addes hereto, is yet perhaps of greater admiration: That hee sustained his Armie, without helpe from other places, from this time forward, vpon the hungry soile of the Brutians: which, when it was best manured in time of peace, could hardly suffice to nourish the Inhabitants. It is therefore apparent, that by his proper worth and vertue, he kept his Armie in such order and obedience, rather than by any greatnesse of reward and bootie: since, after the death of Asdrubal, he made no inuasion vpon the wealthier parts of Italie; but held himselfe still among the poore Brutians. Where we must leaue him vntill he be drawne into Africa by Scipio; whose doings will henceforth entertaine, and leade vs, vnto the end of this Warre.

§. XVII.

How P. CORNELIUS SCIPIO the Roman, made entire conquest of Spaine.

¶. I.

How the Carthaginians were driven by SCIPIO from the Continent into the Isle of Gades.

MAGO, and ASDRUBAL the sonne of Gisco, tooke vpon them the charge of Spaine, when ASDRUBAL the sonne of AMILCAR departed thence into Italie. These agreed together, that MAGO should make a voiage to the Balears; there to leuie a supply of men: and ASDRUBAL with-draw himselfe into Lusitania (which is now Portugal) whither the Romans had ill meanes to follow, being altogether vnacquainted in those parts. MAGO had soone ended his businesse, and returned into Spaine: where hee met with one HANNO (the same perhaps that had lately bene employed in Sicily) who brought new forces out of Africk, and came to succede in place of ASDRUBAL the Barchine. It is not vnlike that Spaine was now the better, and more readily furnished with men, and all things needfull from Carthage; when that sonne of AMILCAR, whose authoritie had bene greatest, was thence departed. For hereby might the factious diligence of old HANNO approue it selfe, against that noble race of Warriors; when it should appeare, that things did prosper much the better by being left vnto the handling of other men. Whether it were vpon desire to make good some such opinion raised of him at home, or whether vpon confidence in the forces that he brought over: HANNO tooke the field, and led MAGO with him; as purposing afresh to set vpon the Romans. So he entred into the Countrie of the Celtiberians, not very farre from new Carthage: where, by monie, and other persuasions, he leuied aboue nine thousand men.

P. SCIPIO in the meane while contained himselfe in the Easterne parts of Spaine: attentue, as it may seeme, to the proceedings of ASDRUBAL the sonne of AMILCAR; against whom, he is reported by some Writers to haue sent part of his forces into Italie, to the assistance of C. CLAUDIUS NERO, and M. LELIUS the Consuls. But hearing of the leuie made by HANNO and MAGO, among the Celtiberians: hee sent M. SYLLANUS the Propretor, with ten thousand foot and six hundred horse. SYLLANUS got intelligence, by some fugitiue Celtiberians, who became his guides, that their Countreimen encamped apart from the Carthaginians in great disorder: as men fearing no danger, because they were at home. Wherefore as closely as he was able, he drew neare to these Celtiberians: and falling vpon them on the suddaine, gaue them such an overthrow, that HANNO and MAGO comming to their succour, in head of heartening and reinforcing them, became partakers of the losse. MAGO saved himselfe, with all the horse, and old Companies of foot, which were about two thousand: and in ten daies journey brought them safe to ASDRUBAL. The rest of the Africans were either slaine or taken: among whom, HANNO had the ill luck to be taken prisoner; though he kept himselfe out of the fight vntill all was lost. As for the Celtiberians, they knew better how to make shift; and saved most of themselves by running into the woods.

It could no other wise bee, but that SCIPIO was much troubled with the danger wherein Italie stood, by the comming thither of ASDRUBAL. Ten thousand foot and eighteene hundred horse hee did therefore send out of Spaine (as it is reported by some Authors) to the defence of his owne Countrie: or was perhaps about to send them; and thereupon remained at new Carthage, inentue to the necessity and successe of his Countreimen at home. But when had word of the great victorie at METABURN, which fell out long before the end of this Sommer, then might hee well aduenture, to take in hand the entire conquest of Spaine; which must needs be much alienated from the Carthaginians, by the report of such an overthrow. The Spanish Soldiers that serued vnder HANNIBAL, and those that had bene sent over into Africk; were as pledges heretofore, by whom their Countrie was held obnoxious to the Carthaginians. But when it was noised abroad, That all which had followed ASDRUBAL into Italie, were fallen into the hands of the Romans; and that HANNIBAL with his Armie, was closed vp in a streight, whence hee could not get out: then did it greatly behoue the Spaniards to conforme themselves vnto the will of the Victors. That it was the successe of things in Italie, which gaue such confidence vnto SCIPIO; it is the more probable, because hee tooke not this great enterprize in hand, vntill the Sommer, was almost spent. ASDRUBAL therefore vied the benefit of the season; and by disposing his Armie into many Garrisons hindered the Enemye, from doing any great exploit before Winter. So the very length of way, and the time of the yeare, caused SCIPIO to returne backe: without any other matter performed, than that his Brother L. SCIPIO tooke by assault the Towne of ORITAGO.

Against the next yeares danger, ASDRUBAL prepared a great Armie: and syled nor coast, nor traualle, in strengthening himselfe, for the trial of his last fortune in Spaine. With seuentie thousand foot, foure thousand horse, and two and thirtie Elephants, he tooke the field: which number I beleue that hee could hardly haue raised, without boldly denying the truth of those reports that came from Italie. SCIPIO thought his Roman Legions too weak to encounter with such a multitude. Wherefore hee judged it needfull to vse the helpe of his Spanish friends. But the death of his Father and Vnde, that were cast away by the treason of such fickle Auxiliaries; made him on the other side very doubtful, of relying vpon those, that might perhaps betray him in his greatest neede. Yet since one GELCHER, that was Lord of eight and twentie Townes, had promised him the last Winter, to raise three thousand foot, and six hundred horse for his seruice: hee resolved to make vse of those, and some few others; that might helpe to make a shew; and yet not bee able to doe great harme, if they would reuolt. So with sixe and fortie thousand foot, and three thousand horse, he fought out the Enemye; neare to whom hee encamped. At his first comming, MAGO and MASINIUS fell vpon him; with hope to take him vnprepared, whilest hee was making his lodgings. But hee liued certaine troups of horse in covert: which breaking vpon them vnexpected; caused them to fill off. They made at first an orderly retreat: but being more hardly pressed, they shortly betooke themselves to plaine flight. After this encounter, which added some courage to the Romans, and abated the presumption of the Carthaginians: there were daily skirmishes betweene the horse, and light armature, on both sides; wherein was nothing done of importance. ASDRUBAL drew forth his Armie, and arranged it before his Trenches: the like did SCIPIO, each of them to shew that hee durst fight; yet not proceeding any further. Thus they continued many daies: ASDRUBAL being still the first that issued forth in the morning; and the first that in the evening, with-drew himselfe into his Trenches. The Spanish Auxiliaries, were placed on both sides in the wings; the Carthaginians were in the midle, with their Elephants before them; and opposite to these on the other side were the Roman Legions. When they had in this order confronted one another, though at farre distance, many daies together: it grew to be the common opinion, that they should shortly meet in the same forme; and be matched on each part, with the Enemyes, long before defended. But SCIPIO, when hee purposed indeede to fight, altered the forme of his Armie; and withall, came forth earlier then he had bene wont. Hee caused his men, and horses, to be well fed betimes in the morning before day: and then sent forth his horse and light armature, to traine out the Carthaginians with their bellies empty: vying here in the same trick, whereby he might remember, that HANNIBAL had beaten his father in the battaile of Trebia. His Roman Legions he bestowed in the wings; his Spaniards, in the battaile. Asdrubal sent forth his horse in all haste, to entertaine the Romans; whilst he himselfe arranged his men, in their wonted order, at the Hill foot, vpon which he incamped. In the skirmishes of the horse it could not be discerned which part had the better: since being over-pressed on either side, they had a safe retreat vnto their foot; and one troupe seconding another by course, returned to charge. This fight was protracted by Scipio to a great length: because his men, hauing well fed themselves, were like to hold out better than the Enemy. But about noone, he caused his wings to aduance a good pace; leaving their battaile of Spaniards rare behind them; that came on leisurely, according to direction. The Spanish Mercenaries that stood in Asdrubal's wings, were no way comparable, save only in number, to the Latin and Roman Souldiers, that came against them; for they were fresh Souldiers, leued in haste; and fighting only in respect of their pay. Being therefore charged in front by the Legions, and in flanke, at the same time, by the Roman Pedites, and by some cohorts, that were appointed to wheel about for the same purpose: they were sorely pressed; and with much difficultie made resistance. The Carthaginians would haue succoured them; but that they durst not stirre out of their places, because of the Spanish battaile which was coming against them; though it were as yet farre off. Thus the best part of Asdrubal's Armie stood idle; vntill the wings were broken. For, had he adu ventured to meet with the Spaniards; he must haue cutt himselfe into the open space that lay before him betweene the Roman wings: to the depth whereof when he had arrived, he should haue found himselfe inclosed in such sort, as was the Consul Paulus at the battaile of Cannæ. Wherefore hee did only employ his Elephants; which did, according to their manner, no greater harme to his Enemies; than to his Friends. When they were chafed with wounds, they could no longer be ruled by their guides: but ranne, as chance led them, and troubled both parts; or those perhaps the more, that were the more unwilling to kill them. In procelle of the fight: the Romans, who had well refreshed their bodies in the morning, endured luttie; when the others beganne to faint with trauell and heat of the day. Wherefore perceiuing their aduantage, they followed it the more hotly: and gaue not ouer, till they had forst the enemy to change his pace and runne from him. Asdrubal did his best to haue made an orderly retreat; and afterward againe, to haue caused his men turne head, at the Hill foot. But the Romans would not suffer the victorie to be so extorted from them: neither was it easie to put fresh courage into the vanquished; led by the obdurate passion of Rare which hearkens to no perswasion. The Campe of Asdrubal had that day bene taken; if a storme of raie, which fell violently on the suddaine, and bred some superstition in the Romans, had not caused them to giue ouer.

The same night, Asdrubal gaue no rest to his men: but caused them, hurgie, and ouer-laboured as they were, to take paines in fortifying the Campe; wherein hee feared to be assaulted. But little assurance could hee haue in the strength of his Trenches; when he had lost the hearts of his Spanish Souldiers. One Attianus, that was Lord of the Turdani, fled from him to the Romans, with a great Band of his Subjects: many followed this example; and soone after, two strong Townes were yielded vnto Scipio, and the Garrisons betrayed. It seemes that the peruerse fortune of this battaile, whereupon Asdrubal had set his rest, bred in the Spaniards a disposition, to beleue the more easily those reports which they heard from Italie. For henceforward, they neuer did good office to the Carthaginians. Asdrubal, perceiving this, with-drew himselfe, and marched away, faster than an ordinarie pace, toward the Ocean Sea. Scipio followed the next morning; and ouertaking the Carthaginians with his horse, caused them so often to make hand; that they were at length attached by the Roman Legions. Here beganne a cruell slaughter: for there was no resistance made, but all fell to rout, save only seuen thousand, that with Asdrubal himselfe recovered a very strong peece of ground, which they fortified in haste.

This

This place he made shift awhile to defend: but wanting there necessities to sustaine himselfe long, he was forsaken by some of those few, that continued hitherto partakers of his fortune. Wherefore he resolved to make shift for one; and stealing from his Companie by night away to the Sea-side, that was not farre thence; hee tooke shipping, and set saile for Gades. When Scipio vnderstood that Asdrubal was thus gone: he left Syllanus with ten thousand foot and a thousand horse to besedge their Campe (which was not taken in haste, for Mago and Masaniassa staid in it) whilst he with the rest of the Armie did what was needfull in the Countrie abroad. It was not long, ere Mago and Masaniassa followed Asdrubal to Gades; and their Armie dispersed it selfe; some flying ouer to the Romans; other taking what way they liked. So vpon all the Continent of Spaine, there were only three Townes left, Iliturgi, Castulo, and Aslapa, that made countenance of warre against the Romans: of which only Castulo had in it a Carthaginian Garrison; consisting of such as had saved themselves by flight, in the late ouerthrows. Hereby it seemes, that the report of those Hilitorians was ill grounded, who said, that Castulo yielded long since vnto the Romans; though Hannibal tooke a wife in that Citie. For this was one of the last three Townes that held out, on the Carthaginian side. Iliturgi had sometimes bene indelible to the Romans; if not altogether at their deuotion. Yet after the death of the two elder Scipios, following tooo earnestly the Carthaginian fortune; it not only rebelled; but with great cruetie betrayed, and flue, the poore men that escaped thither from the ouerthrows. Aslapa was a Towne, that had still adhered to the Carthaginians; and, which was worse, had driuen by spoile of the Romans and their Confederates. Wherefore (though not vntill the next year) Scipio went against these, and tooke himselfe Iliturgi and Castulo; Iliturgi by assault, and with a general slaughter of the Inhabitants; Castulo, by treason of one Cerdubellus. Aslapa was taken by Lucius Marcius; or rather destroyed by the Inhabitants. For a great pile of wood was raised in the Market-place: whereinto was throwne all the gold, and silver, with whatsoever else was precious; the women and children standing by it vnder a foreguard; that should kill and burne them if the Romans got into the Towne. This prouision being made: all the Inhabitants that could beare armes, rushed forth desperately: and fell vpon the Roman campe, where striving beyond their power, they were euerie one slaine. Then was the Towne forth-with set on fire, by those that had taken charge to do it: and many of the Romans consumed with the flame; whilst they rushed ouer-hastily to catch the gold, and silver, which they saw lying on the pile ready to melt.

Asdrubal, being beaten into the Island of Gades, found no cause of long stay there: but returned home to Carthage, with seuen Gallies; leaving Mago behinde him, to wait vpon occasion, if any should be offered. Hee visited in his way home, Syphax King of the Masassili, a people of the Numidians; hoping to winne him to the friendship of the Carthaginians. But he met with Scipio, as it were with his euill Angel, in the Kings Port: who, landing at the same time, carried Syphax quite another way. For Scipio, hauing driuen the Carthaginians out of Spaine, did forth-with bethinke himselfe, how to finish the warre; by putting them to the like distresse in Affrike. Hercunto it seemed, that the helpe of Syphax would be much auailable: a King that had many times fallen out with the Carthaginians, and sustained much hurt by their procurement; of which in all likelihood he might easily be moued to seeke reuenge. He had also bene beholding to P. and Cn. Scipio, that sent him ouer a Capitaine into Affike; who instructed him so well in marshalling his forces, as he thereby often became victorious. Vpon these reasons the Numidian King Embassadours to Rome, and made league with the Citie, in a time of great contentitie. So that hereby P. Scipio conceived hope of laying a good foundation to the warre, which he intended in Affike; vpon the friendship of this ill Neighbour to the Carthaginians. For which cause he sent ouer C. Lelius his Embassadour, to deale with Syphax: who declaring that the Carthaginians did very ill in Italie, and had nothing now at all to doe in Spaine; easily perswaded the King to take part with those that had the better, and were without question his better friends. Only Syphax requested, that the Roman Generall should visit him in person, to conclude the League; by which hee was to enter into conditions of more importance, than in any former Treatie. Here to Scipio condescended; thinking the friendship of so great a King, that was neighbour to Carthage, and not farre distant from Spaine, well worthe of the adventure. So with two Quinquereme Gallies he tooke Sea: and arrived in the Kings Port, at the same time, with Ajdrabal. This would have beene very dangerous to him, had hee beene disliked by his Enemies further at Sea: but in the Haven, they forbore to make offer vpon the other. Syphax might well be proud; seeing at one time, two such Captaines of two most powerfull Cities, came to desire his friendship. Hee would have brought them to treat of peace: but the Roman excused himselfe, by want of such commission from the Senate. He feasted them together: and shortly dismissed Scipio, with whom he readily entred into couenant; which in time of performance, he as readily brake.

Funerall games held by Scipio. A duell betwene two Spanish Princes.
A digression, concerning Duells.

Scipio returning into Spaine, and resting that winter, tooke vengeance the next year, vpon those of Miturgi, Casulo, and Assapa, as hath bene said before. The Conquest of the Countrie being then in a manner at an end: hee performed at new Carthage, with great solemnitie, some Vowes that he had made; and honoured the memorie of his Father, and Vncle, with funerall games, especially of those that fought at sharpe, according to the manner of the times. Neither was it needfull, that he should trouble himselfe with preparing flaures for that spectacle, to hazard their liues, as was vied in the Citie of Rome: for there were enough, that either offered themselves as voluntaries, or were sent from their Princes; to giue proofe in single combat, of the valour that was in their severall Countreies. Some also there were, that being in contention, which they could not, or would not otherwise end, agreed to referre the decision of their Controversies, to triall of the sword, in single fight. Among these, the most eminent, were, Curbis, and Orfus, Colco-germans: that contended for the principalltie of a Towne called Ibes. Corbus was the elder, and the elder brothers sonne: wherefore he claimed the Lordship, as eldest of the house; after the manner of our Irish Tamhrie. But the father of Orfus stood lately seized of the Principalltie: which though himselfe received by the death of his elder brother; yet this his sonne would not let it goe back; but claimed to hold it as heire vnto his father, and old enough to rule. Faine would Scipio haue compounded the matter. But they answered peremptorily, That all their friends, and kindred, had already laboured in vaine, to take vp that quarrell; and that neither God, nor Man, but only Mars, their God of battaile, should be Vmpire between them. So they had their wills: and the elder, who was also the stronger, and more skilfull at his weapon, easily vanquished the foole-hardie of the younger.

Such combats haue bene very ancient; and perhaps more ancient, than any other kinde of fight. We reade of many performed before the Warre of Troy, by Thesens, Heroules, Pollux, and others: as also of two at the Warre of Troy, the one betwene Paris and Meneleus; the other, betwene Hector and Aias. Neither want there examples of them among the Ibbernes; whereof that betwene David and Goliath; and others performed by some of *David*s Worthies, against those that challenged them; are greatly celebrated. Vnto the same kinde appertaines the fight, betwene twelue of the Tribe of Juda, and as many of the Bemamites. The Romans had had many of them: whereof that was principall, in which they ventured their Dominion vpon the heads of three brethren the Horatys, against the three brethren Curiatys that were Albans. The combat of Manlius Torquatus; and shortly after, of Valerius Catullinus with two Champions of the Gauls, which challenged any Roman; were of little importance, as hauing only reference to brauerie. In England there was a great combat fought, betwene Edmond Ironside and Cannus the Dane, for no lesse than the Kingdome. The vse of them was very frequent in the Saxon-times; almost vpon every occasion, great or small. In the reign of Edmarth the third, who sustained the pactie of Montfort against the Earle of Blouys, contending for the Duchie of Britaine; there was a fight, for honour of the Nations, betwene thirtie of the Britans, and thirtie English: two of which English, were Chawlerie a braue Captaine; and that Sir Robert Knolles, who afterwards became a renowned Commander in the French warres, and did highly honour his blood, whereof the Lord Knolles is descended. It were infinite to reckon the examples of the like, found in English, French, and Italian Histories. Most of them haue bene combats of brauerie, and of gaye discourse, as the French terme it; for honor of severall Nations; for loue of Mitcellies; or whatsoever else gaue occasion vnto men, desirous to set out them selves. But besides those of this sort, there are two other natures of combats, which are, either vpon accusation for life; or vpon triall of Title and Inheritance, as in Writ of right. And of this latter kinde, was that, of which wee spake euen now, betwene Corbus and Orfus; Vnto these (methinkes) may be added, as of different condition from the rest, the combat vpon Wager; such as were that betwene David and Goliath; or that betwene the Horatys and Curiatys; in which, without regard of Title, the Dominion of Nations, one ouer the other, is aduentured vpon the head of Champions. Vpon an accusation for life; there was a combat appointed betwene the Lord Henric of Beulinbrooke Duke of Hereford, and Mowbray Duke of Norfolke. There was a combat performed by Sir John Ashley and one Cattrington: whom Ashley charged with treason; and proved it vpon him, by being victorious. The like was fought betwene Robert of Montfort and Henric of Essex. The like also, betwene a Nauarra and one Welch of Grimby, whom the Nauarra accused of treason: but, being beaten in fight, confessed that hee had belied him; and was therefore drawne and hanged. Whether our triall by battaile doe determine, that the false accuser, if he be vanquished, shall suffer the punishment which had bene due to the offender, if the accusation had bene proved; I cannot affirme. But we euenly where finde, That if he which is accused of treason, or, according to the customes of Normandie, of Murder, Rape, or burning of Places (offences punished by death) bee ouercome, He shall suffer the paines appointed for those crimes. In combats for triall of right, it is not so: neither is the Appellant or Defendant bound to fight in person, but hee may trie it by his Champion; as did Paramor and Lowe, or offered to doe, in the raigne of Queene Elizabeth. And in this case, he that is beaten, or yeeldeth, loseth only his caule, not his life. Neither are the combats, vpon accusation, or triall of right, fought in open field, as are those of brauerie; but in compe close, that is, within railes. Now this triall by combat was so ordinarie in France, before the time of St. Lewes, and Philip the faire his grand-child, as eueny Lord of Fee, Ecclesiastical or Temporal, had power to grant it within his owne Iurisdiction. And it seemeth that the French Kings, and other Lords, made their profit hereby. For in the Memorialls of the Chamber of Accounts, is found an Article to this effect: That if a combat were once accepted, and after, by consent of the Lord, were taken vp, each of the parties should pay two shillings sixe pence; but if it were performed, then should the partie vanquished forfeit an hundred and twelue shillings. And vpon this custome grew the French Prouerbe, which they vse when any man hath had an hard or vnjust judgement; saying, That hee was tried by the Law of Loray, or Berne; oule batta paye l'amende, where he that is beaten giues the recompence. Of these frequent trials by battaile, that great learned man Ysa. Bishop of Chartres, did often complain, and judge it, which can destroy it; except you will misse those Artes honourable, where the Hang-man gives the Garland. For, seeing the Lawes of this Land haue appointed the Hang-man to second the Conquerour; and the Lawes of God appointed the Death to second the conquered dying in malice; I say that he is both bafe, and a fool, that accepts of any Card to accompany. To this perchance it will be answered, That the Kings of England; and other Christian Kinges; haue seldome taken any such advantage ouer men of quality; who vpon euery termes haue slaine their priuate enemies. It is true, that as enemies of trouble and combustion they haue not often done it; so did our Noble men and Gentlemen in former ages, in all important injuries, sue vnto the King; to appeale themselves by battaile and publique combat. For as they durst not to break the Law; so did they disdain to submit themselves to the shameful reuenge thereof; the same reuenge (because it detesteth murder) that it hath declared against a common Cut-purse or other Theeues. Nay let it be granted that a pardon bee procured for such offenders; Yet is not the Manslayer freed by his pardon. For these two remedies hath the partie grieved notwithstanding; that is, to require iustice by Grand Assize, or by battaile, vpon his appeale, which (saith Sir Thomas Smith) is not denied; and he further saith (for I vie his owne wordes) That if the Defendant (to win the Manslayer) be convinced either by Great Assize or by Battaille, vpon that appeale, the Manslayer shall die, notwithstanding the Princes pardon. So honourable (saith the same learned Gentleman) are our Princes, and the law of our Realme, to iustice, and to the punishment of blood violently shed. It may further be demanded, how our Noble men and Gentlemen shall be repaired in honour, where an enemy, taking the first either in wordes or blowes, shall lay on such an infinite and insufferable hurt. I saye therefore, that the Court will easily give satisfaction in both. And if we hold it no dishonour to submit our selues for the recouerie of our Debts, Goods, and Lands; and for all things else, by which the liues of our selues, our wives, and children, are sustained; to the Iudges of the Law; because it may bee seelid; to take by violence such that which is our owne; why should we submit our selues to the Iudges of honour in case of honour, because to recover our reputation by force, may be murder? But yet againe it may be objected, That the best of honour ought to be more fearefull vnto vs, than either the losse of our goods, of our lands, of our liues, and I say so too. But what is this honour, I meane honour indeede, and that which ought to bee so deare vnto vs, other than a kinde of historic, or some following actions of vertue, actions accompanied with difficultie or danger, and vnder-taken for the publike good? In these he that is imploied and trusted, if he faile in the performance, either through cowardize, or any other base affliction, it is true that he looeth his honor. But the acting of a priuate combat, for a priuate respect, and most commonly a frivolous one, is not an action of vertue, because it is contrary to the law of God, and of all Christian Kinges; neither is it difficult, because euen and equal in persons and armes: Neither for a publike good, but tending to the contrary; because the losse or mutilation of an able man, is also a losse to the Common-wealth.

Now that a Marshall of England hath power to give euery mans fame and reputation, as fame as reputation may sustaine iniurie by wordes, I thinke no man doubteth. For to repent vs of any ill wordes that we haue giuen, and to confess that we haue done him wrong to whom we haue giuen them, is a sufficient satisfaction; and as it may fall out, more than sufficient. For hee that giues ill wordes in choller, and suddenly denies them, or repents himselfe of them vpon aduicement; hath the disadvantage in point of reputation. Concerning blowes, which are indeede not to be giuen butto those that are ferule, whether sufficient recompence will be made for them, it shall appeare by a notable example of a most worthy Gentleman Monsieur du Plessis, that was stricken in France not long since by a Baron of the same Nation. The satisfaction which was giuen him by a iudgement of the Constable and Marshalls of France, was this. In the open Court, wherein the Constable gaue iudgement, ment, M. de Plessis was set in a chaire vnder the degrees where the Constable and Marshalls sat: the Baron, who had giuen him the blow, did kneele before him on both his knees, holding in his right hand a sword with the point towards himselfe, and in his left hand the like cudgell or battinado, wherewith he had stricken M. de Plessis; both which weapons he deliuered into Plessis hands, submitting himselfe to such reuenge, as it should please him to take with either of those weapons; the Constable and Marshalls hauing formerly left it to the will of Plessis to vie his owne discretion in the reuenge of his owne wrongs. Now whether the Baron had reason to please himselfe, as one before hand in point of honour, who struck M. de Plessis, like a Russian comming behinde him, and (hauing aduantage of companie, and his horses readie) shifted himselfe away on the suddaine, but being afterward taken, was taught to repent himselfe in this shamefull manner; Or whether Monsieur de Plessis (of whose valour no man doubted) had not farre iusser cause to rest satisfied, since he might at his pleasure haue beaten or wounded his enemy, but forgave him; let any wise man iudge. To this if it be said, That the Baron was constrained to make his submission; that his repentance was enforced and not voluntarie; and therefore no disgrace vnto him: I answer, that one may say as well, that it is no disgrace to a Theefe, when he is brought to the Gallows to repent him of the Robberies by him committed, because his repentance also is constrained. And it is true, that enforced repentance is no disgrace in respect of the force, but in respect of the fact: which (but for our finnes to God) makes all repentance shamefull; because all forced repentance is inflicted vpon vs for somewhat vnworthie of a Gentleman and of an honest man. Nay voluntarie repentance is selfe, as it hath relation to men, ariseth either out of the feare of the ill that may befall vs, or out of the acknowledgement of our owne weaknesse. Certainly, as wise men, and valiant men, doe rather deride pettie iniuries or suddaine iniuries, that are not offered from malice forethought, then reuenge them: so men, apt to quarrell, doe commonly suspect their owne valour; and rather desire, that thereby the world should beluee them to be of great daring, than know any such resolution in themselves. For he that knowes himselfe indeede to be a valiant man, scornes to hunt after the opinion.

Now the same power which the Constable and Marshalls of France haue, hath also a Marshall of England, or his Deputies; by whose iudgement, in all disputes of honour, euery mans reputation may be preferred; we may therefore as well submit our selues to the Iudges of honour in all disputes of honour, as we doe submit our selues in all controuersies of liuelihood and life to the Iudges of the Law. And, out of doubt, the institution of this Court of Chaucerie in England, in France, and elsewhere; was no lesse charitable than politike. For the blood of man, violently spilt, doth not bring forth honie-bees, as that of Bulls doth, which ling by the fingers or the face: but it produceth that monstrous Beast, Reuenge, which hath hung to death, and eaten vp of severall Nations, so many noble personages; as there is nothing more lamentable, nor more threatening the wrath of God vpon supreme Governours, than the permission.

His Majestie therefore (which Henrie the fourth of France also endeoured) hath done a most Kingly and Christian-like deede in Scotland, which the most renowned of all his Predecessours could neuer doe: in beating downe, and extinguishing, that hereditarie prosecution of malice, called the deadly feud; a conquest, which shall giue him the honour of Prudence and Kingly power, for euer more. And we haue cause to hope, that his royall care shall be no lesse happie in preventing the like mischief, which threatens England, by the audacious, common, and braue, yet outrageous vanitie of Duellists.

Vnto this that I haue spoken of lying, and of man-slaughter, it must be added, That each of these are of great Latitude, and worthe of reproofe and vengeance proportionally, more or lesse, in their severall degrees. There is much difference betweene Lies of necessitie vpon breach of promise, or complementall lies; and such such pernicious lies, as proceed from feare and cowardize, or are uttered by false witnesses: the former sort, being excusable by weaknesse or leuitie; the latter, being altogether detestable. No lesse, if not more, difference there is, betwene killing of a man in open field, with euen weapons; and that killing, which the Scriptures call killing by guile, dolo or perfidias; though our Lawes doe not much distinguish them in punishment. For in the latter, God, forsaking his owne priuiledge, commandeth, that the guilefull murderer bee drawne by force, from the protection of his Altar. Neither is euery guilefull murder performed by the sword, nor by ouert violence: but there is a guilefull murder also, by poisoning; and by the pen, or by practise. For such distinction is found, betwene committing presumptuously vpon a man, to slay him with guile; and lying in wait for blood, primarily for the innocent, without a cause, vpon hope of spoile, after such manner as the net is spread before the eyes of the birds. Francis the first, Queene Marie of England, and the Kings Majestie now reigning, haue giuen notable testimonie of their iustice, vpon three Noble men, who committed guilefull murder. Of the first kinde, King Francis vpon the Lord of Talar: who being (saith the French Historian) de haute & ancienne lignee, & supporte de plusieurs grandes alliances, who being of high and ancient lineage, and supported by diuers great alliances; of which the Cardinal of Belay (in especiall fauour with the King) was one, was notwithstanding deliuered ouer into the handes of the Hang-man. Queene Marie, vpon a noble man of her owne Religion, and in many other respects very deare vnto her. His Majestie, vpon a Baron of Scotland; whose house was no lesse ancient and faithfull, than himselfe valiant, and greatly friended both at home and abroad. Of killing guilefully by poison, and of punishment following such wicked Artificians; euery Age hath had too many examples. Of guilefull killing by the pen (that I may not speake of any English Judge) the Authour of the French Recherches giues vs two notable instances: the one of des Eshars, who (saith Pasquiere) fit mourir Montaigu grand Maistre de France, pour contenter l'opinion de celui dont il estoit lors idolatre; & Dieu permit que depuis il fut pendu & estranglé; Who caused Montaigu great Master of France to die, to content his minde (to wit, the Duke of Burgoyne) whom at that time Eshars worshipped as his Idol: but God permitted, that he himselfe was soone after hanged and strangled. The other was of the Great Francis the first, vpon his Chancellor Poyet: who, to satisfie the Kings passion, practised the destruction of the Admirall Chabot, a man most nobly defended, and of great seruice. For as in other men, so in Kings, the passion of loue grows old, and weares out by time. So the Kings affection being changed towards the Admirall, hee charged him with some offences which hee had formerly committed. The Admirall, presuming vpon the great good seruice which hee had done the King in Piemont, and in the defence of Marsailles against the Emperour; gaue the King other language than became him; and desired nothing so much, as a publike triall. Hereupon the King (it being easie to prouoke an ill disposition) gaue commission to the Chancellor, as President, and other Iudges, vpon an information of the Kings Advocate, to question the Admiralls life. The Chancellor, an ambitious man, and of a large conscience, (which is rare in men towards the Law) hoping highly to content the King; wrought with some of the Iudges with so great cunning; with others, with so sharpe threats; and with the rest, with so faire promises; as, albeit nothing could be proued against the Admirall, wortbie of the Kings displeasure; yet the Chancellor subscribed, and got others to subscribe, to the forfeiture of his Estate, Offices, and Libertie; though not able to proueaile against his life. But what was the Chancellors reward (the King hating fallshood in fo great a Magistrate) other than his owne degradation, arraignment, and condemnation? Bellegon certe! (saith Pasquiere) à tout iuge pour demeurer tousiours enioy, & ne laisser fléchir sa conscience dedans les vagues d'une imagination fautive, qui pour son deieu se submerge; A faire lesson to all Iudges, to dwell alwaies in themselves, and not to suffer their consciences to float vpon the waves of Imaginarie fauour, which in the end ouerwhelmes them. And as for the Admirall: though it might haue bene answered

The last Acts of Scipio in Spain. His returne to Rome where he is chosen Consul.

THE last businesse that troubled Scipio in Spain, grew by the rebellion of the People, and mutinie of his Souldiers. He fell dangerously sick, in such sort, that the humor of his death ranne currans throughout Spain. This encouraged Mandonius and Indibilis, pettie Kings, that had forsaken the Carthaginians, and followed Scipio awhile before, to take armes against the Romans. They were vainly perswaded, that after the Carthaginians were driuen out, they themselves should become the mightiest in all Spain. But seeing now, that things were no way answerable to the greatnesse of their hopes; they thought it best, to take the present advantage, and hammer out their owne fortunes. So they rashly fell vpon the Messinians and Sedetanians, Confederates of the Romans; and waited their Countre. Part of the Roman Armie lying at Suero, in stead of making head against the Rebels, grew to be afflicted with the like distemper. They had not reaped such profit of their Roman conquests, as might satisfie their desires; or as they thought ealie to bee gotten, if they might betheir owne Caruers. Wherefore, when the death of Scipio was reported: they thought, that the time serued very well, to enrich themselves with spoile of the Countre. Many outrages they committed; and which was greatest of all, driving away their Colonells, that should haue bridled their furie; they chose out of their owne number two base fellows, Albin Colenus, and Arrius Pobor, to their Commanders. These tooke vpon them all the Ensignes of Proconsuls, or Proprætores; as if this their election had bene like to that, wherein Lucius Martius was chosen by the Souldiers, after the death of the two Scipios. But while they were devising, what exploits they might doe, for the enriching of themselves; in a time of such combustion, as was expected; there arriued more certaine news, that Scipio was both aliue, and in good health. There came also new Colonells, sent vnto them from their Generall; who mildly rebuking their want of consideration, and seeming to bee glad that they had no further ouer-shot themselves; led them to Carthagen, there to receive their pay. Before their coming, Scipio had refused to doe exemplarie iustice on the principal offenders; and to put the whole multitude of them in feare, of what they had defruded. Therefore hee caused Syllanus to make readie the Companies which lay before in the Towne, as it were to make an Expedition against Mandonius, and Indibilis. He caused Albin and Arrius with some thirtie other of their Complices, to be secretly apprehended in their lodgings. He called the Muriners to assembly; and hauing them vnarmed as they were, encircled round by Syllanus and his Companies, prepared for the purpose; hee bitterly inueighed against them all, as Traitors. This done; Albin, and Arrius, with the other prisoners, were haled to the stake; where they were whipt, and beheaded, as was the Roman custome toward such offenders. The rest of the Souldiers, to the number of eight thousand, were caused to take their oath of obedience anew; and received euery man his pay when hee was fworne.

Mandonius, and Indibilis continued in armes; notwithstanding that they had certaine word of Scipio his life and health. Well they could haue bene contented to be quiet: but by the seueritie vsed to the Roman Souldiers; they stood in feare, as being Spaniards, and greater offenders, of harder measure. Scipio went against them; and found them in a Valley, that was scarce large enough to hold all their Armie, in the entrance thereof hee fought with them: and sending Laelius with all his horseto fetch a compalle about the Hills, and charge them in reare, he ouerthrew them. Indibilis and Mandonius had after this no hope remaying, to preferue themselves and their estates, otherwise than by making submission. Mandonius therefore came to Scipio: and humbly crauing pardon, both for himselfe, and for his brother Indibilis, obtained his request: yet so, that they were taught to acknowledge themselves lesse free Princes, then they formerly had beene.

Afterward Scipio went toward Gades: and was met on the way by Masunissa; who secretly promised to doe him all seruice, if the People of Rome would send him to make Warre in Africk. Vnto Mago that lay in Gades, came directions from Carthage; that letting all care of Spaine alone, he should thence depart with his fleet into Italie; and there wage an Armie of Gauls, and Ligurians, to joyne with Hannibal. For this purpose, was monie sent vnto him from Carthage; and he himselfe laid hold vpon all that he could finde in the Towne of Gades; without sparing either private men, the common treasure, or the Temples. In his voiage thence, hee landed at Carthage: hoping to haue taken it by surpris. But hee failed in the attempt; and was so beaten to his ships, that he returned back to repose himselfe awhile at Gades. The Gaditanes, offended with the robberies and spoile that hee had made at his taking leaue of them, would not suffer him to enter againe into their Citie. By this hee foresaw, that it would not bee long ere they became Roman. Wherefore sending Messengers into the Towne, to complaine of this vncourteous dealing, hee alured their Magistrates forth vnto him; whom, notwithstanding all the excuse that they could make, he whipt, and crucified. This done, he followed his former intended voiage, bidding Spaine farewell for euer.

The Isteand Citie of Gades, was yeelded to the Romans, presently after the departure of Mago. Then did Scipio deliuer vp the Prouince, to those that were sent from Rome to succcede him therein: and himselfe with ten ships returned home. At his comming to Rome he made suite for the honour of a triumph. But it was denied him: for that it had as yet bene granted vnto no Proconsul; excepting to such, as receiued that dignitie after a Consullship, as it were by prorogation. But to make amends for this repulse: the election of new Consuls being then in hand, by general voice of the Citie P. Cornelius Scipio was chosen Consul, and P. Licinius Crassus joyned with him. This Crassus, being high Priest, or Bishop of the Romans; might not, by the custome of those times, goe farre from the Citie; as being to hinder the matters of their superstition: though Cesar, and others, who in ages following held the same Office; were slayed by no such religious impediment, from being farre, and long absent. Hereby it came to passe, that Scipio desiring to haue the Warre transferred into Africk, was in no danger to loose that honourable charge, by any mischance of lot, in the diuision of Prouinces; for that his Colleague was not capable of employment so farre off.

Scipio obtaines leave to make warre in Africk. His preparations. Of Masunissa who joyned with Scipio. The victories against Asdrubal and Syrphax.

RV. Cornelius Scipio, and P. Licinius Crassus, entering into their Consullship, held a meeting of the Senate in the Capitol: wherein it was decreed, that Scipio should bee allowed, to bestow part of the monie which he had brought out of Spaine into the treasure; vpon the setting forth of solemne plates, that he had vowed to make, whilest he was busied in his Spanish warres. This helped well to reuiue the memorie of his victories already gotten; and to giue hope vnto the People of greater victories in the warre, which he intended to make in Africk. To the same purpose, did the Spanish embassages auail much in the Senate, especially that of the Saguntines: who magnified his actions, highly and deferuently; saying, That they were the most happie of all their Countie men, since they being present, had seene him chosen Consul, and should carrie home such joyfull newes. The Saguntine Embassadors, were louingly entertained by the Senate; as their faith to Rome, though costly it were both to them, and to the Romans, had well defrured. Neuertheless, when Scipio proposed, that Africk might be decreed vnto him for his Prouince: there wanted not many, euen of the principall men, that vehemently gainesaid him. Of these was Q. Fabius Maximus the chiefe: who seemes to haue been troubled with that diffidence; which too often causeth men renowned for long approved vertue, to looke asquint vpon the actions of those, that follow them in the same kinde. Hee alleged many reasons against the purpose of the Consul: whereof the chiefe were, That the treasure was unable to sustaine the charges of a warre in Africk; and that it was extremely perillous to hazard so great forces, where they could not at pleasure be recalled, vnto the defence of Italy itselfe, if neede required. Hereunto he added many wordes concerning the danger wherein Italy stood, not only of Hannibal, but of Masunissa his brother, that was arming the Liguians: as also concerning the honour of the Consul; which would (he said) be greater in setting Italy free from enemies, than it could be in doing any harme to Africk. Neither did hee forget, both to eulcate the Spanish warres, as of lesse moment than the intended voiage against Carthage; nor withall to lay great blame vpon Scipio, for hauing suffered Asdrubal to passe into Italy: shewing, that it was greatly to be feared, least the like might happen againe; and that a new Armie, notwithstanding the good successe of Scipio (if it hapned to be good) might be sent from Carthage, to the vtter endangering of Rome, whilst the Roman forces were employed abroad. But the maine point which hee vrged, was, That neither the Senate had ordained, nor the People commanded, Africk to be that yeare a Prouince: which the Consul neuertheless propounded in such wise, as if it were a matter already concluded, and no longer to be argued. Scipio on the other side, insisted vpon this one point; That it was better to make an offensiuus, than a defensiuus warre: especially against such as the Carthaginians; who being ill prouided of able men at home, did furnish themselves by helpe of monie, with leues made abroad. As for the care of Italy, he doubted not, but P. Licinius his Colleague, would bee as well able to discharge it now, as others had done in times of greater danger. So promising to draw Hannibal into Africk, for defence of his owne home; and taxing as civilly as he could, the enuie of Fabius, which withstood such a gallant enterprize; hee proposed the matter againe vnto the Senate. Much altercation there was about the manner of his proceeding: forasmuch as it was noised abroad, that if hee could not bring the Senate to his minde, he would carrie it by the People. This offended many of the Ancients: who reſented in this honorable man a little spice of that arrogancie, which in following ages, grew to be much hotter in those that had commanded long abroad. But in conclusion, Scipio referred himselfe wholly vnto the Senates

good will and pleasure; whereby hee obtained thus much, That the life of Scipio might be appointed vnto him for his Prouince; with leaue to passe ouer into Africk, if he found it expedient.

Want of monie, and no great liking to his voiage, made the Roman Senate haue little care to furnish out Scipio to the warre, by him intended vpon Africke. Here withall it fell out, that Atago, comming on the suddaine from the Baleares to Genoa, and winning the Towne, bred a feare of no lesse terrible inuasion vpon Italia, than that which Asdrubal had lately made. He could not indeede raise any great Armie of the Ligurians; for that he found them distracted with ciuill warres. T herefore he was driuen to make choice of his partie; and to helpe those whom hee thought fit: 10
telt for his turne, against the others. This troublesome businesse, though it occupied more of his time, than he could willingly haue spared: yet it got him reputation by his victories; and made the vntreadie Gauls readie to enter into his pay. Hereupon the dispersed Legions of the Romans, that vnder Proconsuls, and Pretors, lay readie to be employed where need should require; were directed vnto the borders of Lombardie, and Liguria, there to make head against Atago. But all his menaces passed away in vapour. For a fleet, either comming to his aide from Carthage, or by him sent thither (the report is vncertaine) laden with the bootie that hee had taken; fell into the hands of the Roman Pretor, that gouerned in Sardinia. This did much disa- 20 ble him: and though after a while, there came letters from Carthage, together with store of monie, heartning him in his proceedings; yet some impediments which he found, and that fatall voiage of Scipio into Africk, disturbed all; and made him bee recalled home.

Against Hannibal, was nothing done this yeare. Neither was any thing done by him, of which the Roman Historians haue bene pleased to take notice. Only it is said, that he spent the sommer by the Temple of Iuno Lacinia, where hee raised an Altar, with a huge Title of all that he had performed, grauen in Punike, and Greeke letters. Such account of winnings past, is commonly in Gamblers that are at the height of their fortune, a cause of remission, and carelesse; in those that are vpon the looting hand, a cause both of the fame for the present, and shortly after of dejection, when they finde a notable change. A great pestilence infecting both the Carthaginians, and the Roman Campe, is said to haue bene the occasion of this yeares idleness: which fell not out much amisse for the Citie of Rome; that was maru- 30 lously empowdered by this warre; and had already tried the vtmost way to destroy the charges, which grew insupportable. To relieve the present needfull, it was well thought vpon, that a great part of Campania (not many yeares since confiscated) should bee sold, or let out: in which bargain, that the Citie might receiue no losse; the tenth part of the fine was ordained as a reward, vnto the detectors of lands concealed.

Of this, or other monie, none was giuen to Scipio. Neither was hee allowed to make preise of Souldiers for his African voya; neither did hee ouer-much labour to obtaine it. That which the Senate refused, the People did for him: or rather they did it for themselves; that were therein wiser than the Senate. It is vially found in Councils of estate; that the bulie, or obstinate heads of a few, doe car- 40
rie all the rest. And many times, men make a surrender of their owne iudgements, to the wisdom that hath gotten it selfe a name, by giuing happie direction in troubles for estate. Therefore, hee that respects himselfe vpon the aduice of many, shall often finde him selfe decieved: the counsaile of those many being vniuersally directed by the emper of a few, that ouer-sway the rest. Q. Fabius was accounted the Oracle of his time: for his warie nature sorted well with the businesse, 50 that fell out in the chiefe of his employment. Vnto him therefore Q. Fabius adhered, with other of the Senators, that were growne old in following one course; from which they could not shift, as the change of times required. But the People (who though they could not well aduise, and deliberate, yet could well apprehend) embraced the needfull resolution of Scipio: in such sort, that besides his Roman forces, he had from diuers parts of Italia about seuen thousand Voluntaries. He had also prouision from the seuerall Townes; Corne, Iron, Canuas for sailes, Axes, Bedde-hooks, Hand-mills, and the like implements. Firre for building of ships, many thousands of Targets, Helms, and Spears of all kinds: euery place furnishing him with that commoditie, which it beitt could afford. Vnto this willingness of the People, the diligence of Scipio was correspondent. In the compasse of five and fortie daies, he had both feld his Timber; built, and lanchd, twentie 10

Triemes, and ten Quinquereme Gallies; wherewith hee transported his Armie into Sicily. In Sicily he found, besides other forces, two Legions, that had serued at Canna: which were old Souldiers, and (as hee himselfe well knew) not guiltie of the ouerthrow; for which they had long vnder-gone a heauie censure. They had serued vnder Marcellus, and Launius; at the taking of many Citie, and strong peeces: in which regard, they were like to bee of good vse to him in Africk; where would bee store of such employment. For increasing the number of his horse, hee pressed three hundred Sicilians, all wealthie yong men, and such as loued well their ease. These he afterward discharged from the Warre, highly to their contentment: but with condition, that they should deliuer their Horle and Armes, to as many Roman Gentlemen; which hee brought ouer with him for the purpose. Whilste hee 20 was prouiding, to haue things in a readinesse for Africk; the banished Locrians that followed the Roman side, made him acquainted with an intelligence, whereby they hoped to recouer their Citie. Some handicrafts men, that wrought for the Carthaginians in one of the Citadells of Locri (for there were two in the Towne) being taken prisoners by the Romans, promised to betray the place, if they might be ransomd, and rewarded. Scipio being aduertised of this, gaue order to haue the attempt made by night: which happily succeded; and that Citadell was surpris- 30
ed. The other Citadell was strongly defended by the Carthaginian Garrison: which sent to Hannibal for aide. The Romans in like sort, fearing least their owne paucitie, should make them too weake for Hannibal, craued helpe of the Consul Scipio. The Townesmen, were doubtfully affected: but the best, and most of them inclining to the Romans, kept Hannibal out; whom the coming of Scipio caused thence to depart; and caused likewise the Carthaginian Garrison to abandon the other Citadell. Many outrages were committed by the Roman Souldiers, that were left by Scipio in custodie of the Towne. Wherefore a vehement complaint was made by the Lo- 40 crians vnto the Roman Senate; not only against those of the Garrison, but much more against Pleminius the Captaine, who gaue bad example; and was worse than all the rest. Besides many Murders, Robberies, Rapes, and other Villanies; the Temple of Proserpina, that had a great fame of sanctitie, was spoiled by these barbarous Theeues. The Locrians therefore aduised the Senate, to make present a- 50 mends to the Goddesse for this sacriledge: saying, that the like had neuer been committed, without notorious vengeance by her taken vpon the Authors. The Senate gaue good eare to this complaint; comforted the Locrians, and redressed their injuries done vnto them; sent for Pleminius, with other principall offenders, whom they callt into prison, and vied according to their deserts: as also they restored vnto Proserpina her monie twice told. But old Q. Fabius was not herewithall contented. He laid much of the blame vpon Scipio, that had placed such a man in Locri, and had not carefully hearkned to the complaints made against him, but suffered him to runne on in these his wicked courses. By the sharp inuestiue that Fabius made, others tooke courage to speake what they pleased: as well against the demeanor of Scipio as against 60 the dilolucence of his Armie; which lay, as they said, idle in Sicily, neither mindfull of any seruice toward, nor fit for it if neede should require. Finally, things were so liuely vied, that ten Legates were sent ouer into Sicily, together with the Pretor appointed for that Iland; two of the Tribunes, and one of the Aediles; who should examine these matters; and either cause the General to returne into Italia, or con- 70

tinue him in his charge, as they thought fit. The end of all was: they found him so well prepared against Carthage, as that they haltned him on his journey; and gave him high commendations at their returne.

Scipio had already employed Lelius in Africa; rather to make discovery, than to worke any other great effect of warre. He tooke a great bootie: and struck no little terror into the Carthaginians; who law their affaires to bee vpon termes of change. But the greatest fruit of his journey was, that speaking with Masanissa, he well informed himse of the state of Africa; and knew what was to be expected of those two Kings, that had promised to ioyne with the Romans at their landing.

Concerning Masanissa's revolt from the Carthaginians, and his compact made vnder hand with the Romans: Linie doth professe, that there was no such euident cause thereof at the present; but that the long continuance of his faith and constancie, in following times, must helpe to proue, that this his change was not without some good cause. But Appianus (an Historian farre inferior to Linie, both in Worth and Time) giues one reason so probable of this, and many accidents thereto belonging, as that it carries with it a great appearance of necessarie truth. Only the doubt is, How it could any way come to passe, that the knowledge of such a matter should haue escaped the diligence of Linie, if it had bene true: vntill wee should beleue, that he willfully forbore to heare of a Tragedie; the sorrow whereof would cause men to thinke amisse of Scipio. Howsoever it was, thus Appian tells it; and many circumstances of things doe confirme it. Asdrubal, the sonne of Gisco, had a faire daughter, whom both King Syphax and Masanissa loued. Masanissa, being brought vp at Carthage, and being withall a goodly gentleman of person, and excellent in qualities, was chosen by Asdrubal to be his sonne-in-law. When the virgin was betrothed vnto him, he went into Spain, and there did great seruice. But afterwards, the Carthaginian Senate thought the marriage of Asdrubal's daughter to be a matter of State; and belloved her vpon Syphax; without standing to acquaint her father or Masanissa therewithall. This they did, for that Syphax was the more mightie Prince; and for that the indignitie of the repulse, had made him become their enemy. Hereof Masanissa was aduertised: and forthwith entred into intelligence with Scipio, secretly as he thought; yet not so secretly, but that some notice was taken of it: which would haue cost him his life, had he not with great circumspection conueighed himselfe home to his fathers Kingdome. Thus farre forth we may beleue Appianus: all the narration well cohering with things past, and following. Only it seemes, that howsoeuer Sophonisba the daughter of Asdrubal, was promised by the Carthaginians vnto Syphax: yet since this their courtie proceeded from feare, He thought it wisdom to conuincue and increafe the same in their feare, by making faire promises to the Romans, vntill Asdrubal had sent for his daughter from Carthage, and the marriage was consummated. In other matters concerning the warre it selfe, wherein Appian differs much from Linie, and from Polybius, whom (as appeares by the broken peeces of this works remaining) Linie did follow; it will be no offence, to take little heed vnto his reports.

Masanissa was the sonne of Gala, a King of the Numidians: whose father dying, the Crowne descended, by order of the Countie, vnto Leptis, the brother, not vnto Masanissa the sonne. But this Vncle of Masanissa shortly died: and his elder sonne, who tooke possession of the Kingdome, was vanquished, and slaine in battaile by a Rabel that made himselfe Protector ouer the younger which was a child. The Traitor fortified himselfe against Masanissa, whose returne hee feared; by Alliances with the Carthaginians and Syphax. But all would not serue: He and his Pupill, were dispossessed of their Estates by Masanissa; that was a skilfull Warriour, and well beloved for the memorie of his father Gala. The Carthaginians in reason should haue bene glad, that Masanissa, who had done them notable seruice, was thus confirmed in his Estate: had they not bene guiltie of the iniurie by them done vnto him; whilst his Vncle or Cousin reigned, and hee seemed vnlike to stand them in any stead. But Syphax, by their procurement, and perhaps by his owne malice towards his Cousin, warred warred vpon him; and ouer-charging him with numbers, draue him out of his Kingdome. Neuertheless Masanissa still retayned the hearts of his people: and thereby remayned strong enough, to infect both Syphax and the Carthaginians; though he was often put in distresse, by great forces that were sent against him. He therefore keeping much about the lesser Syria, betweene the borders of the Carthaginians and the Nation of the Garamants, expected the coming of the Romans: yet so, as he made long roades ouer all the Countie, euen as farre as to Hippo; and when Lelius arrived thereabouts, exhorted and encouraged him, to hasten on Scipio to the inuasion of Africa.

But Syphax in whose great aide and succour was repofed more hope of good success, than could be expected from the good will of poore Masanissa, sent an Embassage into Sicily about the same time, which was little pleasing vnto Scipio. He excluded himselfe of his promise lately made: and signified his alliance with the Carthaginians; adding, That hee could not choofe but fight for the defence of Africa, wherein he was borne and reigned; and for defence of his beloved wifes Countie, if it were inuaded. Neuertheless he promised to remaine a Neuter; so long as the Romans and Carthaginians held warre abroad, farre enough from Africa, as hitherto they had done. This message haltned Scipio in his Expedition, much more than any perswasion could haue done. For the promised assistance of Syphax had not a little advanced his enterprise; in procuring both the assent of the Senate, and the forwardnesse of many Adventurers. Left therefore the failing of this hope, should worke too great a change in common opinion; He thought it the best way, to present all discourse, and set the warre vnderaken immediately on foot. The Embassadors he dismissed in all haste, with letters to their King: wherein hee willed him to consider, that what he had promised he had also sworne; and therefore should doe well to make it good. Hauing sent them away, Hee called his Souldiers together, and bade them make readie for the voiage; which he intended no longer to deferre. For, said he, Masanissa hath bene with Lelius: and Syphax hath newly sent to me; greatly wondering vpon what I should thus stay; and saying, that they will prouide for themselves, if I faile their expectation by tarrying any longer. This fine tale prevented all further inquisition, that might else haue bene made concerning the message of these Embassadors; whose followers had bene seene walking vp and downe Syracuse. And lest any thing should afterwards breake out, that might hinder the businesse, Scipio immediately sent about his fleet vnto Lilybæum: and requesting by letters M. Pœponius, that was Pretor in Sicily, to meet him there; halft thither with his Armie. At Lilybæum he agreed with the Pretor, about the diuision of the Legions betweene them; which to leaue behind for defence of the Iland; and which to carrie with him into Africa. What numbers hee transported, it is not certaine: some Historians reckoning only ten thousand foot, and two and twentie hundred horse; others increasing them to five and thirtie thousand, horse and foot. Concerning his directions for embarking, and other matters belonging to their course, I hold it needlesse to set them downe: since they were points of ordinarie care, and which it is like that neither he, when he tooke his voiage into Spain, nor others vpon like occasions, haue omitted; they being also word for word set downe by an Historian, who borrowed them from Linie, and fitted them to a Prince of tooke age.

This Roman Armie landed in Africa, neare vnto a Fore-land then called the faire Promontorie: which how farre it was from Carthage, or toward what point of the Compass, I cannot precisely affirme, because it is vncertaine, whether it were that Cape or Head-land which bore the name of Mercure. And lay to the North-east of Carthage; or whether that of Apello, which lay Northerly from Carthage, and by West. The coming of Masanissa vnto Scipio at his first arriuall, helpes to confirme the opinion of Islander: who thinks the faire Promontorie to haue bene the same, that was also called Mercures Cape, since with little difficultie Masanissa might come thither from the lesser Syria, whereabout was his common abiding. But forasmuch as without any memorable impediment, soone after his arrival, Scipio encamped before Vicia, that flood Westward from Carthage beyond the River Bygradus: it may rather seeme, that hee landed within the Promontorie of Apello, whence the way to Vicia was not long. This is also strongly proued; for that out of Carthage were sent, the next day, five hundred horse to trouble him in his disembarking. Neither was it so hard for Masaniissa, that routed about the Countrie with a troupe of horse, to finde out the Romans, though they landed farre from the place to the which hee usually resorted, like as before he had met with Lilius at Hippo that was farther off; as it would haue bene for Scipio, with his Armie and Carriages, to ouercome the trouble of a long Iourne, and fetch a great compasse to Vicia by Land; when he might haue disembarked nearer vnto it. Neuertheless it may passe as a conjecture, That Scipio came first of all to Emperia, a plentifull Region about the lesser Syria; since he gaue charge to the Masters of his ships, at the setting forth from Lilybeum, to shape their course for that coast. The Countrie thereabout was very rich, and fit for sustenance of an Armie: neither were the Inhabitants warlike, or well prouided to make resistance. Thus much perhaps Masaniissa had signified vnto Lilius, when he spake with him at Hippo: thinking that the Romans, howsoever they made braue promises, would not come strong enough to fight at head. But when hee saw their fleet and Armie to be such, as not only crued to invade the Land of Carthage, but threatened a conquest of the Citie, and whole Estate: then might hee better aduise them to set saile for Vicia, and make warre vpon the Enemies at their owne doores.

The Carthaginians had at that time neither any Capitaine of great worth at home, nor better Armie than of raw Souldiers; that were leui'd, or to bee leui'd in haste. Asdrubal the sonne of Gisco, the same that had lately bene chased out of Spain by Scipio, was their best man of warre. And good enough perhaps he was thought by Hanno and his fellows, of whose faction he was: or if ought were wanting in him, yet his Riches and Nobilitie, together with the affinitie of King Syphax, made him passable. He was at that present with the King his sonne-in-law, working him (no doubt) against the Romans: when letters were brought from Carthage, both to Syphax and to him, informing them of the Inuasion: entreating the one of them to giue assistance; and commanding the other to make his repaire vnto the Citie, where he was chosen Generall. But ere these could be read, Scipio had beaten the troupe of Carthaginian horse, that were sent out of the Citie to disturbe his landing; and slaine Hanno a yong Gentleman, that was their Leader. He had also taken and sacked a Towne of the Carthaginians: wherein, besides other bootie, hee tooke eight thousand prisoners; all which he conueighed aboard his Hulkes or ships of burden, and sent them back laden into Sicily. Hee tooke likewise a Towne called Salera; which he held and fortified. In Salera lay another Hanno, with foure thousand Namidian horse: whose seruice being fitter for the field, than for defence of walled places; made Scipio to percieve the vnskilfulnesse of their Leader, that had thus housed them. Wherefore he sent Masaniissa before him: who rode vp to the gates; and, by making a Brauado, trained out the improuident Hanno so farre, that hee drew him vnto a place, where the Romans lay in wait for him. The victorie was easily gotten; and Hanno either taken, or slaine. With those that fled, the Romans entred pell-mell into the Towne; which presently they made their owne. Thence went Scipio to Vicia, a Citie of great importance. * of which mention hath bene formerly made; and late downe before it. Fortie daies hee spent about it: assailing it both by Land and Sea, and vying all his engines of batterie whereof hee had plentie; yet was in no likelihood of preuailing. And now the Sommer was quite spent: so that it was time for him to chooe a place, and fortifie his Winter-campe; which must bee well stored against the yeare following. Whilst thus necessitie vrged him to leaue Vicia: and shame of taking the repulse in his first great enterprize, rather than any hope of better successe, caused him to stay there: Asdrubal and Syphax gaue him the honour of a faire pretence to leaue the siege. Asdrubal had made a Leuie of thirte thousand foot, and three thousand horse; yet adventured not with this ill-trained Armie to draw neare vnto the Romans, before the coming of Syphax. Syphax brought with him vnto Carthage fiftie thousand foot, and ten thousand horse: which joyning vnto the forces of Asdrubal, they marched brauely toward Scipio; who thereby tooke occasion to dislodge. He chose for his Winter-campe the banks of an Inlet, that had good harbour for his Naue. His foot-men he lodged on a Promontorie, joyning to the Continent by an arme of Land: his horse-men he belloyed vpon lower ground, on the other shore: in the bottome of the Creeke he mored his ships; and there hee quartered the Mariners, with all that belonged vnto the fleet. The whole Campe he strongly fortified; and so attended the season of the yeare, when it should serue him againe to fight. Of cattail and other bootie Masaniissa had brought in great store; by driving the Countrie, before the coming of Asdrubal and Syphax. Corne also he had gotten some: and great store was sent him from Sicily and Sardinia. Likewise apparrell for his Souldiers, was sent from home, or from Sardinia: though scarce enough to serue turne; for that it was a matter of more cost. The ships that brought these things, he freighted homewards with such part of his bootie, as he could belt passe; especially with Captiues, to bee sold for slauces. Asdrubal and Syphax encamped neare vnto Scipio: not so strongly fortifying themselves, as did the Romans; either for that they wanted the secure institution, which the Romans vied in discipline of Warre; or for that they presumed vpon their multitude, against which they found in Scipio no disposition to issue forth of his strength, and fight. So the Winter passed without adon.

When Spring drew neare, Scipio thought it good to assay his old friend the Namidian King, if perhaps he might bee wonne by persuasions to forsake the Carthaginians. It was considered, that those Barbarians were naturally vnconstant; and particularly, that Syphax had giuen prooffe before this of his much leuie. It might therefore be hoped, That hauing wearied himselfe, by lodging a whole Winter in the Campe: and being peraduenture no lesse wearie with fatigue of his wife, who had caused him to enter into this warre: Hee might bee moued with a little entreatie, to with-draw himselfe home into his kingdome, and rest a Neuter. But it is not vniuely, that such a friend as this King, had bene highly enteruined and honored in the Citie of Carthage, which was neare at hand, as often as during this Winter it had pleased him, or as he had bene invited, to make a step thither and repose himselfe awhile: his wife Queene Sophaniska lying also there at the same time, to cherish him in his resolution. How looser it were, Syphax did only make an overture of peace: propounding it as reasonable, That Hannibal should be recalled out of Italy by the Carthaginians: and that the Romans in like sort should quietly depart out of Africa; and so make an end of the Warre, wherewith now both Africa and Europe were disquieted. Vnto this would not Scipio at the first giue eare; yet being pressed earnestly by many messagers from Syphax, and desiring to continue the inter-course of Embassadors: He beganne to make shew, as if he would consider of the motion. He was giuen to vnderstand by those whom he had sent vnto the King, That the Enemies had their Campes without any great defence of earth, full of wooden Cabins, and couered with boughes: and that the Namidians, such of them as came first with Syphax, vsed couerings of Mats and Reedes; others, that came later, had thatched their lodgings with drie boughes and leaues: vnder which they lay carelesly without their Trenches. Vpon this aduertisement hee bethought himselfe, That it would not be hard for him to set their campson fire; and thereby giue them a notable ouerthrow. Without helpe of some such stratageme, Hee foresaw that it would be a worke of great difficultie for him, to proceede in his warres when time should serue. It was a plaine open Countrie wherein he lay: and the Enemies had great aduantage of him in number, especially in horse, which, vpon such ground, could not be resisted by the Roman Legions. The longer therefore that he thought

upon the matter; the more needfull he found it for himselfe, to make some sudden attempt vpon their Campe. To this end hee sent many Embassadors, vnder pretence of treating about the Peace, but indeede of purpose to discouer all that might concerne the intended surprisall. With these Embassadors he sent, as Attendants, many old Souldiers disguised like slaues; that wandering (as it were) idly vp and downe the Campe, might obserue the waies and entrances, with whatsoever else was needfull. When hee had leerned as much as hee desired: vpon the sudden hee sent word to Syphax, that it was vaine to hold any longer Treatie, forasmuch as he could not gett the consent of his Councell of warre, without whole approbation, all that himselfe could doe was no more, than the good will of one man. This hee did, to the end that, without any breach of faith, he might put his designe in execution. The Truce being thus cut off: Asdrubal and Syphax were very peniue; as hauing lately perswaded themselves, that their trouble was almost at an end. But since it could be no better: they beganne to deuise, by what arte they might draw Scipio out of his campe, and prouoke him to battaile in those Plaines. This if they could doe; they hoped to make his Councell of warre repent as greatly the refusal of peace, as did M. Attilius after the like presumption. But if he should refuse to come forth of his Trenches: what else remained than to besiege him? that which themselves were well able to doe by Land; and the Carthaginians there should doe by Sea, that was making readie for the purpose. By such discourses these two comforted themselves: recompencing in concept the losse of their hopes past, with that of victorie to come. But herein they were extremely and worthily disappointed: for that, consulting about the future, they provided not against present danger; but continued in the same negligence, which was growne vpon them by the long discourse of peace. As for Scipio, hee was not idle: but made preparation out of hand; as it were to doe somewhat against Vtica. Two thousand Souldiers hee had made readie; and appointed to take the same peece of ground, whercon hee lay against Vtica before. This hee did, partly to keepe secret that which hee had in hand; lest being suspected by his owne Souldiers, the Enemy might happen to haue notice of it; partly to hinder those of Vtica from setting vpon the few, that hee purposed to leaue behinde him in his campe. He cauled his men that night to suppe well and betimes; that they might be readie for the iourne. After supper, he appointed such Companies as he thought fit, vnto the defence of his Campe; all the rest of his Armie he led forth, about nine of the clock at night. The Carthaginians lay from him seuen miles and an halfe: whom he purposed to vndertake himselfe with the one halfe of his armie; the other halfe he committed vnto Lilius and Masaniissa, whom hee sent before him to set vpon the Campe of Syphax, that was farther off. It was his meaning, that the campe of Syphax should be on a light fire, ere he would meddle with the Carthaginians. For the fire might seeme to haue taken hold by casualty vpon the Numidians, that lay farther off: whereas if it first appeared in the campe of Asdrubal, it would be suspected as the doing of enemies; and giue Syphax warning to looke vnto himselfe. To this end therefore Scipio marched faire vnd softly; that Lilius and Masaniissa, who had a longer iourne, and were to fetch a compasse about for feare of being discouered, might haue time to get before him, and doe their feat. It was about two or three of the clock in the morning, when the campe of Syphax beganne to blaze: which not only the Numidians, but their King himselfe, imputed vnto casualty; as thinking themselves safe enough from Enemies, for that the Carthaginians lay interposed betweene them and the danger. Wherefore as if there were no more to doe, some, starting halfe asleepe; and others, that had litten vp late at drinking; ranne out of their Cabbins to quench the fire. But such was the tumult, that they neither could rightly vnderstand in what case they were; nor giue remedie to the mischance, as it was supposed. Many were smothered, and burnt in the flame, which grew greater and greater: many, leaping into the Trenches for feare of the sudden mischance, were trampled to death by the multitude that followed them. They that escaped the fire, fell vpon the Enemies sword, which was readie to receiue them. Especially Masaniissa, that best knew the Countrey, did great execution vpon them; hauing laid all the waies, by which he foresaw that they would seeke to escape. The Carthaginians perceiving this fire, thought none other than that it was a pitifull mischance: so that some ranne out to helpe the poore Numidians; carrying only what would serue to quench the fire. Others ranne vp to the Rampart: where, in case of any danger towards themselves, they stood beholding the greatnesse of the flame, and lamenting the misfortune. This fell out right as Scipio would haue it. Hee therefore lost no time: but setting vpon those that were running towards the Numidians, he killed some, and pursued the rest backe into their campe; which in a little while hee made to burne as bright, as did that of Syphax. Asdrubal seeing this, and knowing that the Romans were there, did not stand to make resistance, but shifted only for himselfe, and escaped with a few of his horse about him. If Tianthal, or any of the Barbantine faction, had bene taken in such a manner: it is more than probable, that old Hanno would haue judged him worthie to be crucified. It would then haue been said, That with lesse than one halfe of thirtie thousand men, hee might at least haue giuen some bad recompence, to them that were taking pains in kindling these fires, had he not bene only carefull how to saue his owne carefull head. Neuertheless Polybius acknowledgeth, and it is most likely to haue bene true, That if Asdrubal, or any of those about him, would haue striuen to shew valour, when the camp was on fire: He should not thereby haue done any manner of good; because of the tumult and consernation. I shall not neede to tell what a fearful thing it was, to heare the cries of so many thousands that perished by fire and sword, or to behold the cruell flame that consumed them; which (as Polybius affirmes) none that hath bene is able to describe. It is enough to say, That of those many thousands very few did escape; which accompanied Asdrubal and Syphax in their funeral waies of flight. Besides these also there were some scatterers, especially of the Numidians, that saved themselves in the darke: but they were not many; as after shall appeare. Surely it must needes haue bene very hard to tell, how many were burnt or otherwise made away; and what numbers escaped in the darke of night. Wherefore Liuitius, who in the rest of this Relation, as often elsewhere, doth follow Polybius, may seeme to haue followed some lesse worthie Author, and him no good Arithmetician, in casting vp the summe. For hee reckons only two thousand foot, and five hundred horse, to haue escaped; fortie thousand to haue perished by sword or fire; and about fixe thousand to haue bene taken prisoners: the whole number of all which together, is farre short of fourescore and thirteene thousand, which were in these two Campes.

Asdrubal, putting himselfe into the next Towne that was very strongly fortified; thought thereto finde the Romans worke, vntill the Carthaginians at good leisure might repaire their Armie. He had with him no more than two thousand foot, and five hundred horse: which he thought sufficient to defend the Towne; if the Townsmen would not be wanting to themselves. But he found the Inhabitants of the place very earnest in contention, whether it were better to fight, or to yeeld. Vnto this disputation, hee well foresaw that the arriual of Scipio would soone giue an end. Wherefore, lest they should lay hold vpon him, and seeke the Victors fauour by deliuering him vp; hee shrunke away betimes, and made all haste to Carthage. As for the Towne, which hee left; it opened the gates to Scipio, at his first coming: and thereby preserved it selfe from all manner of losse. The two next Townes adioyning would needes be valiant, and make countenance of warre: but by their strength not being answerable, they were soone taken by Scipio; who abandoned them to the pleasure of his Souldiers. This done, hee returned to the siege of Vtica.

The Carthaginians were sore troubled, as they had good reason; when, in stead of either Peace or Victorie, which they lately hoped for, they heard newes of such a lamentable lamentable overthrow. Necessitie enforced them to make haste prouision for the future: but how to do it, few of them saw any means. Some gaue aduice to craue peace of Scipio: others, to send for Hannibal out of Italie; but the most, and they which finally prevailed, were of opinion, That notwithstanding the losse of this Armie, they might well defend themselves against the Romans, by raising new forces: especially, if Syphax would not leave them. It was therefore concluded, That they should bend all their care this way: leuying in all haste another Armie; and sending Embassadors to deale with Syphax, who lay then at a Towne called Abba, not passing eight miles from Carthage. Immediately the same their intimate Commander, Asdrubal the sonne of Gisco, was imploied to make new leuies of men: and Queene Sophonisba went forth with Embassadors to her husband Syphax; who hauing gathered together as many as he could, of his subjects that had escaped from the late slaughter, was thinking to returne into his owne Kingdome. Sophonisba laboured so with her husband, that at length shee wonne him to her owne desire. And it fell out at the same time, that foure thousand Spaniards, waged by the Carthaginians, were brought out to serue in Africa. Of these were made such braue reports; as if their courage, and the armes which they vsed, were not to be questioned. Euen the multitude within Carthage beleued these tales, and were more glad than they had cause to be; which is great wonder, since in one Age, the whole Countrey of Spain had bene twice conquered, first by the Carthaginians themselves, and after by the Romans. But with Syphax these tales prevailed much: which the Carthaginian Embassadors helped with a lie; saying, that there were comen ten thousand of these terrible Spaniards. Vpon this confidence, the people of Carthage and their friends gathered such spirit, that in thirte daies they made vp an Armie consisting well-near of thirte thousand men; reckoning the Spaniards, and Syphax with his Numidians, in the number. So they encamped in a Region called the great fields, about fife daies iourne from Vtica. Scipio hearing of this, came from Vtica thither, to visit them: leauing behinde him his impediments, with some part of his Armie; to make a shew of continuing the siege. Two or three daies, after the meeting of both Armies, passed away in skirmish; without any great thing done. It had now bene time for Asdrubal, to follow the example of the Roman Fabius; and seeke to weare out the Enemy by delays. But either (which is likely) hee was a farre worse Commander; or else it was not in his power, to giue such direction as best pleased himselfe. The fourth day the Armies met in battaile: wherein the Romans were marshalled by Scipio after their wonted manner; hauing their Italian horle in the right wing; and Malians with his Numidians in the left. On the contrary side, Asdrubal and his Carthaginians had the right wing; Syphax, the left; and the Spaniards, the Battaille. The victorie was gotten without many blowes: for the vntrained followers of Syphax and Asdrubal, could not sustaine the first charge of the Italians, or of Malians. Only the Spaniards fought a long time, euen till they were all in a manner slaine: rather as men desperate, and not hoping for mercie, since they were thus come out to fight against Scipio, who had otherwise deserued of them; than vpon any likelihood or conceit of victorie. This their obstinacie was beneficiall vnto those that fled; for that it hindered the Romans from making any great pursuit. Hereby Asdrubal and Syphax escaped: Asdrubal, to Carthage; and Syphax home, to his owne Kingdome: whether his wife was either gone before, or immediately followed him.

Scipio, hauing thus gotten the maistrie of the field, tooke counsaile about the prosecution of the Warre. It was resolved vpon as the best course, That hee himselfe, with part of the Armie, should attempt the Cities round about him: and that Malians, with his Numidians, and Lelias, with some of the Roman Legions, should follow after Syphax; not permitting him to take rest within his owne Kingdome, where easily else he might repair his forces, and put them to new trouble. This aduice it seemes that Malians gaue: who knew best the qualitie of the Numidians; and

and what good might be done among them, by the reputation of a victorie. The least that could be expected, was his restitution into his owne Kingdome, vsurped by Syphax: which to accomplish, it no lesse concerned the Romans at the present, than it did himselfe. According to this order concluded, Lelias was sent away with Malians: and Scipio staid behinde; carrying the warre from Towne to Towne. Many places yielded for feare: many were taken by force: and all the subjects of Carthage wauered in their fidelitie; as if the time were now come, wherein they might take notice of those vnreasonable burdens, which their proud Masters had laid vpon them, for maintenance of the warre in Spain and Italie. What to doe in this case the Carthaginians could hardly resolve. Fortune was their Enemy: they had lost their Armies, and many of their Townes: neither durst they make bold to trouble their owne subjects with any violent exaction of men or monie; who neuertheless of their owne free will were likely to giue little helpe. Very much it grieved them, to send for Hannibal out of Italie: yet since there was no other hope remaining, than in him and his good Armie; it was decreed, that Embassadors should bee forthwith sent to call him home. Some there were that gaue aduice, to set out a fleet against that of Scipio; that rode before Vtica, weakly manned, and easie to be taken, whilst Scipio himselfe was buied in the Inland Countreies. Some were of opinion, That it should be their principall care, to fortifie by all means the Citie of Carthage: vpon the safetie whereof they said that all depended; adding, that whilst they were true, and at vnite among themselves, they might well enough subtiltie, and expect those opportunities, with which Fortune (doublelesse) would present them. These counsailes were not rejected: but order was forthwith taken, both for all things concerning defence of the Citie, and for the attempt vpon the Roman fleet at Vtica. Neuertheless it was considered, that hereby they should only protract the warre: without any way aduancing their owne affaires towards likelihood of victorie; no, though it should fall out, that all the ships at Vtica might bee taken or destroyed. Wherefore the determination held concerning Hannibal, that hee should immediately come ouer into Africa, as the last refuge of Carthage. The Councell was no sooner broken vp, than all the Senators betooke themselves to the execution of that which was decreed: some, to fortification of the Towne: some, to make readie the Fleet; and some, appointed thereunto, forthwith to embarke themselves for Italie. In this their trepidation Scipio comes to Tunes, a Citie in those daies very strong and standing in respect almost of euery part of Carthage. This place or rather some defensible peece adioyning, He easily tooke; the Garrison forsaking it, and running away, as soone as he drew near. But whilst hee was about there to incampe, and fortifie himselfe against the Citie: He might perceiue the Carthaginian fleet setting forth, and making towards Vtica: What this meant, he readily conceived: and stood in great feare, lest his owne ships, that were very ill prepared for Sea fight (as being heavily laden with engines of batterie, and wholly disposed in such order, as was most conuenient for assaulting the Towne) should make bad resistance, against a fleet appointed for that speciall seruice. Wherefore hee hastied away towards Vtica, to assist with his presence in this needfull case. It fell out well, that he had sent his carriages, and all the great bootie which he drew along with him, thither before, at his going to Tunes. For had not hee now made great expedition, hee should haue come too late. Neither could heeindeede haue bene there in due time; if the Carthaginians had vsed such diligence, as was conuenient. But they rested one night in harbour by the way: and at their coming to Vtica, they tarried awhile to make a brauado; presenting themselves in order of battaile, as if the Romans would haue put forth to Sea against them. But Scipio had no such intent: He thought it would be sufficient, if he could preserue his Gallies. As for the pleasure of their brauerie at Sea: it should little auail the Carthaginians; if they got nothing by it, and lost their whole Estate by Land. Wherefore he tooke his ships of burden; and, fastning them together with cables, in four ranks, one behind another, made a four-fold bridge ouer the

the Channell of the Hauen; whereon he placed a thousand of his choice men, with store of Darts and other casting weapons, to make defence. Some open spaces he left, whereas his Frigots, and other small Vessells, might runne out and back againe vpon any advantage or neede; but these he couered with planks; vling the matts and yards of his ships in stead of rafters, to joyne all together, that his men might help one another, and the bridge it selfe not be torne asunder. Scarce was this worke finished; when the Carthaginians, seeing none issue forth against them, came into the Hauen. The fight betwene them and the Romans, that were in the Hulkes, was rather like to the assailing of a wall, than to any Sea-fight. For they that stood vpon the bridge, had sure looting, and threw their weapons downwards with their whole strength and violence, which the Carthaginians out of their Gallies, that were lower and vnsteadie, could not doe. But the Roman Frigots and long Boats, aduancing forth from behinde the Bridge, were greatly ouerborne by the force of the Gallies; and were one occasion of that small losse which followed. They that stood vpon the Bridge were neither able to relieue them: nor yet could freely bestow their weapons among the Carthaginians, as before; for feare of hurting these their friends, that were entangled and mixed among the enemies. The Carthaginians had brought with them grappling hookes, hanging at Iron chaines. These they threw vpon the matts and yards which served as Arches to joyne the bridge together: then rowing backwards, they tore all asunder; in such fort that one ship followed another, and all the first ranke was broken, or defaced. The Defendants had no other way, than to saue themselves as hastily as they could, by shifting into the next ranke of ships, that lay behinde them vntouched. Neither did the Carthaginians trouble themselves any further in this laborious worke: but hauing haled away fixe ships of burden, and towed them out of the Hauen, returned home to Carthage. Their well-come was greater than their victorie: because among so many grievous losses, only this exploit had succeeded well; though it were of small importance.

Whilest things thus passed about Cuthages, Lalius and Masanissa, in their iourne against Syphax, found as good success as could be desired. The fame of the victories already gotten, restored Masanissa to his Kingdome, without further contention: the Masafyls his subjects, joyfully receiving him; and forsaking the Vsurper. But here they staied not: neither indeede would Syphax permit them to be quiet. Hee had such abundance of men and horses, that he felt not greatly the losses past: and, therefore being solicited by Africulus and Sophoniba, hee prepared againe for warre. But beside the infatigation of his beloued wife; the losse of the Masafyls would let him take no rest: neither was it the purpose of Lalius and Masanissa, to giue him any breathing time. It is common in men, to depart no lesse vnwillingly from that which they have gotten by extortion, than from their proper inheritance: but to thinke all alike their owne, whereof they are in possession; bee the title vnto some part neuer to vnquit. Hereunto alludes the fable of the yong Kite: which thought that shee had vomited vp her owne guts; when it was only the garbage of some other fowle, that shee had hastily swallowed, and was not able to digest. But whether or no, Syphax, like the yong Kite, beleued the Kingdome of the Masafyls to be part of his entrailes: Lalius and Masanissa will shortly giue him somwhat, that shall make him cast his gorge. For to this purpose chiefly are they come fo farre. It concerned the Romans to dispossesse (if it might be) that King: whose false and hollow friendship towards them, had bene conuerted into strong enmitie; as also to set in his place another, who might doe them such good offices, as Syphax had lately done vnto the Carthaginians. How easily this might be effected, Masanissa knew well: as being well acquainted with the nature of those Countries; wherein, euen to this day, though there be many strong Townes, yet the fortune of a battaile is enough, to translate the Kingdome from one Competitor to another. So they met with Syphax: who came against them with no lesse an Armie, than his former, and marshalled in the Roman order; according to the skill, which he had learned of the Roman Centurion, Centurion, long agoe sent vnto him out of Spain from Cn. Scipio. But though hee could teach his men how to march in order; yet could he not teach them to fight courageously. They were a rabble of all sorts, gathered vp in halt: and few of them had seene the warre before. Encamping neare vnto the Romans, it fell out, as commonly that some small Troupes of Horse on both sides, encountered one another in the mid-way: and they that had the worst, were seconded by other of their fellows. By continuance of the skirmish, more and more were drawne out from either Campe: so that at length Syphax, vnwilling to dishearten his men by taking any foile at their first meeting with the Enemie, came vp with all his Horse, which were the best part of his forces, and therewith ouercharged Masanissa, whose numbers were farre lesse. But whilest he was prosecuting his hope of victorie; some Roman Squadrons of Foot came against him through their owne Troupes of Horse; which fell to the sides, and made a lane for them. So their Battaille standing now more firme, than a little before; Syphax was vnable, though hee laboured much in vaine, to make them giue ground. Masanissa likewise, and his Troupes, grew confident vpon this assistance: and charging afresh the Enemie, that could not make way forward, caused him to giue back. Herewithall the Legions came in fight: which terrified the Numidian Horse, that they beganne presently to disband. Faine would Syphax haue stayed them from flight; and to that end made head in person against the Romans with hope, that his men would be ashamed to leaue him. But it fell out vnhappily, that he was cast from his Horse, which received a wound; and so taken prisoner. Of others that were slaine or taken, the multitude was not great. It sufficed, that they forsooke the place, and fled: and that their King, vpon whom all depended, was in the Romans hand. Masanissa old Lalius, that his victorie should make an end of the Numidian war, if presently they halted away to Cirta the chiefe Citie of the Kingdome; whither hee himselfe desired to be sent before with the Horse, carrying Syphax along with him. Hereunto Lalius agreed. Masanissa coming to Cirta, before any newes of the Kings mischance was there arrived, called out the chiefe of the Citie to parlee: wherein by many faire promises and threats, but especially by shewing vnto them Syphax bound, he prevailed so far that the gates were forthwith opened vnto him; and euery one strove to get his fauour, that was like to be their King hereafter. Among the rest, Queene Sophoniba yielded her selfe into his hands: and vehemently besought him, that the might not be deliuered vp vnto the Romans. Her youth, and excellent beutie, so commended her suit, that Masanissa forthwith granted it; and to make good his promise, married her himselfe that very day: thereby to prevent Lalius and Scipio from determining otherwise of her, since she was his wife. But Lalius, when he came thither, took the matter haينously; so that at first he would haue haled her away, together with Syphax and other prisoners, and haue sent her vnto Scipio. But being ouer-entreated by Masanissa, hee suffered the matter to rest awhile as he found it, and referred all to Scipio's discretion: to whom he sent away Syphax and other Captiues immediately; following shortly after himselfe with Masanissa, when they had done what was needefull in the Kingdome.

At the coming of Syphax there was great ioy in the Roman Campe: the mightie Armies which he had lately brought into the field: and his entertainment of Scipio and Africulus, both at one time, when Rome and Carthage together fought his friendship: with such other commemoration of his past and present fortune; ministering to euery one a large argument of discourte. Scipio demanded of him, what had moued him, not only to forsake the Roman friendship, but to make warre vpon you, vnprovoked. He briefly answered, That his wife had moued him so to doe: calling her a Furie, and a pestilent creature: and saying, That Masanissa was no wifer than himselfe; since he had now taken the same woman to his wife, who would shortly draw him to the same courtes. Hereat Scipio was greatly troubled: and stood in great doubt, lest this perillous woman should deprive him of Masaniſſa, as shee had done of Syphax. It was not long, ere Masaniſſa and Lilius came vnto him: both of whom together he louingly welcommed; and highly commended in publicke, for their notable seruice in this Expedition. Then taking Masaniſſa apart, hee brake with him, as touching Sophonisba: letting him vnderstand, that the Romans had titte to her head; and that shee was a mischieuous enemye of theirs. Wherefore hee entreated him to moderate his affections: and not to deface the memorie of his great seruices already done; (for which he should be highly rewarded to his owne contentment) by committing a great offence vpon little reason. Masaniſſa blushed, and wept: and finally promised to be gouerned by Scipio; whom he neuertheless entreated, to thinke vpon his faith giuen to Sophonisba, that she should not be deliuered into the Romans power. So he departed to his own Tent, where, after some time spent in agonie, he called vnto him a seruant of his, that had the custodie of his poison (which Princes then vsed to haue in readines, against all mischances that might make them unwilling to liue); and tempering a potion for Sophonisba, sent it vnto her with this message, That gladly he would haue had her to liue with him as his wife: but since they who had power to hinder him of his desire, would not yeild thereto, he sent her a cup, that should preserue her from falling aliae into the hands of the Romans; willing her to remember her birth and estate, and accordingly to take order for her selfe.

At the receipt of this Message and Present, shee onely said, That if her Husband had no better token to send vnto his new wife, shee must accept of this; adding, That shee might haue died more honourably, if shee had not wedded so late. Iy before her Funerall. And herewithall shee boldly dranke off the poison. Thus Lilius reports it. But Appian varies from this: and lets it downe agreeably to that which hath bene spoken before, concerning the precontract betwene Masaniſſa and Sophonisba. Hee saith, That after the taking of Syphax, Embassadors from Cirta met with Lilius and Masaniſſa vpon their way thither, yielding vp their Citie, and the Kings Palace; and that Sophonisba, for her owne priuate, sent messengers to excuse her marriage with Syphax; as made against her will, by compulsion of those in whose power shee was. Masaniſſa readily admitted this excuse, and accepted her to wife. But when Scipio had received information from Syphax, how cunning in persuasion Sophonisba was; and that all her thoughts laboured for the good of Carthage: he fell out about her with Masaniſſa at his returne; and challenged her, as a part of the bootie belonging to the Romans. Masaniſſa said, shee was his owne wife, and vnto him betrothed many yeeres before. But Scipio would not heare of this: or if it were true; yet he said it was no reason, that Masaniſſa should keepe her in possession as long as it was disputable, vnto whom shee might appertaine. Wherefore hee willed him first of all to produce her, and then afterwards to make his claime vnto her; wherein hee should haue no wrong. Herewithall hee sent to fetch her away: and Masaniſſa accompanied the messengers, as it were to deliuer her; but making her acquainted with the necessity, gaue vnto her a cup of poison, wherewith shee ended her life, before they came that should haue apprehended her. So hee shewed vnto the Romans her dead bodie; which hee royally entred. The sudden violence of Masaniſſa his loue, and the ready consent of Sophonisba to marrie with him: added not so much credit vnto this relation of Appian, as doth the want of all other evidence: cause (which Lilius notes) of the sudden falling out betwene him and the Carthaginians; vnder whom hee had bin trained vp, & don them great seruice. Howsoever it were: Scipio, hearing of this tragical accident, sent for Masaniſſa, and comforted him as well as hee could; lest his melancholie should lead him to some inconvenience. Having therefore gently rebuked him for his rashnesse, he brought him forth in presence of the Armie: where extolling his noble acts, and shewing how highly hee had deserved of the Citie of Rome, hee proclaimed him King; and gaue vnto

to him a Crowne of gold, with other royall ornaments. This was indeed the ready way, to diuert his thoughts from the sadde remembrance of that which was past, vnto the more cheerefull contemplation of good fortune, that beganne to smile vpon him.

This was the first time that the Romans tooke vpon them to create or proclaim a King. Which honour though Masaniſſa well deserved: yet would not the Title haue redounded vnto his great benefit; neither should hee haue bene much beholding to them for it, if he had not by their meanes recovered possession of his Countie, together with the greatest part of Syphax his Dominions. It seemes not unlike, that hee had remained a Neuter in these warres, and sustained himselfe with his Troupe of Horſe, in such sort as hee did before the coming of the Romans; hee might neuertheless haue recovered his proper inheritance, by the loue of his owne subjects, without other helpe, when Syphax had once or twice bene vanquished. As for the enlargement of his Kingdome, it was not more than hee deserved: neither were the Romans then in case, to make a conquest of Numidia for themselves; neither could they haue witheld a fitter opportunitie, than of such a man, vpon whom to bestow it, that was their assured friend, and passable withall among the Numidians, as being (for the Masaniſſa were a Numidian Tribe) a great Prince of the same Nation. Yet this liberaltie of the Romans, was noyed abroad as verie glorious; and the Romans themselves, in a politicke sort of grauitie, tooke highly vpon them; as if euen their saluting him by the name of King, had bene a matter of great consequence. Hee thrived indeed well after it: and by their maintenance waxed mightie in times following, encroaching vpon his neighbours on all sides; but most of all vpon the State of Carthage, whereat they were little displeased. Hence it grew that Permina the sonne of Syphax (of whom wee shall shortly speake more) which hold some peece of his Fathers Kingdome, desiring friendship of the Romans, and promising by all meanes to deserue their loue, requested therewithall, that they would call him King. But though it were so, that neuer any before him had made this a matter of suit: yet the Roman Senate was punctilious herein; and answered very grauely, That it was not their custome to giue the honour of that appellation, saue onely vnto such Kings, as had greatly deserved of their Citie. Thus they made it a matter of State: and in proceſſe of time grew so proud of this their imaginarie prerogative, that they imputed as a singular benefit vnto Kings, that no way depended vpon them, the salutation by that name; though it were not accompanied with any other fauour or profit thence redounding.

¶ XIX.

The Carthaginians desire Truce: and breake it.

He Carthaginians were extremely dismaied, when they heard of the great calamitie that was befalling their good friend Syphax; and vnderstood that Masaniſſa, their mortall enemy, had got possession of his Kingdome. To increase their feare, Scipio returned againe to Tunes in view of their Citie; where hee made an end of that Fortification, which hee had begunne at his last being there. The Carthaginians had neither forces, nor courage, to withstand him: but their hearts so failed them, that they sent forth vnto him thirtie Embassadors, Princes of the Citie, which were their Priue Councell, to make suit for peace. These being admitted into the presence of Scipio, did not onely prostrate themselves on the ground; but killed the feet of him, and of those that late in Councell with him.

After that to this base adoration was their speech that followed. They confessed felld themselves to haue vniuſly broken the Peace betwene them and Rome; and to haue deſerued whatſoeuer puniſhment it ſhould pleaſe the Romans to inflict vpon them. Yet they humbly beſought Scipio and the reſt, that, in common regard of thoſe miſfortunes, whereat all men are ſubiect, they would ſhew mercie vnto the Citie of Carthage, and let it remaine, as a Monument of their clemencie; which, by the follie of her Citizens, had now twice deſerued to be ouerthrowne. Herewithall they did not forget, to lay the blame vpon Hannibal: who without their appointment had begunne the warre; and was maintained in his doings by a Faction, without the good liking of the whole Citie. By this it appeares, that theſe Embaſſadors were not Barbares: but rather, that they were Romans and the choice of his companie, who had now their long deſired worke in hand, of ſuing vnto the Romans for peace. Whatſoeuer they did, it muſt needs be that they were moſt insolent men our thoſe that were ſubiect vnto their power: for they would not haue made ſuch adoration vnto the Romans, in their owne neceſſitie; vnleſſe they themſelues had expected the like, where they had the aduantage.

It was not vnknowne to Scipio, or to his aſſiſtants, in what poore caſe the Citie of Rome then was; and how vnable to deſraie the charges of continuing the warre. Neither were the Carthaginians, notwithstanding the loſſe of ſo many Armies, in ſuch ill caſe, as the Romans themſelues had very lately been. For they had monie enough, where-with to wage more men: they had a Citie ſarre ſtronger than Rome; and they had the Sea free. But they wanted the Roman reſolution: and therefore diſtricted the walls of Carthage; though Ptolemaea weaker Citie, had all this while held out againſt Scipio, and could not yet be forced by him and his Armie, though ſo often victorious in the field. Scipio therefore accepted their ſubmiſſion, and told them that though he came into Africk, to make a Conqueſt, and not a Peace: yet hauing the Conqueſt as it were in his hand, hee would not denie to grant them the Peace, which they deſired, for thereby ſhould all Nations vnderſtand, that the people of Rome did follow the rule of iuſtice, both in making warre, and in concluding it. The conditions which he impoſed vpon them, were theſe: That they ſhould render vp vnto him all priſoners that they had taken, together with all Renegadoes and fugitive ſlaues: That they ſhould withdraw their Armies out of Italie and Gaule: That they ſhould not meddle in Spaine, nor yet in any Iland between Italie & Africk: That they ſhould deliuer vp all their ſhips of warre, ſauie twentie; and that they ſhould pay a great ſumme of monie, with certaine hundred thouſand bulſels of Wheat and Barlie. To conſider of theſe Articles, hee gaue them three dayes: and when they had approved them, he granted a Truce: that they might ſend Embaſſadors vnto the Roman Senate.

This done, Maſaniſſa was diſmiſſed, and went home into his Kingdome, as if the warre had beene alreadie at an end. Syphax was a little before ſent with Lelius vnto Rome: where the fame of theſe victories filled men with ioy; and gaue hope, that the long endured miſeries would be ſhortly at an end. Wherefore all the Temples were ſet open, and an holy day appointed for thankſgiving and ſupplication to their Gods. Lelius was accompanied with Embaſſadors from King Maſaniſſa: who gratulating the happie ſucceſſe of the Romans in their African Warre, and giuing thanks vnto the Senate for the benefits done by Scipio vnto their Maſter, made request for the Numidians, ſuch as were now his ſubiects and priſoners in Rome, that they might be beſtowen vnto him; who by rendering them to libertie, ſhould doe an act verie pleaſurable that would make him gracious among his people in the beginning of his reigne. The Roman Senate would not beehide with Maſaniſſa in complement: but ſhewing themſelues to be highly pleaſed with all that Scipio had done, and ſhould doe for him; they called him King againe; releaſed his Numidians that were captiues: and ſent him two purple Callocks, that had each of them one gold button; with ſuch other Preſents, as in time of their pouerty might ſerue to reſtiſie their good will.

will. Scarcely were theſe and Lelius gone from Rome; when the newes came, that Embaſſadors from Carthage were arrived to deſire peace. Theſe Embaſſadors were not admitted into the Citie, but were lodged without: vntill Lelius being ſent for, came backe from Africa, to be preſent when their demands were to be heard. Then was audience giuen them in the Temple of Bellona; that ſtood in the ſuburbs. The errand of theſe Embaſſadors, was Peace: but the meaning of them and of their Citie, was onely to winne time, and get reſpite from warre; vntill Hannibal and Mege ſhould come out of Italie, either to chace the Romans out of Africk, or to obtain peace for Carthage, by terror of their great names and Armies, vpon more ealie conditions. Wherefore they made an idle diſcourſe of the League, that was concluded betweene them and Lucatius Catulus, at the end of the former warre. This League they ſaid, all things well conſidered, did ſtill remaine in force: neither had there ſince beene any warre at all, betwene the people of Rome and the Carthaginians. For it was onely Hannibal, that, without any leaue from Carthage, had of his owne head beſieged and razed the Towne of Saguntum: and after that aduentured in like fort, without Commiſſion, to paſſe the Alpes, and trouble (as he had done) the quiet of Italie. This being ſo: their Meſſage was none other, than to deſire, that the League before ſpoken of, made in the time of Catulus, might hereafter ſtand in force; as indeed it hitherto did, and ought to doe. The Senators had cauſe to wonder at this tale, hearing theſe Embaſſadors make (as it were) a jelt of a warre, that had beene ſo terrible. Wherefore they asked them a great many queſtions, concerning that Peace made by Lucatius, and other paſſages following betwene the two Cities. But they excuſed themſelues by their age: (for they were all young men) and ſaid, that thoſe things were beyond their knowledge and remembrance. Forthwith it appeared, that all was but collusion, and that they fought no other than to gainne time; vntill they might repaire the warre. Wherefore they were ſent home in companie of Lelius; without any conſultation at all of peace; and, in effect, without anſwere. This notwithstanding, we finde in Polybius, that the Senate receiuing aduertiment from Scipio, of that which had paſſed betwene him and the Carthaginians in this Treatie of peace, approoued the conditions by him propounded; and gaue him licence thereupon, to proceede vnto conſultation. This may with good reaſon be believed: ſince it was not vnknowne, that if the warre continued, all theſe goodly hopes muſt reſt vpon the moſt vn certaine iſſue of one battaile betwene Hannibal and Scipio: wherein if fortune ſhould be averse to them, their forces in Africk were no better than quite loſt.

Matters thus hanging in ſuſpenſe, before the Carthaginian Embaſſadors came backe from Rome: a Fleet out of Sicily, wherein were two hundred ſhips of burden, and thirtie Gallies, being bound for Africk to victualle the Roman Campe, was overtaken by ſoule weather at Sea; and hardly eſcaping wracke, was diſperſed, and driven aground in diuers parts of the Bay of Carthage, euen in view, and vnder command of the Citie. There was at that time, as we finde in Appian, and may gather out of Polybius, a great dearth of victuals in Carthage: which cauſed the people to crie out vpon their Magiſtrates, that they ſhould not let ſuch a bootie eſcape them; ſaying, that the danger of famine was greater and worſe, than of breaking Truce. Whether it were ſo that hunger vrged them, or that they yielded to their owne greedie deſires: the multitude in Carthage vnderſtood (as it ſeemes) that all this diſcourſe of peace in hand, was no better than meere mockerie; and therefore cared not for obſervation of particular points, when they meant deſire in the whole. It was for women and boyes, to be meddling in vprores: the clamours of the boyes being in ſuch tumults no leſſe violent, than of the men. Wherefore it is no maraile, if little regard were had of reaſon, or of honour, in any ſuch commotion. A Fleet was ſent vnder Aſdrubal, to gather vp the diſperſed Roman ſhips of burden (for the Gallies, by force of Oares, recouered the ſtation whereto their Campe adioyned) and bring them into Carthage: which was done. Scipio was heretofore much offended: not only for the loss, and for that the Towne was thereby releued; but for that by this breach of truce, he foresaw the intention of the Carthaginians to renew the war, and put him to more trouble. Wherefore he sent Embassadors vnto them: both to require satisfaction for the iniurie done; and to deterre them from entertaining any other hope, than in the peace which they had so much desired. These gaue the Carthaginians to vnderstand, That Letters were come from Rome vnto Scipio, with allowance to conclude the peace, vpon those conditions which hee had propounded. But (said they) we hold it strange, that yee, who so lately haue cast your selues to the ground before vs, and kissed our feet, after an vnusall manner of humilitie, confessing your selues to haue perfidiously broken the league that was betwene vs, and thereby to haue deserved such punishment as is due vnto rebels; should so soone forget what yee then uttered, and runne headlong againe into the same crimes, for which yee acknowledged your selues worthe to be destroyed, hauing only recourse vnto our mercie. We are not ignorant, that it is the confidence which yee repose in Hannibal, that thus emboldens you. Yet were it not amisse, that yee should consider, how long he hath bene pent up in a corner of Italie, among the Britains; where he is in a manner besieged, and unable to stirre: so that yee are like to finde his helpe wanting in your greatest need. Or let it be supposed, that he were now in Africke, and ready to giue vs battaile; yet should it well agree with your wisdom, to doubt what might befall, remembering that he is man, and not invincible. Now if it should happen that he were overcome, what refuge haue ye left vnto your selues against hereafter? What gods will yee either sweare by, to be beleued, or call vpon in your miserie? What wordes, and lamentable gesture will yee henceforth use, to moue compassion? Surely yee haue alreadie wasted all your forces of persuasion, and shall not againe deuiue vs, if yee refuse the grace, whereof at the present ye are capable. It is no maruell though the Carthaginians were angry, when they heard themselves vpbraid with the base demeanour of their Embassadors. For it was not the generall opinion of the Citie, that the Truce was broken by themselves: though it had pleased Hanno, or such as were of his Faction, to gratifie the Romans with all manner of submission; and to renounce not onely their hope of the future, but all iustification of matters past. And indeed it seemed, that the Roman Embassadors were verie much delighted, in the rehearsal of that point which was yielded vnto them; as knowing that thereon depended the iustice of the quarrell. But the Carthaginians tooke this in so ill part, that hardly they could refrain from doing violence vnto the men, who had vsed vnto them such insolent speeches. Yet the furie of the multitude was in some sort appeased; eyther by Hanno, whom Appian (I know not why) calls Hanno the great, or by the verie reuerence, due vnto the place of those that had uttered such libellous words. So they were dismissed in friendly sort; though it were without answer to their Proposition. There were also two Gallies appointed for their safe Conuoy home; though with little intent of good vnto their persons. Asdrubal was then in the mid-way, as men sailed from Carthage towards Vicia. Hee, whether onely desirous to please the Multitude, of whose disposition he was informed; or whether directed by publicke order, to cut off these Embassadors in their way homeward: lay waiting for them behind a Cape, that was a little beyond the mouth of the Riuer Bagradas. Their Conuoy hauing brought them on the way, as farre as to the mouth of Bagradas, wished them a good Voyage; and so tooke leaue of them, as if they had bene then in safetie; since the Roman Campe was euen in sight. The Embassadors tooke this in ill part: not as fearing any danger toward; but thinking themselves too much neglected, forasmuch as their attendants did so abruptly leaue them. But no sooner had they doubled the Cape, than Asdrubal fell vpon them in such manner, as they might well discern his purpose, which was, to haue hemmed them. They rowed hard therefore; and being in a Quinquereme, that had more banks of Oares, than had any Gallie of Asdrubal they slipped away, and made him ouer-shoot himselfe. Yet he gaue them chase; and had well neare surprised them. But they discouered some

Roman Companies on the shore ouer against them, and therefore aduentured to run their vessell aground: whereby they laued their owne liues; though a great part of their companie were slaine, or hurt. This practise of the Carthaginians was inexcusable: and for the same cause perhaps were the Citizens heartened in such a dishonourable attempt, by those that were desirous to continue the warre; that thereby they might be driuen to studie nothing else, than how to get the victorie, as hauing none other hope remaining. Yet likely it is, that the same feare, which had caused them to make such earnest suit for peace, would also haue caused them to be better aduised, than thus to abandon all hope of Treatie: had they not bene giuen to vnderstand, that Hannibal was alreadie landed in Africke, in whom they reposed no final confidence; but verily perfwaded themselves, that he would change their fortune, and teach the Romans to hold themselves contented with more easie conditions, than were those that Scipio, in the pride of his fortune, had of late propounded.

§. XX.

In what sort Hannibal spent the time after the battaile of Metaurus. The doings of Mago in Italie. Hannibal and Mago called out of Italie.

How the Romans were diuersly affected by Hannibal.

Romans affected.

Ever since the losse of that battaile at Metaurus, Hannibal remained in the Countrey of the Britains; waiting for another supplie from Carthage. The Roman Consuls that succeeded vnto Claudius and Linus, by whom Asdrubal was overcome and slaine, were contented to bee quiet all their yeare. Neither did Leinius the Colleague of Scipio ought worthe of remembrance against Hannibal: being hindred by the pestilence that was in his Armie. Sempronius the Consul who followed Leinius, and Cn. Ser-

apilius Cæpio, who followed Sempronius, were earnestly bent to haue done somewhat: but their diligence was in a manner fruitlesse. In some skirmishes with Hannibal, they had the better; in some, the worse: and a few poore Townes they got from him, as it were by stealth; his care being more to preferre his Armie, than to keepe those places that were weak.

The Romans had at this time so manie great pieces of worke in hand, that their chiefe enemy was become, not the chiefe part of their care. Their thoughts were mainly bent vpon Africke, wherein they were at no final charges to maintain the Armie, which (as was hoped) should bring the warre to a short and happie conclusion. They stood neuertheless in much feare of Mago, the brother of Hannibal: who tooke exceeding paine among the Ligurians and Gauls to raise an Armie, wherewith to kindle anew the warre in Italie, that beganne to waxe cold. Mago solicited also the Hætrurians; and found them so ready to stirre in his behalfe, that if he could haue entred their Countrey strong, it might haue proued no lesse needfull for Scipio to return home out of Africke, than shortly it was for Hannibal, to make speed vnto the defence of Carthage. These dangers caused the Romans to employ one of their Consuls, or Proconsuls, with an Armie, among the Hætrurians; another among the Gauls; and a third among the Ligurians: forasmuch as it was vncertaine, vpon which side Mago would breake out. Being thus busied, it is no wonder though they forbore to ouercharge Hannibal with any great power.

As for Mago, when things were in some readines for his setting forwards, he met in the Countrey of the Insabrians, which is about Adrian, with M. Cornelius the Roman Proconsul, and P. Quintilius Varus one of the Pretors. With these he fought a battaile, wherein though his vertue shewed it selfe worthe of his father and brethren; yet his fortune was Carthaginian. The fight continued a long while doubt-

full in such sort that the Roman Commanders began to distrust the issue. Wherefore Quintilius the Prætor, taking vnto him all the Roman Horle, thought to haue shaken the Enemies to peeces. T he Legions at the same time gaue a loud shout and strained themselves hardy as if at that brunt the victorie should haue beene carried before them. But Mago opposed his Elephants to the Horle: the seruice of those beafts being fitter for such vic, than against the Squadrons of Foot. T he figure, sent, and braying of those Elephants, did so affright the Horle, that they started aside, and were scattered ouer the field; their Riders being vnable to mannaue them. Herby the Numidians got aduantage vpon them: whose manner of fight was more auailable against those that were loose, than against the Troups that were close and thick. T hen fel the Elephants vpon the Legions: which entertained them after the accustomed manner, with a thowre of darts, and killed foure of them; causing all the rest to giue backe. T his notwithstanding, the same Legions were so vehemently pressed by the Enemy; that more for shame of running away, than by any great force to make resistance, they held their ground. T he Proconsul therefore brought vp those forces, which he had kept vnto the last, to succour where need should most require. Against these Mago employed some of his Gauls, whom hee had in readinesse for the like occasion. But these Gauls discharged their parts very ill. They were soone beaten off; and recoiled so hastily, that they brought feare vpon all the rest. When Mago saw that his men began to shrink, hee put himselfe in the head of his Armie; and held them to well to it, that keeping their order, they made a faire Retreat, with their faces toward the Enemy. But at length hee receiued a greivous wound in his thigh; whereof shortly after hee dyed. Hee was taken vp, and carried out of danger by some of his owne men: the rest of them, after little further resistance, prouided euery one for himselfe: So the Romans obtained victorie, notwithstanding great cost; as purchasing the death of about five thousand enemies, with the losse of two thousand and three hundred of the Prætors Armie, besides those that dyed of the Proconsuls Legions; also besides diuers Colonells, Captaines, and Gentlemen of mark; that fell in this hote peece of seruice. Neyther were there any prisoners taken; whereby it may seeme that the Enemies did not fall to rout, before they had recovered some ground that might assure them from pursuit. Howeuer it were, this victorie would haue much imported for the assurance of Italy, if the State of Carthage could longer haue permitted these valiant sones of Amilcar to abide therein. But Mago with drawing himselfe (by calic iourneys, because of his wound) into Liguria, found there Embassadors from Carthage attending him: who gaue him to vnderstand the pleasure of their Cite, which was, T hat both hee and Hannibal should presently repaire home with all their forces; not slaying any longer to thinke vpon the conquest of Italy, since Carthage it selfe was ready to bee lost. He obeyed this Commandement, and embarked shortly his Armies; but dyed of his wound about Sardinia, in the way homeward.

About the same time Hannibal receiued the like command from Carthage to returne into Africa. He heard it with great patience; gnawing his teeth, and growning, and hardly keeping in the teares, that were ready to burst out, whilst the Embassadors were deliuering their errand. When their message was done, hee told them, T hat this was yet plain dealing. For, said he, They that now directly bid me come home, haue long agoe done their best to hale me out of Italy; though more closely and crookedly they went to worke, by stopping the supply, that should haue enabled me to mannaue the Warre here. Scipio therefore shall not need to bragge, that hee hath done me home by the beel: it is Hannibal, that hath wrought this wile feat, and overwhelmed the House of the Numidians, for lacke of other means to doe it, with the wine of Carthage. Hee had before prepared a Fleete in readinesse, doubting that, which after came to passe: wherein hee embarked, besides his owne men, as many of the Italians, as were content to be partners of his fortune. Many there were that shrunke backe from him, and refused to doe seruice in this Expedition: of whom such as hee could take take he slew; not sparing those that fled into the Temple of Iuno Lacinia, which had been held an inuolable Sanctuarie vnto that day. Hee was indeed then wholly transported with rage; and departed out of Italy no lesse passionate, than men are wont to bee, when they leaue their owne Countreies to goe into exile. Hee looked backe vnto the shore: accusing both gods and men; and cursing his owne dulnesse, in that hee had not led his Armie from Canna, hote and blouded as it was, directly vnto the wals of Rome. With such vexation of spirit hee quitted the possession of Italy; wherein hee had liued almost halfe his time.

If it could haue beene foretold vnto the Romans, in the first beginning of this war, with what exceeding joy in times following they should entertaine the newes of Hannibal his departure out of Italy: they would (I thinke) lesse earnestly haue pressed the Carthaginians to send him ouer thither. When sure aduertisement was brought vnto the Cite, that Hannibal was gone with all his Armie: an Holiday was appointed for thanksgiving vnto their gods; & extraordinary great sacrifices publickly made, for joy of such happie tidings. Yet old Q. Fabius was of opinion, That the danger did still remaine the same, though the place were changed: for that Hannibal, at his comming into Africa, would finde P. Scipio other manner of worke, than hee had beene troubled with at any time before; and would doe greater matters in his owne Countreie, than euer he was able to performe abroad in a land of strangers. The remoue of the warre from their owne doores, and the conceit of that victorie for which they hoped; was enough to make them presume further, than at other times they would haue done. When therefore the Saguntine Embassadors brought vnto them a great masse of Golde and Siluer, together with some Agents of the Carthaginians taken by them in Spain: onely the Carthaginian prisoners were accepted; the treasure was rendred backe vnto the Saguntines that had surprised it. Vpon like confidence of the future, a little before this, order was taken for the repayment of those monies, that had beene borrowed at time of inore necessity from priuate men. Hence also proceeded the seuer chastisement, laid vpon those twelve Colonies, that for want of cyther of meynes, or of good will, had refused to giue aid to the Romans. They were commanded, and enforced to giue double the number of Foot to that which they had beene wont to set out for the warres, with a proportion of Horse answerable to the vertie most of their ability. So confident were the Romans growne (though their wealth were not as yet successe to the greatness of their spirit) vpon the good successe of the Battaille at Metaurus; and the hopes which they reposed in Scipio. All this notwithstanding; when they considered more nearly of that which might happen; and were informed, that the terrible Armie, wherewith Italy had beene few dayes since discharged, was landed safe in Africa: they began to reuolue a thousand fearefull matters in their heads, and to stand in doubt, lest Q. Fabius (who did about the same time) would be found a true Prophet. For be-
 40 thinking themselves of that which might comfort them in their hopes: they found in the victories against Syphax and Asdrubal no specialite of such great worth, as might promise the like successe against another manner of General; followed by other manner of men, than were cyther of those two. The Numidian King had beene wont to bring into the field a rascaill multitude of halfe scullions, that were good for nothing; being himselfe a fit Captaine for such souldiours. Likewise Asdrubal, the sonne of Gisco, was a Commander well thought of by the Carthaginian Senate; but otherwise one, that in the field was only good at fauing himselfe by a swift retreat. But now there came an Armie of men hardened from their child-hood with incredible patience, flished many hundred times in Roman blond, 50 and wearing the spoiles not onely of good souldiours, but of braue Captaines, by them slaine. Such talke vsed the people of Rome, saying, T hat Scipio was like to meet in battaille, with many that had slaine Roman Prætors, yea and Consuls, with their owne hands; with many, that had beene first in getting ouer the Trenches of seuerall Roman Campes, or in winning the tops of wals at the siege of Townes; briefly, that that he should now bee opposed by an Armie, as good as had euer serued in warre, and following the dreadfull Name of Hannibal.

§. XXI.

HANNIBAL in Affricke prepares to fight with Scipio, treats with him about peace in vaines, loseth a battaile at Nadasgara, and perswades the Carthaginians to sue for peace. Of the peace granted from Rome to Carthage.

HANNIBAL disembarked his Armie at Leptis, almost an hundred miles from Carthage, Eastward from the Headland of Mercurie, and somewhat more than one degree to the South. He was ill provided of Horse; which it was not easie for him to transport out of Italie. Therefore it becomed him to land, as he did, somewhat farre from the Enemy; that he might furnish himselfe with this and the like needfull helpes, against the day of battaile. From Leptis he passed on to Adrumetum, and so along through the In-land Countrey; gathering friends vnto him by the way. Tychæus a Numidian Prince, and familiar friend of Syphax, was said to haue in those dayes the best Horses of kruice, that were to be found in Affricke. Him therefore did Hannibal allure vnto his partie: making him vnderstand, that if the Romans got the victorie, it should bee easie for Masaniissa, by their countenance and helpe to oppress both him, and as manie other of the neighbour Princes as hindred his prospect. This Argument, and the fame of him that vled it, prevailed with Tychæus; who shortly after brought vnto the Carthaginian two thousand Horse. Appian further addes, That Mezetulus, (the same who had made himselfe Protector ouer Masaniissa his Colens; and was Head of a Family, and aduerseto the Numidian Kings of that race) brought vnto Hannibal another thousand Horse: as likewise that Vermis the sonne of Syphax, holding a great part of his Fathers Kingdome, began at the same time to assaile the places that yielded obedience to Masaniissa. This Vermis, as we finde in Liuit, came with more than sixteene thousand men (for he lost more than so manie) to succour Hannibal when it was too late.

The Carthaginians were at this time in such hard estate, or (at least) so impatient of the state wherein they were; that they could not attend the leisure of thoe preparations, which would haue made the victorie assured. When they considered the worth of Hannibal, and the greatnesse of his Aids: it offended them to thinke, that they had beene so base, as to make humble suit vnto the Romans for Peace; whilst they had such a braue Champion aloue, to maintain their cause by warre. But when they both thought themselves of their owne sufferings, which, for want of Roman magnanimitie to endure them, appeared greater than indeede they were: then cried they out earnestly, that it was no time to linger, but presently to fight; that so they might see an end of these troubles, eyther good or bad. And to this purpose, they sent their Mandates to Hannibal: requiring him, without any further protraction, to doe what he could doe out of hand. Hannibal made answer, That they were his good Lords, and had power to dispose of him and his Armie: but since hee was General of their forces, He thought it reasonable, that they should suffer him to doe as a General ought to doe; and to chioose his owne times. Neuerthelesse, to giue them satisfaction, Hee made great marches to Zama; and there encamped.

The breach of Truce, made by the Carthaginians: The violence, done to his Embassadours; and the newes of Hannibal his being landed in Affricke; made Scipio to vnderstand the resolution of the Carthaginians, which was, not to yeeld vnto any conditions vnprofitable for themselves, as long as they were able to make resistance. Wherefore hee sent vnto Masaniissa: and informed him of all that was fallen out; praying him to come away with speed, and lay all other buisnesse a-part. Ten Roman Companies, of Horse and Foot together, Masaniissa had with him; that were lent vnto him by Scipio, to doe him seruice in the establishing and enlarging of his Kingdome. But he well vnderstood, that thoe and many more besides all his owne forces would little auail him; if Hannibal should driue the Romans out of Affricke. Wherefore taking such order as he could vpon the sudden, for the safety of his owne Kingdome; with foure thousand Horse, and sixethousand Foot, hee made all hast vnto Leptis.

Soone after the beginning of these new troubles, the Carthaginian Embassadours that had been at Rome, returned backe vnder the conduct of Laelius and Fulsius: who brought them safe into the Roman Campe. There when they arrived, and vnderstood what had lately passed, especially how their Citizens had behaued themselves towards the Roman Embassadours: they made little doubt, how their owne heads should answer for such notorious outrage. To confirme them in this opinion,

M. Balbus one of the late Embassadours that had beene in Carthage, being left by Scipio to take charge of the Campe, laid hands vpon them, and detained them; sending word vnto his General, who was gone abroad to make warre in the Countrey, that he had them in his power, and that now the Carthaginians might be repaid in their owne Coyne, for the iniurie by them lately done. Scipio was very glad to heare of this; and commanded Balbus to vse them with all possible courtesie, and send them safe home. By thus doing He brake the hearts of his Enemies; and caused them to acknowledge themselves, (which was a great victorie) farre lesse honourable than the Romans. This notwithstanding, He made more cruell warre vpon them than before: taking their Townes by force; and putting them to sacke, without hearking to any Composition. It was the manner of the Romans, as often as they tooke a Towne by assault, to put all that came in their way to the sword, whatsoever they were, without regard. This they did, to make themselves terrible; and the better to worke such impression in the mindes of thoe, with whom they had to doe, they vied oftentimes to kill the verie Dogges and other Beasts, that ranne about them in the streets, heuing their bodies asunder, as men delighted in shedding of blood. This being their practise at other times: it is likely, that now they committed no pece of crueltie; when they meant to giue proofe of their vehement indignation, and reuengefull mindes, for the injuries received. Hence it partly grew, that the Carthaginians were so earnest in pressing Hannibal to fight.

Hannibal being encamped at Zama, sent forth his Scowts and Spies, to discover where the Romans lay; what they were doing; and as much as might be of their demeanour. Some of these were taken, and brought vnto Scipio: who in stead of trassing them vp, gaue them free leave to view his Campe at pleasure; appointing one to conduct them vp and downe, and shew them whatsoeuer they desired. This done, He gaue them libertie to depart; and sent them away safe vnto their General. Liuit vnderstanding this, admired the brauerie and courage of his Enemy: with whom on the sudden he grew desirous to haue an Enter-view, and personall conference; and signified so much vnto him, by a messenger sent of purpose. Of this motion the Roman liked well; and returned answer, that Hee would meet him shortly in place conuenient. The next day Masaniissa came with his Armie: whom Scipio taking with him remoued vnto a Towne called Nadasgara, neare vnto which hee sat downe, in a place otherwise commodious, and close by a water that might opportunely serue his Campe. Thence he sent word vnto the Carthaginian, That the time and place did sitly serue, if He had ought to say to him. Hannibal thereupon remoued from Zama, and came within foure miles of the Enemy: where hee encamped well to his owne good liking in all things else; excepting that his men were driuen to take much paines, in fetching their water somewhat farre off. Then was order taken for their meeting: and the two Generals, each of them with a troupe of Horse,

Horfe, rode forth of their Campes, till they came vnto a peece of ground, which was before well searched, for feare of ambush. There they will their followers to stand off: and themselves, with each of them one Interpreter, encountered each other in the mid-way betwene their Companies. They remained a while silent, viewing one the other with mutuall admiration. Then beganne the Carthaginian, saluting the Roman, to deliuer his minde to this effect: That it had bene better both for Carthage and for Rome, if they could haue limited and contained their ambition within the shores of Africke: and of Italie; for that the Countries of Sicill and of Spaine, about which their fathers and themselves had striven, were no sufficient recompence for so manie Cities as had bene lost, and of so much blood as had bene shed, in making those costly purchases. But since things past could not bee recalled: He said, That it was meet for them to confider, vnto what extreme dangers their owne Cities had bene exposed, by the greedie desire of extending their Empires abroad; and that it was euen time for them now at length, to make an end of their obstinate contention, and pray the gods to endue them with greater wisdom hereafter. And to such peaceable disposition He affirmed that his owne yeares, and long trial of Fortune both good and euill, had made him inclinable. But much he feared, that Scipio, by want of the like experience might rather fixe his mind vpon vn certaine hopes, than vpon the contemplation of that mutabilitie, whereto all humane affaires are subiect. Yet (said He) mine owne example may peraduenture suffice to teach thee moderation. For I am that same HANNIBAL, who after my victorie at Cannae 10 wanne the greatest part of Italie: and denised with my selfe, what I should doe with your Citie of Rome; which I hoped verily to haue taken. Once I brought mine Armie to your walls, as thou hast since brought thine to ours of Carthage: but now see the change! I stand here entreating thee to grant vs peace. This may serue as a document of Fortunes infabilitie. I fought with thy Father, SCIPIO: He was the first of the Roman Generals, that euer met mee in the field. I did then little thinke; that the time would come, that I should haue such businesse, as now at the present, with his sonne. But this is euen one of Fortunes Pageants, wherof wee hath many. And thou maist haue experience of the like in thy selfe, who knowest how soone? Thinke vpon M. ATTILIVS. If hee would haue hearkened vnto such persuasions, as I now vs to thee he might haue returned home to Rome: an happy man. And so maist thou doe now, if any reasonable offer will giue thee satisfaction. How maist thou? Canst thou bee contented, that all Spaine, Sicill, Sardinia, and what soeuer islands are situate betwene Italie and Africke, be abandoned by the Carthaginians; for euer; and left vnto the Romans, to beare Dominion therein? Thou shalt haue cloie enough by effecting thus much: and the Romans may well be glad of such a bargain. As for vs: our owne quiet shall henceforth giue vs contentment. And the same contentment of ours, shall make vs faithfully observe the Peace with you. But if thou thinkest all too little, I must desire thee to ponder well how great an hazard thou must undergoe, for the obtaining of a verye little more, than that which thou maist haue without contention. It is now in thine owne power, to lay hold vpon good Fortune, if it please thee: stay but till to morrow night, and thou must take such fortune, as it shall please the gods. The issue of battaile is vn certaine, and many times beguileth expectation. Non and Steele we shall each of vs bring into the field: but of the victorie, neither of vs hath assurance. Let vs therefore without more a doe, make peace. And doe not telme, that some false-hearted Citizens of ours deale fraudulently of late in the like Treatie: It is HANNIBAL that now desire peace with thee, which I would neuer doe, if I thought it not expedient for my Countrey. And thinking it expedient, I will alwayes maintaine it: like as I haue maintaine vnto my power, as long as the gods did not enuie mee, the Warre by mee begunne. Hereunto Scipio made answer, That it was no ambitious desire of ruling in Sicill and in Spaine, which had moued the Romans to enter into this or the former Warre: but that the delence of the Mamertines, and afterwards of the Signatures, their confederates, had caused them to put on those armes; which the gods by the final issue of the Warres had approued, and would approue to be most iust. As for the mutabilitie of Fortune: he said, that he was not thercof ignorant; and that without any note of infolence, or ouer-weening, he might well refuse the conditions offered. For was it not plaine, that all those Countreies, with which the Carthaginians now so willingly departed, were alreadye yonne from them by the Romans? If, said Hee, these Countreies had bene propounded whilst as yet ye detained some part of Italie; they might peraduenture not haue bene reiected. But as the case now standis, I see no reason, why I should remit vnto you any one peece of those my former demands; to which the Carthaginians haue yielded alreadie, and thought mee to deale graciously in being so moderate. Rather I say, that the injuries which they haue done me since, haue made them vnworthe of obtaining peace. I open so freely my termes. But I cannot blame thee, HANNIBAL, though thou wouldst be glad to make thy Citizens vnderstand, from how much of their burden they are by thy meane 10 eased. Only thou must thinke, that in like sort it consernes me in honour, not to let them bee garmers or sauers by the wrongs which they haue done of late. Thou knowest well, that besides these offers which thou here hast made, they were well contented to restore vnto vs ranfome-free all prisoners that they haue of ours; to pay vs five thousand Talents; to deliuer vp their Gallies; and to deliuer hostages for assurance of faire dealing. And must they now be disgarded of all this, by their breach of Truce, then sitting of our Fleet, and their violating our Enuall sieges? Not so. But if they can be contented, besides all this, to make such amends as I shall require, for these injuries newly done: then wilt take aduise with my Counsel: what answer to give you; otherwise, you may euen prepare for warre, and blame your-

Hereupon they brake off: and returned each to his owne Campe, with no other newes than warre; bidding their Souldiours prepare for a battaile, wherein should be decided the quarrell betwene Rome and Carthage. The next morning at breake of day they issued into the field: a notable Match, and such as hath verye fewe bene found; whether we regard the Generals; their Armies: the two Cities that contended; or the great importance of the battaile at hand. Scipio ordered his men after the Roman manner: placing first the Hastati, diuided into their Maniples, or small Battalions, with a reasonable distance betweene them: Not farre behind these followed the Principes, likewise diuided; and so after them the Triarii. But herein 30 Scipio altered a little the ordinarie custome of the Romans: He placed not the Maniples of his Principes opposite vnto the void spaces betweene the Hastati, that so the Hastati, as was vsuall, might fall backe betweene the Principes; but hee placed them directly one behind another, as it were in File. This Hee did becaufe of the Elephants; wherof Hannibal had many. For of those beastes the danger was lesse, whilst there was open way to let them through. Therefore hee tooke such order, that when they had passed through the spaces betweene the first Battalions, they should not come vpon the Principes in Front. Vnto his Velites or those of the light armature, that were to beginne the fight, Hee gaue direction, that when they found themselves ouer-charged, eyther by the Enemies, or (which was most to be feared) by the Elephants, they should runne backe through those lanes that were be-
40 tweene the Maniples: and that those which were swift, or otherwise best able, should continue on their flight, untill they were got behind all their owne Armies; then by leaving roome enough vnto those that were wounded, or cast behind, to face them selues on the void ground, that was betwixt the first and second, or the second and third Battalies, without cloying by the way betwene the Maniples, which he desired tooke open. His Italian Horse he placed in the left wing vnder C. Lelivs. In the right wing was Masaniassa with his Numidians. He himselfe riding 50 downe, exhorted his men to doe valiantly: viling words not many, but verie forcible. He bade them remember what they had achieved, since their coming to that victorie in this warre, should make them Lords of all the World; for that afterwards, none would be found able to resist them. On the contrary, if they were beaten, he asked them whether they would fly. They were farr from home; yea and farr from their owne standing Campe: neyther was there any place in

Africk, that would giue them shelter; if they fell into the Carthaginians hands, they knew what to expect. And therefore there was none other way, but Death or Victory: vnlesse they would liue like wretched slaues vnder most mercedlesse Enemies. In such necessity, he said, that they which consider themselves to be, and take resolution vnwonderable thereunto, haue neuer bene knowne to faile of getting victory.

Hannibal on the other side placed his Elephants, that were more than fourscore, in front of his Battaille. Next behinde these, he made his Vanguard all of Mercenaries, Ligurians, Gauls, Baleares, and Moorers. Then followed his Battaille: which was of Carthaginians and Africans, more interested in the quarrell than were those Mercenaries; though not so good souldiers; but to helpe (if it might be) their want of courage, they had with them four thousand Macedonians, lately sent from King Philip. More than the space of a furlong behinde these came his Rereward, consisting of those braue Souldiers which had serued him in his Italian warres; and were the onely men, in whom he reposed any confidence. Opposite to Lelium, in his own right wing he bestowed the Carthaginian Horse. Tycheus and the Numidians he placed in his left wing against Masaniissa. He was indeede farre too weake for the Enemy in Horse, both in number and in goodnesse. For Tycheus and Alectallus had no more than three thousand; and those not so well exercised, as were the four thousand of Masaniissa. The Carthaginians also were no more, nor none other than such as could be leuiued in the halfe of a few daies; and the remainder of those, that had of late bene often vanquished, and accustomed to flee. But it was no time for Hannibal, neither had he perhaps authoritie, to make these his companions alight and serue on foot, setting better men in their saddles. All that he could haue done, was to lay a little longer, and expect more helpe. Had Terminus the sonne of Syphax come thither, as he did in few daies after, with sixteene thousand and upwards, the most of them Horse: the aduantage of number might haue serued wel to supplie all other defect. Yet since the Lords of Carthage would brooke no delay: Hannibal must be faine to comfort himselfe, with the hope that he reposed in his old Italian Souldiers; whose vertue had wrought greater wonders, when it was more strongly opposed. He encouraged therefore his men, with words agreeable to their feuerall conditions: promising vnto the Mercenaries bountifull rewards: threatening the Carthaginians with inescuttable seruitude, if they lost that day; but especially animating his old fellow-souldiers, by the many victories which they had obtained against farre greater numbers. He bade them to looke vpon the Enemies; and make estimate, whether they were any thing like so many, as that huge Armie which they had slaughtered at Cannæ. He willed them to remember, that it was one P. Scipio, euen the father of this man, whom they had first of all compelled to runne away. He told them, that these Legions which they yonder beheld, were, for the most part of them, the very worst of the Roman Souldiers; euen such, as for their dastardly flight out of sundrie battailes, could no longer be trusted to beare Armes in their owne Countreie. As for the rest: they were yong men, the sonnes of Cowards, and bred vp in the continuall feare of those weapons, by which their fathers were daily slaine or chased. Wherefore he entreated these his old companions, vpon whose vertue he meant wholly to repose himselfe, that they would this day strue to make good their honour; and to purchase the fame of men invincible.

Such exhortations vfed the two Generalls before the fight. When they drew neare together: the Numidian Horsemen on both sides beganne to skirmish. The Trumpets, and other instruments of warre, founded to battaille: and Hannibal commanded his Elephants to breake vpon the Romans. Of these Elephants (as they were alwayes an vncertaine kinde of helpe) those that stood neare vnto the point of the left wing, turned backe for feare: and ranne vpon their owne Numidian Horse; which they affrighted and disordered. Masaniissa espying this, gaue charge vpon the same Numidians; and not suffering them to re-allie themselves, draue them quite out of the field. The rest of those beasts made a great spoile of the Roman Velites, whom they

they followed into the spaces betweene the Maniples: but without any harme to the Battalions themselves; which gaue them open way, according as Scipio had well provided. Diuers of them receiving many wounds, and growing therewith furious, could no longer be gouerned: but ranne backe vpon the right point of their owne battaille, and beyond that into the open field. Herewithall they disordered the Carthaginian Horse which were in that wing: against whom they gaue to Lelius the same aduantage, that Masaniissa had against the Numidians; which he vfed in like sort. In the meane while, the Battels of foote aduanced, and drew neare together with a slow and stately pace, till they were almost within a weapons cast: at what time they gaue a shout, and ran one at the other. The Mercenaries for a time seemed both in audacitie, and in quicknesse, to haue the better of the Romans; wounding many, and doing more harme, than they tooke. But the Roman discipline after a while, preuailed against the boisterous violence of these vntrained Barbarians. Whereunto it helped not a little, that the battell of the Principes, following somewhat neere after the Hastati, encouraged their fellows; and shewed themselves ready, if neede were, to relieue them. Contrariwise, the Mercenaries received no manner of helpe or comfort from those that should haue seconded them. For the new-leiued Carthaginians and Africans, when they saw their hire' souldiers giue backe, did also themselves retire. This caused the Ligurians, Gauls, and the rest, to thinke themselves betrayed: whereupon they inclined vnto flight. The Carthaginian Battaille was herewith more terrified than before, so as it refused to giue way vnto the Mercenaries for their safe retreat; and yet withall forbore to make head against the enemies, that pursued them. It was no time to aske them what they meant by this: Feare and Indignation caused those that were at once chased by the Romans, and betrayed, as they thought, by their owne fellows, to turne their armes with an heedlesse furie against both the one and the other. Thus were many of the Carthaginians beaten downe and slaine, through their owne indiscretion, by their owne Mercenaries. The Roman Hastati in like sort, fighting with desperate men in a drong, had their hands so full of worke; that the Principes were faine to come vp vnto them, and helpe to ouer-bear this great medley of enemies; that were together by the cares among themselves. In this place was made a great slaughter, both of the Mercenaries and of the Carthaginians: which hindring one another, could neither fight, nor easily flee. Such of them as escaped, ran towards Hannibal: who kept his ground, and would not stirre one foote, to helpe or save these Runne-awaies. He caused his men to bend their Pikes at those of his owne side, that would haue rushed vpon him: whom he thereby compelled to turne aside beyond his Battaille, and slue themselves in the open field. The ground, ouer which the Romans were now to march, ere they could meete with Hannibal, was couered with such thicke heapes of dead bodies and weapons, and so slippery with blood: that Scipio began to stand in great doubt, lest the orders of his Battalions should be dissolved in passing that way. In such case, if he should fight with that warlike Armie, which he saw before him, remayning yet entire, and without feare expecting him; He might be well assured to receiue a notable ouerthrow. He caused therefore the Hastati to make a stand there where they were, opposite vnto the maine battaille of the Hannibalsians. Then drawing vp his Principes and Triarii: He placed them, when they had ouercome the bad way, all in one front with the Hastati, and made of them his two Corners. This done, he aduanced towards Hannibal: who entertained him after another manner, than euer he had bene receiued in his life before. All the daies worke till now, seemed to haue bene onely a matter of pastime; in regard of the sharpe conflict, that was maintained betweene these notable souldiers. The Romans were encouraged, by their hauing preuailed all the day before: They were also farre the more in number. But these old souldiers of Hannibal were firer; and (perhaps) the better men. They fought with such obstinate resolution, that no man gaue backe one foote; but rather chose to die vpon the ground, whereon he stood. So that, at

after a long time, it was vncertaine which part had the worse: vnlesse it may seeme, that the Romans were beginning to shrinke; forasmuch as the returne of Masaniissa and Lelius from pursuit of the Enemies Horse, is said to haue bene most happy, and in a needfull time. These vpon the fudden charged the Hannibalsians in Rere, and ouer-bearing them by meere violence, compelled them to fall to Rout.

In this Battaille there dyed of the Romans fiftene hundred and vppwards: on the Carthaginian side, about twentie thousand, besides as many that were taken; of whom, Sepater Captaine of the Academians, was one. The singular skill that Hannibal shewed in this his last fight, is highly commended by Polybius; and was acknowledged, as Liuius reports, by Scipio himselfe. But the Enemies were too strong for him in Horse: and being enioyned, as hee was, by the flate of Carthage to take battaile with such disadvantage, he could worke no maruels. He saued himselfe with a few Horse; and staid not in his iourne, till he came to Adrumetum. Thence was he sent for to Carthage, from which he had bene absent fixe and thirtie yeares. At his coming into the Senate He said plainly, That there was none other way left, than to take such peace as could be gotten. Wherefore the Carthaginians, not knowing what other course to take, refused to send Embassadors againe; and trie the fauour of Scipio, whose armies they could not now resist.

Scipio hauing spoiled the Enemies Campe, returned lacke to Vtica: where hee found P. Lentulus newly arrived, with fiftie Gallies and an hundred Shippes of burden. With this Fleet, and that which hee had before, Hee thought it best to make towards Carthage: rather of purpose to terrifie the Citie, than with any hope to take it. His Legions he committed vnto Cn. Ottavius; whom he willed to meet him there by land. Then sending Lelius away to Rome with newes of the victorie, He set saile from Vtica towards Carthage. Hee was encountered on the way by ten Embassadors from the Citie: who bearing vp with the Admirall Gallie, beganne to vie the pittifull gesture of suppliants. But they receiued none other answer, than that they should meet him at Tunes, where He would giue them audience. So rowing along before the Citie: and viewing it more in brauerie, than with meaning to attempt it; He returned backe to Vtica, and called backe Ottavius thither, with whom in person Hee set forwards to Tunes. As they were in their iourne thither, they heard the newes, that Vermina the sonne of Syphax, was coming with an Armie of more Horse than Foot, to the succour of those that were already vanquished. This Vermina seemes to haue bene both carelesse of getting intelligence how things passed, and very defectiue in all other duties requisite in the Commander of an Armie. Part of the Roman Foot, with all their power of Horse, was sent against him: which did not only beat him, but so compasse him in, that hee hardly escaped himselfe with a few; leauing fiftene thousand of his followers dead behinde him, and twelue hundred taken prisoners. If this good companie had bene with Hannibal at Thalagara, they should haue bene farre better conducted, and might well haue changed the Fortune of the day; which the Carthaginian lost, by default of Horse. But God had otherwise determined. It is not to bee doubted, that this victorie, thought were no great access vnto the former; yet serued well to daunt the Carthaginians, and imprint in them the greater feare of Scipio. When he came to Tunes, there met him thirtie Embassadors from Carthage: whose behaviour though it was more pittifull than it had bene before; yet procured it lesse commiseration, by reason of their late false dealing, after they had in like sort humbled themselves. Neuertheless it was considered, what a long and laborious worke it would proue, to besiege the mightie Citie of Carthage. And particularly Scipio stood in great doubt, lest the honor of this warre, if it were protracted, should be taken out of his hands; and giuen to one of the Consuls. Cn. Seruilus Capius that Consul who had charge of the warre against Hannibal, at such time as he departed out of Italie: was bold to passe out into the Ile of Sicill (as it were in chace of Hannibal by him terrified and driuen away) with a purpose thence to haue proceeded into Africke, and taken from Scipio the Command of the Armie there. But a Dictator was chosen of purpose, to restrain the ambition of this Consul Seruilus. After him followed Tiberius Claudius, who made suite for the same Prouince of Africke: and was therein so earnest, that though neither the Senate, nor People, would grant him his desire; yet hee needed would be going, procuring only leave of the Senate, that he being Consul might ioyne with Scipio, were it with no more than equall authoritie. But ere Hee could haue his Fleet and all things in a readinesse for the iourne, wherein no man cared to further him: Winter came on, and he was only tost at Sea with foule weather, first vpon the Coast of He-truria, and afterwards by Sardinia; where his Consulship expired, and so he returned home a priuate man. Then came the joyfull newes to Rome, of the victorie obtained against Hannibal, and that the warre was now euen at an end. Yet was Lentulus the new Consul so passionate, in desiring Africke for his Prouince, That he said he would suffer nothing to passe in the Senate, vntill he had first his wil. Much adoe there was about this: and after many contentions, both in the Senate, and before the People, at last it was ordered, That if Peace were granted, it should be granted by Scipio; if the warre continued, Scipio should haue command therein by Land, and the Consul at Sea. The ambition of these men, caused Scipio to giue the more fauourable answer vnto the Carthaginian Embassadors. Hee willed them to consider what they had deserued: and in regard thereof to thinke themselves wel dealt withall, in that he was contented to leaue vnto them their libertie and their own Lawes, without appointing any Governour ouer them, or Garrison to hold them in subiection; leauing also vnto them their possessions in Africke, such as they weare the beginning of this warre. As touching the rest hee was at a point, That, before hee cyther granted them Peace or truce, they should make satisfaction for wrongs which they had done, whilst the late Treatie was in dependence. Hereunto if they would yeld, then required He That immediately they should deliuer vnto the Romans all Prisoners, Englishes, and Romans; that they had of theirs: likewise all their Gallies, excepting tenne; and all their Elephants: that they should make no warre at all thenceforth out of Africke, neither yet within Africke, without licence of the Romans: That the Countreys, Townes, gods whatsoeuer, belonging any wise vnto MASANISSA or to any of his Ancesters, which were in their possession, should bee all by them restored vnto him: That they should finde corne for the Roman Armie, and wages for their Auxiliaries, during the time of Truce, vntill the Peace were fully concluded: That they should pay tenne thousand Talents of Silver, in the terme of fiftie yeares, by two hundred Talents a yeare; and that for obseruance of Conditions, they should giue an hundred hostages, such as Scipio would choose, being none of them vnder foureteene yeares of age, nor above thirtie.

With these conditions the Embassadors returned home, and reported them vnto the Citie. They were verie vnpleasing, and therefore one Gisco stood vp to speake against them: and exhorted the People, who gaue good attention, that they should not condescend vnto such intolerable demands. But Hannibal perceiving this, and noting withall what fauourable audience was giuen to this vaine Oratour, by the vnquiet yet vnwarlike Multitude; was bold to pull him downe from his standing, by plaine force. Hereat all the people murmured; as if their common libertie were too much wronged, by such insolence of this presumptuous Captaine. Which Hannibal perceiving, rose vp and spake vnto them: saying, That they ought to pardon him, if he had done otherwise than the customes of the Citie would allow; forasmuch as he had been thence absent euer since he was a Boy of nine yeares old, vntill he was now a man of fise and fortie. Hauing thus excused himselfe of the disorder, He discoursed vnto them concerning the Peace: and perswaded them to accept it, as wanting abilitie to defend themselves; had the demands of the Enemy bene yet more rigoros. Finally vpon good aduice, they resolved to yeld vnto the Conditions propounded by Scipio: to whom they payed out of hand fise and twentie thousand pound weight of Silver, in recompence of damages, and injuries by them done to his Fleet and Embassadors. Scipio granted them Truce for three moneths, in which time they might negotiate with the State of Rome, about confirmation of the League. But herewithall Hee gave injunction, that they should neither in the meane while send Embassadors any whither else, nor yet dismisse any Embassadors to them sent, without first making him acquainted what they were, and what their errand was.

At this time Hanniball, and they of his Faction, were become wile and honourable men, by the miseries wherinto Carthage was fallen through their malicious Counsailes. Afrubal, surnamed the Kid, a venerable man, and great friend of Hanno, was chiefe of the Embassages which they sent to Rome for obtaining peace. They went thither in companie of Scipio his Embassadors, who related vnto the Senate and People thes joyfull newes. About the same time arrived at Rome Embassadors from Philip King of Macedon: who, together with the Carthaginians, were faine to wait awhile for audience, till the election of new Consuls then in hand was finished, and order taken, for the Prouinces of them, and the new Prætors. Then were the Macedonian Embassadors called into the Senate: who first answering vnto some points, wherein the Romans had lately signified vnto their King that they found themselves grieved; returned the blame vpon those Greekes themselves, that had made their complaint at Rome. Then accused they M. Anclius: who being one of the three Ambassadors, that had lately bene sent from Rome vnto King Philip, tarried in Greece behind his fellows; and there leuying men, made warre vpon the King, without any regard at all of the League, that was betwene him and the Romans. Further they desired of the Senate, That one Sopater, a Macedonian Gentleman, with other of their Countreimen, that had lately serued Hanniball for Pay, and being taken Prisoners in Affrike were kept in bond; by Scipio; might bee released, and deliuered vnto them. Vnto all this M. Furius, whom Aurelius had sent to Rome for that purpose, made a sharpe answer. He said, that the Greekes which were confederate with Rome, endured so many injuries at the hands of Philip, that M. Aurelius was faine to stay behinde, to helpe them as hee might; which else were like to be brought vnder the Kings subiection. As for Sopater: He affirmed him to be one of the Kings Counsaile, and verie inward with him; one that serued not for monie, but carried monie with him, and foure thousand men, sent from the King to the aide of Hanniball. About these points when the Macedonian Embassadors could make vnto the Senate no good answer: they were willed to returne, and tell their Master. That warre hee sought, and warre hee should finde, if hee proceeded as he had begonne. For in two maine pointes He had broken the League, that was betwene him and the Romans: first, in that hee had wronged their Confederates; and secondly, in that hee had aided their Enemies against them with men and monie.

These quarrels with Philip, that promised to open a way into Greece and the Eastern Countries, helped well the Carthaginian Embassadors in their solicitation of Peace. They appeared a verie reuerend companie, when they entred into the Senate: and Afrubal about the rest was much respected, as one, whose good offices had kept the Romans from necessity of sending Embassadors to Carthage, vpon the like errand. He liberally granted, that the iustice of the quarrell had bene wholly on the Romans side; saying that it was the fault of some violent men, through which the Peace was broken. Yet could hee not altogether excuse the Citie; that had been too vehement in the prosecution of bad counsaile. But if Hanno and him selfe might haue had their wils: the Carthaginians, euen at the best of their Fortune, should haue granted the peace which they now desired. Herewithall hee commended the moderation of the Romans, as no small argument of their valour; by which alwaies they had bene victorious. To the same effect Afrubal spake the rest of the Embassadors: all of them entreating to haue the Peace ratified; though some with more lamentable words than others, according to the diuersitie of their stile. They had patience enough enough to endure such reprooche of Perjury, as they themselves might haue laid vpon the Romans; if their diligence and fortune had bene such as the Romans was. Among the rest, when one of the Senators demanded, by what gods they would sweare to keepe the peace hereafter: Afrubal made answer; Euen by the same gods, that are so sweare vnto those that violate their Leagues.

Leuitus the Consul interposing the authoritie of his Office, would haue hindered the Senate from proceeding vnto conclusion of peace; for that hereby Hee was like to loose the honour, which he purposed to get by making warre in Affrike. But the matter was propounded vnto the people, in whom rested the Soueraigne Command of Rome; and by them referred wholly vnto pleasure of the Senate. So it was decreed, That Scipio with tenne Delegates sent vnto him from Rome of purpose, should make a League with the Carthaginians, vpon such Conditions as seemed best: which were none other, than the same which hee had already propounded. For this fauour, the Carthaginian Embassadors humbly thanked the Senate; and craued licence, that they might visite their Countreimen, which were prisoners in Rome; afterwards, that they might ranfome and carrie home with them some, that were their especiall friends; of whom they gaue in writing almost two hundred names. Whereupon the Senate ordained, that two hundred of those Prisoners, which the Embassadors would choose, should be sent ouer into Affrike, and be freely restored to libertie by Scipio, when the peace was fully concluded. So they tooke leaue, and returned home, in companie of the tenne Delegates, that were appointed by the Senate to ioyne with Scipio in Commission.

At their comming into Affrike, the Peace was giuen, and accepted, without any controuersie or disputation. The Prisoners, Fugitiues, and Rencados, were deliuered vp to Scipio; likewise the Gallies, and the Elephants. Scipio tooke more vengeance vpon the Rencados, than vpon the Fugitiues; and vpon those of the Romans, than vpon the Latines or other Italians. The Latines hee beheaded: the Romans hee crucified. About the first payment of their monie, the Carthaginians were somewhat troubled. For though perhaps their common Treasurie could haue spared two hundred Talents for the present: yet since the pension was annuall, and to continue fiftie yeares; it was thought meet to lay the burden vpon the Citizens. At the collecting of the summe there was piteous lamentation, as if now the Roman yoke had begun to pinch them; so as many euen of the Senators, could not forbear weeping. Contrariwise Hanniball could not refrain from laughter. For which when he was checked by Afrubal Hadus and tolde, That it wold of all becomed him to laugh, since he had bene the cause why all others did weep; Hee answered, That laughter did not alwaies proceed from ioy, but sometime from extremitie of indignation. Yet said Hee, My laughter is more reasonable, and lesse absurd, than your teares. For 40 yee should haue wept, when yee gave vp your Shippes and Elephants; and when yee bound your owne hands from the vse of Armes; without the good leaue of the Romans first obtained. This miserable condition keeps vs vnder, and holds vs in assured seruitude. But of these matters yee had no feeling. Now, when a little monie is wrung out of your private purses, yee haue thereof some sence. God grant that the time come not hereafter, wherein yee shall acknowledge, That it was the very least part of your miserie, for which yee haue shed these teares. Thus discoursed Hanniball vnto those, who tasting the bitter fruits of their owne malicious counsaile, repented when it was too late; and in stead of cursing their owne disorders, which had bred this grieuous discale, accused that Phylition, whose noble endeauours had bene employed in procuring the remedie.

So Scipio being to take leaue of Affrike, produced Masaniassa, and magnified him in presence of the Armie, with high commendations not vnderstanded. To him also hee assigned ouer those Townes of King Siphax, which the Romans at that present held; wherein, to say truth, hee gaue him but his due; and that which otherwise he knew not well how to bestow. But the loue of the Romans, and friendship of

Scipio, was fully answerable, now and hereafter, to all the deservings of this Numidian King. About Carthage there rested no more to be done. Wherefore the Romans embarked themselves for Sicily: where when they arrived at Lipheum, Scipio with some part of his Armie tooke his way home to Rome by land; and sent the rest before him thither by Sea. His journey through Italy was no lesse glorious than any Triumph: all the people thronging out of the Townes and Villages, to doe him honour as he passed along. He entered the city in Triumph: neither was there euer before, or after, any Triumph celebrated with so great joy of the people, as was this of Scipio: though, in brauery of the pompe, there were others in time shortly following, that exceeded this. Whether Syphax were carried through the Citie in this Triumph, and died soone after in prison: or whether he were dead a while before; it cannot be affirmed. Thus much may be auowed, That it was a barbarous custome of the Romans, to insult ouer the calamities of mighty Princes, by leading them contumeliously in Triumph; yea though they were such, as had alwaies made faire and courteous war. But herof wee shall haue better example, ere the same Age passe. It was neither the person of Syphax, nor any other glory of the spectacle, that so much beautified the Triumph of Scipio; as did the contemplation of that grievous warre past, whereof the Romans had bene in a manner without hope, that euer they should see Italy free. This made them looke cheerfully vpon the Author of so great a conuersion; and filled them with more ioy, than they would could moderate. Wherefore they gaue to Scipio the Title of the African: filling him by the name of that Province which he had subdued. This honourable kind of surname, taken from a conquered Province, grew afterwards more common, and was usurped by men of lesse desert: especially by many of the Cæsars, who sometimes arrogated vnto themselves the title of Countries, wherein they had performed little or nothing; as if such glorious Attributes could haue made them like in vertue vnto Scipio the African.

THE great similitude found in worldly events, the limitation of matter hath bene assigned as a probable cause. For since Nature is confined vnto a subject that is not vnbounded; the workes of Nature must needs be finite, and many of them resemble one the other. Now in those actions, that seeme to haue their whole dependence vpon the will of man, we are lesse to wonder, if we find lesse variety: since it is no great portion of things which is obnoxious vnto human power; and since they are the same affections, by which the wils of sundry men are ouer-

ner-ruled, in manning the affaires of our daily life. It may be obserued in the change of Empires, before those times whereof we now write, how the Assyrians or Chaldeans invaded the kingdome of the Medes, with two hundred thousand foote and three score thousand horse: but sayling in their intended conquest, they became subiect within a while themselves vnto the Medes and Persians. In like manner Darius, and after him Xerxes, fell vpon the Greekes with such numbers of men, as might haue seemed resistlesse. But after that the Persians were beaten home, their Empire was neuer secure of the Greekes: who at all times of leasure from intestine war deuised vpon that conquest thereof, which finally they made vnder the great Alexander. If Nabuchodonosor with his rough old souldiours, had vnderaken the Medes: or Cyrus with his well trayned Armie, had made the attempt vpon Greece; the issue might, in humane reason, haue bene farre different. Yet would it then haue bene expedient for them, to employ the trauell and vertue of their men, rather than the greatnesse of their names, against those people; that were no lesse valiant, though lesse renowned, than their owne. For the menacing words vied by Cyrus, and some small displeasures done to the Greekes (in which kind it may bee, that Nabuchodonosor likewise offended the Medes and Persians) were not so auailable to victory, as to draw on reuenge in the future. Great Kingdomes, when they decay in strength, suster as did the old Lyon, for the oppression done in his youth; being pinched by the Wolfe, gored by the Bull, yea and kickt by the Ass. But Princes are often carried away from reason, by misse-vnderstanding the language of Fame; and despising the vertue that makes little noise, adventure to prouoke it against themselves; as if were not possible that their own glory should be soyld by any of lesse-noted excellence. Against the same stone, whereat Xerxes, and before him (as I take it) Eumenes, had stumbled; Pyrrhus the Epirot hath dasht his foot. Hee was not indeed the King of all Greece; though molt of make, and a better souldiour than any other Greekish King, when he entered into war against the Romans. This war he vnderooke as it were for his mindes sake; hauing recieued no iniurie; but hoping by the glory of his name, and of the Greekes that seru'd vnder him, to preuaile so easily against the barbarous Romans, that they should only serue as a step to his further intended conquests, of Sicily and Africk. But when the Romans, by their victory against Pyrrhus, had found their owne vertue to be of richer metall, than was the more shining valour of the Greekes: then did all the brauery of the Epirot (his Elephants and whatsoeuer else had seru'd to make him terrible) serue onely to make the Romans, in time following, to thinke more highly of themselves. For since they had overcome the best Warriour in Greece, euen Him, that, being thus beaten by them, could in a yeere after make himselfe Lord of Greece and Macedon: what should hinder them from the conquest of all those vniuersall Provinces, which in compasse of twelue yeeres a Macedonian King of late memory had won? Certainly there was hereunto requisite no more, than to bring to their owne deuotion, by some good meanes, the whole Country of Greece: all the rest, thus done, would follow of it selfe. How to deale with the Greekes, Philip and Alexander had shewed a way: which, or perhaps a better, they might learne, by getting more acquaintance with the Nation.

When therefore the first Punicke war was ended, which followed soone after the wars of Pyrrhus and of the Tarentines: then were the Romans at good leasure to hearken after newes in Greece; and to entertaine any good occasion; that should be on that side presented. They had also then a strong Fleet: and were become, though not otherwise very skillfull Mariners, yet good fighters at Sea. So it fell out as happily as could be wished, that the Libyan Queene Tewis made at the same time cruell war vpon the Greekes: waiting their Country, and sacking their Townes, onely because they were unable to resist, though they had done her none offence. Into this quarrell if the Romans were desirous to enter; the Queene was not slow to giue them cause. And their happy accomplishing of that war which they made with

Her, was, in their owne opinion, a matter not vnworthy to make their Patronage to be desired by the Greekes. But no such thing happened: though they sent Embassadors, as it were to offer themselves; by signifying, that for the loue of Greece they had vndertaken this Illyrian war. Thus began the first acquaintance betwixt the Greekes and Romans: which afterwards increased very hastily, through the indifferencie of King Philip the Macedonian; whose busines with them being now the subiect of our story, it is meet that we should relate (though somewhat briefly) the beginning of his reigne, and his first Actions.

It was like to proue a buisie time in the world, when, within the space of foure yeares, new Kings began to reigne in the most of all Countreies knowne; and three of them yong boyes, in three of the greatest kingdomes. This happened from the third yeere of the hundred thirtieth Olympiad, vnto the third of the Olympiad following. For in this time died Seleucus Ceraunus King of Asia and Syria, in whose roome succeeded his brother Antiochus, afterwards called the great. Ptolemie Philopator succeeded in the Kingdome of Egypt vnto his father Euergetes. And Philip the sonne of Demetrius, being sixteene or seuentene yeeres old, receiued the Kingdome of Macedon, together with the Patronage of the Achaens and most of the Greekes; by the decease of his Vncle Antigonus Dison, that was called the Tutor or Protector. About the same time also was the like change in Cappadocia, Lacedemon, and the Countreies about Mount Taurus. For Ariarathes then began his reigne in Cappadocia. Lycurgus found means to make himself King ouer the Lacedemonians, whose Common-wealth, since the flight of Cleomenes, had continued in a manner headlesse; and Achaus, a kinsman of Antiochus, but a Rebel vnto him, occupied the Regions neare vnto Mount Taurus, and kept a while the state of a mighty King. Lastly, in the second and third yeeres of the hundred and fortieth Olympiad it was, that open warre brake out betwixt Rome and Carthage; and that Annibal began his great Inuasion vpon Italie. Those troubles of the Westerne world, which were indeed the greatest, we haue already followed vnto an end. Of Antiochus, Ptolemie, and the rest, we shal speake hereafter, when the Romans finde them out.

Philip, soone after the beginning of his reigne, came into Peloponnesus; greatly desired of the Achaens, and many others his dependants. That Countrey, hauing freed it selfe by the helpe of Antigonus from the danger (accounted great) of an calie subiection vnto Cleomenes: was now become no lesse obnoxious to the Macedonian, than it should haue bene to the Spartans; and therewithall it lay open vnto the violence of the Aetolians, who despised euen the Macedonian Kings, that were Patrons thereof. These Aetolians were no men to be idle; nor were much addicted to any other Art, than war. Therefore wanting employment, they fell vpon the Messenians, that were their owne Clients, and (excepting the Eleans, that were anciently of their consanguinity) the only good friends which they had at the present in Peloponnesus. Their inuasion was no lesse vnexpected, then it was vnjust; whereby with greater ease they made spoile of the Countrey; finding none prepared to make resistance. The Achaens were called by the Messenians to helpe: which they did the more willingly, because the Aetolians, passing without leaue through their Territory, had (as was their manner) done what harme they listed. Old Aratus could ill abide these Aetolians; as both knowing well their nature, and remembering the injuries, wherewith most vngratfully they had requited no small benefite done to them by the Achaens. He was therefore so hasty to fall vpon this their Armie, that he could hardly endure to stay a few daies vntill the time of his owne Office came; being chosen Pretor of the Achaens for the yeare following. But his anger was greater than his courage: and he shewed himselfe a man fitter (as hath bene already noted of him) for any other seruice, than leading of an Armie. He suffered them to passe quietly along with their bootie, through a great part of the Countrey, wherein he might easily haue distressed them; and afterwards pressed them so neare, when they had recovered ground of aduantage, that they easily defeated all his Armie.

So

So they departed home rich, and well animated to returne againe. As for the Achaens, they got hereby only the friendship of the Messenians: with whom, by licence of King Philip, they made confederacie. Shortly after, the Aetolians inuaded Peloponnesus againe; hauing no more to doe, than to passe ouer the narrow Streights of the Corinthian Bay, called now the Gulfe of Lepanto, where they might land in the Countrey of the Eleans. There ioynd with them in this their second Inuasion a great number of the Illyrians: who neglecting that condition imposed vpon them by the Romans, of setting out no ships of war vnto the Coast of Greece; made bold to seeke aduentures againe, and did great mischief. Demetrius Pharius, a creature of the Romans, commanded a part of these Illyrians: who shortly repented him of this his voyage; which caused him to lose his kingdome, as is shewed before. But this Demetrius went another way, and fell vpon the Ilands of the Cyclades in the Aegean Sea: whence returning, he did some good offices for King Philip or his friends. The rest of the Illyrians vnder Scerdilaidas, or Scerdaites, hauing gotten what they could else where by roving at Sea, accompanied the Aetolians into Peloponnesus: who made greater haucke in the Countrey now, than in their former Expedition; and returned home, without finding any resistance.

Of these things great complaint was made vnto Philip, when he came to Corinth. And because men were desirous to satisfie themselves with some speedy reuenge: there were that vrged to haue some grieuous punishment laid vpon the Lacedemonians: who were thought vnder-hand to haue fauoured the Aetolians, in meere despite of the Achaens and Macedonians, by whom themselves had lately bene subdued. It is true, that the Lacedemonians had bene so affected: and (which was worse) at the arriuall of Philip, they sue such friends of his, as hauing checked their inclination, seemed likely to appeach them of the intended rebellion. Neither durst they wel commit themselves to iudgement: but entreated the King, that he would abstaine from comming to them with an Armie: since their towne was lately much disquieted with ciuill discord, which they hoped soone to appeale, and meant alwaies to remaine at his deuotion. Philip was easily satisfied with this: nor for that he (or rather old Aratus, who then wholly gouerned him) did misse vnderstand the Lacedemonians: but for that a greater worke was in hand, which ought not to be interrupted. There met at Corinth, in presence of the King, the Embassadors of the Achaens, Boeotians, Phocians, Epirots, and Acarnanians: all complying vpon the Aetolians: and desiring to haue war decreed against them, by common assent. Philip sent his letters vnto the Aetolians: requiring them to make ready their answer in some convenient time: if they could alludge any thing in excuse of that which they had done. They returned word, that a Diet should be holden at Rhium for that purpose: whether it pleased him to come or send, hee should be well informed of them and their whole meaning. The King prepared to haue bene there at the day.

But when the Aetolians vnderstood this for certainty, they adourned the Councill vnto a further time: saying, That such weighty matters ought not to be handled, saue in the great Parliament of all Aetolia. This trick of Law notwithstanding, open war was proclaimed against them. And they, as it were to shew how well they had desirued it, made election of Scopas to be their Pretor, that was Author of these inuasions made on Peloponnesus; and the onely man, in a fort, vpon whom they must haue laied the blame of these actions, if they would haue shifted it from the publick.

After this, Philip went into Macedon; where he prepared busily for the warre against the yeere following. He also assayed the Illyrian, Scerdilaidas, with faire words and promises: whom he easily won from the Aetolian side, so far much as the Aetolians had couened him of his share, when he was partner with them in their late robberies. In like sort the Achaens, who had first of all others proclaimed the war in their owne Countrey, sent vnto the Acarnanians, Epirots, Messenians, and Lacedemonians: requesting them forthwith to declare themselves, & to denounce war vnto the Aetolians; without staying (as it were) to await the euent. Hercunto they receiued duerle answers, according to the qualities of those with whom they dealt. The Maccedonians, a free-hearted and valiant, though a small Nation, and bordering vpon the Ætolians, of whom they stood in continuall danger; said, that they could not honestly refuse to follow their faithful meaning in that war, which was concluded by generall assent. The Epirots that were more mighty, were neuertheless more cunning and reserved: so that they stood vpon a needfull point; and desired to be held excused, vnill Philip (of whose menning they needed not to haue made any doubt) should first proclaim the war. The Maccedonians, for whose cause the warre was vndertaken, excused themselves, by reason of a Towne which the Ætolians held vpon their borders; and said, that they durst not be over-bold, vnill that bridle were taken out of their mouths. As for the Lacedemonians, the chiefs of them inuaded only how to manage that reason, for which their City had bene so largely pardoned: and therefore dismissed the Embassadors of the Confederates, without any answer at all. They had three years together continued subiect, and thus their wils to the Maccedonians, expecting still when Cleomenes should returne out of Ægypt to raigne ouer them againe, and maintaine, as he was wont, the honour of their City. In this regard they chose not any Kings; but were contented with the rule of Ephors. Of these there were some, that thought the publicke safety to consist, in holding their faith with the Maccedonian that had preferred them: And hereto they referred all their counsailes; being perhaps not a little moued with respect of the benefit, which might redound vnto themselves, by adhering firmly to those which at the present bore rule ouer them. Others, and those the greater part, were fill deuising, how to make all ready for Cleomenes against his returne; and therefore sought to ioyne with the Ætolians, which were the most likely to giue him strong assistance. The Maccedonian faction had the more authority, and durst more freely speak their mindes; but the contrary side was the more passionate, and spared not by murders, or any other violent courses, to set forward their desire. Neither did it suffice, that about these times there came certaine report of Cleomenes his death. For it was the glory and honour of Sparta, which these intended: fancying vnto themselves the glory of their Anceltors in such Ages past, as were not like to come againe. Cleomenes was, they knew, the most able man to restore them vnto their greatnesse and lustre; which once he had in a manner performed: But since he was dead, and that, without injury to his well-deseruing vertue, they might proceed to the election of new Kings: Kings they would haue, and those of the race of Hercules, as in former times; for that without such helpe, they must continue little better than subiects vnto the Maccedonian, and far lesse by him respected, than were the Achaïans. Thus were they transported, by contemplation of their old Nobility and fame. Some of the most working spirits among them, procured the Ætolians to send an Embassie to Sparta: which propounded the matter openly vnto the people; whereof no one of the Citizens durst haue made himselfe the Author. Much disputation and hot there was, betweene those of the Maccedonian partie and these their opposites: in such wise that nothing could be concluded; vnill by massacre or banishment of all, or the chiefs, that spake against the Ætolians, the diuerstie of opinion was taken quite away. Then forthwith a League was concluded betweene the Lacedemonians and Ætolians: without all regard of the Maccedonians or Achaïans; who had spared the Citie, when they might haue destroyed it. Then also they went in hand with the election of new Kings: wherein their diligence was so nice, and so regardfull of their ancient Lawes, as touching the choosing of the one King; that we may iustly wonder, how they grew so carelesse in making choice of the other. In the one of their Royall families they found Agæopolis the sonne of Agæopolis the son of King Cleambrotus: and him they admitted to reigne ouer them, as hire apparant to his Grandfather. This Agæopolis was a yong boy, standing in neede of a Guardian; and had an Vncle, his fathers brother, that was fit for the Government. Yet because the Law required, that the sonne, how yong soeuer, should haue his fathers thers whole right and title: the Lacedemonians, though standing in neede of a man, were so punctuall in obseruation of the Law; that they made this childe their King, and appointed his Vncle Cleomenes to bee his Protector. But in the other branch of the Royall family, though there was no want of heires: yet would not the people trouble themselves about any of them, to examine the goodnesse of his Claime, but made election of one Lyseus, who hauing no manner of title to the kingdom, bestowed vpon each of the Ephors a Talent, and thereby made himselfe be siled King of Sparta, and a Gentleman of the race of Hercules. This Lyseus, to gratifie his Partisans, and to approue his worth by Action, invaded the Countrey of the Argues: which lay open and vngarded, as in a time of peace. There hee did great spoile, and wanne diuers Townes; whereof two hee retained, and annexed vnto the State of Lacedamon. After such open hostilitie, the Lacedemonians declared themselves on the Ætolian side; and proclaimed warre against the Achaïans.

Thus the beginnings of the warre fell out much otherwise, than the Achaïans and their Confederates had expected, when they first made preparation. Philip was not ready: the Epirots gave vnertaine answer: the Maccedonians would not stirre: all the burden must lie vpon themselves and the poore Acarnanians, whom the Ætolians, by fauour of the Eleans, could inuade at pleasure, as they were like to doe; and by helpe of the Lacedemonians, could assaile on all parts at once. It was not long ere the Ætolians, passing ouer the Bay of Corinth, surpris'd the Towne of Ægira: which if they could haue held, they should thereby grievously haue molested the Achaïans; for that it stood in the mid-way betweene Ægium and Sigontum two of their principall Cities, and gaue open way into the heart of all their Countrey. But Ægira was taken by surpris: so was it presently lost againe, through greedinesse of spoile, whilst they that should haue made it their first care to assure the place vnto themselves, by occupying the Cittadell and other peeces of strength, fell heedlessly to ran sack private houses, and thereby gaue the Citizens leaue to make head, by whom they were driuen with great slaughter backe vnto their Fleet. About the same time, another Ætolian Armeie landing among the Eleans, fell vpon the Westerne Coast of Aschis; wassing all the Territorie of the Dymians and other people, that were first beginners of the Achaïan Confederacie. The Dymians and their neighbours made head against these Inuaders, but were so wel beaten that the enimie grew bolder with them than before. They sent for helpe vnto their Pretor, and to all the Townes of their Societie. In vaine. For the Achaïans hauing lately bene much weakened by Cleomenes, were now able to doe little of themselves: neither could they get any strength of Mercinaries; forasmuch as at the end of Cleomenes his war, they had couetously withheld part of their due from those that seru'd them therein. So through this disability of the Achaïans, and insufficiency of their Pretor, the Dymians, with others, were driuen to withhold their contribution heretofore made for the publicke seruice, and to conuert the monie to their own defence. Lyseus also with his Lacedemonians, began to winne vpon the Achaïans; that were confederate with Philip and the Achaïans.

Philip came to the borders of the Ætolians, whilst their Armeie was thus employed a fire off in Peloponnesus. The Epirots ioynd all their forces with him: and by such their willing readinesse, drew him to the seige of a Frontier peere, which they desired to get into their own hands; for that, by commoditie thereof, they hoped shortly to make themselves Masters of Ambracia. There he spent foure dayes, ere he could end the buisnes, which tended onely to the benefit of the Epirots. Had he entered into the hart of Ætolia at his first coming, it was thought that the might haue made an end of the war. But it happens oft, that the violence of great Armies is broken vpon small Townes or Forts: and not seldome, that the importunitee of Associates, to haue their own desires fulfilled, conuert the preparations of great Kings to those vses for which they neuer were intended; thereby hindring the prosecution of their maine designs.

delignes. Thus was our King Henrie the eight led aide, and quite out of his waie, by Maximilian the Emperour to the siege of Tournay: at such time as the French King Lewis the twelfth, hearing that the strong Citie of Tournay was lost, and that of his Cavellerie, wherein rested his chiefe confidence, two thousand were beaten by the Earle of Essex with leuen hundred Englishes: was thinking to withdraw himselfe into Brittaine, in feare that Henrie would haue come to Paris.

The stay that Philip made at Ambraeus, did wondrously embolden the Aetolians: in such sort, as their Prætor Scopas aduentured to lead all their forces out of the Countrey, and therewith not onely to ouer runne Theffalie, but to make impression into Macedon. Hee ranne as fast as to Dium, a Citie of Macedon vpon the Aegean Sea: which, being forsaken by the Inhabitants at his coming, Hee tooke, and razed to the ground. Hee spared neyther Temple, nor any other of the goodly buildings therein, but ouerturned all: and among the rest, he threw downe the Statues that were there erected, of the Macedonian Kings. For this he was highly honoured by his Countrey at his returne, forasmuch as hereby they thought their Nation to be growne terrible, not onely (as before) vnto Peloponnesus, but euen to home in their owne Countrey, for their paines taken at Dium. Philip hauing dispatched his worke at Ambraeus, made a strong inuasion vpon Aetolia. Hee tooke Phœtie, Atropolis, Gerrade, Teatinum, Elean, and diuers other Townes and Castles of theirs: of which hee burnt some, and fortified others. Hee also beat the Aetolians in sundrie skirmishes, and waited all the Countrey ouer, without receiuing any harme. This done, while he was about to make a cut ouer the Streights into Peloponnesus, and to doe the like spoile in the Countrey of the Eleans, whereto hee was vehemently sollicit by the Achean Embassidours: newes came out of Macedon, that the Dardaniens were ready with a great Armie to fall vpon the Countrey. These Dardaniens were a barbarous people, diuided by Mount Hemus from the Northerne part of Macedon, and were accustomed to secke bootie in that wealthie Kingdome, when they found their owne times. Hauing therefore intelligence, that Philip was about to make a iourne into Peloponnesus: they purposed in his absence, which they thought would be long, to get what they could for themselves in his Countrey: as had bene their manner vpon the like aduantages. This made the King to dismisle the Achean Embassidours, (whom hee should haue accompanied home with his Armie) and to bid them haue patience vntill another yeare. So Hee tooke his way home: and as he was passing out of Aetranie into Epirus, there came to him Demetrius Phærius with no more than one Ship, that was newly chased out of his Kingdome by the Romans. This Demetrius had lately shewed himselfe a friend to Antigonus Doson, in the warres of Cleomenes: and returning in his last Voyage from the Cyclades, was ready, at their first request, to take part with Philip. Captaines. These, or the like considerations, made him wel come vnto the Macedonian King: whose Counsailler hee was euer after. The Dardaniens hearing of the Kings returne, brake vp their Armie, and gaue ouer for the present their inuasion of Macedon, towards which they were already on their way.

All that Sommer following the King rested at Larissa in Theffalie, whilst his people gathered in their Haruest. But the Aetolians rested not. They auenged themselves vpon the Epirians: whom for the harmes by them and Philip done in Aetolia, they requited with all extremities of warre, among which, the most notable was the ruine of the famous Temple of Dodona. When Winter grew on, and all thought of warre vntill another yeare was laid aside: Philip stole a iourne into Peloponnesus, with five thousand Foot, and about foure hundred Horse. As soone as hee was within Cerintia, He commanded the Gates to be shut, that no word might be carried forth of his arrival. He sent priuily for old Achilles to come thither vnto him: with whom hee tooke order, when, and in what places, he would haue the Achean Souldiours ready to meet him. The Enemies were then abroad in the Countrey, with some-

somewhat more than two thousand Foot and an hundred Horse; little thinking to meete with such opposition. Indeed they had little cause to feare: since the Acheans themselves were not aware that the King was in their Land with his Macedonians: vntill they heard, that these two thousand Eleans, Aetolians, and their fellows, were by him surpris'd, and all made prisoners, or slaine. By this exploit which hee did at his first coming, Philip got verie much reputation: as likewise hee purchas'd both reputation and loue, by diuers actions immediately following. Hee wanne Pisophis, an exceeding strong Towne, in the borders of Arcadia; which the Eleans and Aetolians then held. Hee wanne it by assault at his first coming: wherein it much auailed him, that the Enemy, not beleueing that hee would undertake such a peece of worke at such an vnseasonable time of the yeare, was careless of providing euen such store of weapons, as might haue serued to defend it. The Towne was preferred by the King from sack, and giuen to the Acheans, of his owne meere motion, before they requested it. Thence went he to Lasion, which yielded for verie feare, hearing how easily hee had taken Pisophis. This Towne also he gaue to the Acheans. Thelike liberalitie he vsed towards others; that had ancient title vnto places by him recovered. Then fell he vpon the Countrey of Elis, where was much wealth to bee gotten: for that the people were addic't to husbandrie, and liud abroad in Villages; euen such as were of the wealthier sort among them. So hee came to the Citie of Olympia: where hauing done sacrifice to Iupiter, hee slew his Captaines, and refreshed his Armie three dayes. Hee proceeded on to the spoile of thole, that had taken pleasure to share with the Aetolians, in the spoiles of their other-wise-defeating neighbours. Great abundance of Cattaille hee tooke, with great numbers of slaues, and much wealth of all sorts; such as could bee found in rich villages. Then fell he in hand with the Townes whereto a great multitude of the Countrey-people were fled. Some of these were taken at the first assault. Some yielded for feare. Some preuented the labour of his iourne, by sending Embassadours to yeeld before hee came. And some that were held with Garrisons against their wils, tooke courage to set themselves at libertie, by seeing the King so neare; to whose Patronage thenceforth they betooke themselves. And many places were spoiled by the Aetolian Captaines; because they distrustful their abilitie to hold them. So the King wanne more Townes in the Countrey, than the sharpnesse of Winter would suffer him to stay there dayes. Faine hee would haue fought with the Aetolians: but they made such hast from him, that hee could not ouertake them, vntill they had couered themselves within the Towne of Saminus, whereto they thought to haue bene safe. But Philip assaulted them therein so forcibly, that hee made them glad to yeeld the place; obtaining licence to depart, with their liues and armes. Hauing performed so much in this Expedition, the King reposed himselfe a while in Megalopolis; and then removed to Argos, where he spent all the rest of the Winter.

Before the Kings arrival in Peloponnesus, the Lacedemonians with Lycergus their new King, had gotten somewhat in Arcadia; and threatned to doe great matters. But when they were admonished, by the calamitie that fell vpon the Eleans, of the danger hanging ouer their owne heads; they quitted their winnings, and withdrew themselves home. This Lycergus, as hee had no other right to the Kingdome of Sparta, than that which hee could buy with monie: so hee was neither free from danger of conspiracies made against him; nor from those jealousies, with which Ysurger of conspiracies made against him; nor from those jealousies, with which Ysurger is commonly perplexed. There was one Chilon, of the Royall blood, that pers was thinking himselfe to haue best right vnto the Kingdome, purposed to make way thereunto, by massacre of his opposites; and afterwards to confirme himselfe, by propounding vnto the Multitude such reformation of the State as was most popular: namely, by making an equall distribution of all the Lands among the whole number of the Citizens, according to the ancient institution of that Common-wealth. Hee wanne to his partie some two hundred men; with whom hee fell vpon the Ephori as they were together at supper, and slew them all. Then went he to Lycergus curgus his house: who perceiving the danger, stole away and fled. It remained that he should give account of these doings to the people, and procure them to take part with him. But their minds being not hereto predisposed; they so little regarded his goodly offers, as even whilst he was vining his best persuasions, they were consulting how to apprehend him. Chilon perceived whereabout they went, and flitted presently away. So hee liued afterwards among the Acheans a banished man, and hated of his own people. As for Lycargus, he returned home: and suspecting thenceforth all those of Heracles his race, found means to driue out his fellow King yong Agelipolis; whereby he made himselfe Lord alone. His doings grew to be suspected, in such sort as once he should haue bene apprehended by the Ephori. But though his actions hitherto might haue bene defended; yet rather than to adventure himselfe into iudgement, he chose to flie for a time, and sojourne among his friends the Ætolians. His wel-knownne vehemencie in opposition to the Macedonians, had procured vnto him such good liking among the people, that in his absence they beganne to consider the weaknesse of their owne furmises against him; and pronouncing him innocent, recalled him home to his Estate. But in time following, Hee tooke better heed vnto himselfe: not by amending his condition (for he grew a Tyrant, and was so acknowledged) but by taking order, that it should not be in the power of the Citizens to expell him when they listed. By what actions hee got the name of a Tyrant: or at what time it was, that hee chased Agelipolis out of the City, I doe not certainly finde. Like enough it is, That his being the first of three usurpers, which followed in order one after another, made him to bee placed in the ranke of Tyrants; which the last of the three verie iustly deserved. Whatsoeuer hee was towards some priuate Citizens: in the war against Philip, He behaued himselfe as a prouident man, and careful of his Countries good.

B. II.

How Philip was misseadvised by ill Counsaillers: Who afterwards wrought treason against him, and were iustly punished. He innueth the Ætolians a second time: And forceth them to sue for peace: which is granted vnto them.

WHilst the King lay at Argos, deuising vpon his businesse for the year following, some ambitious men that were about him, studied so diligently their own greatnesse, as they were like to haue spoiled all that heeooke in hand. Antigenus Dofon had left vnto Philip such Counsaillers, as to him did seeme the fittest men for governing of his youth. The chiefe of these was Apelles, that had the charge of his person, and ordering of his Treasures. This man, seeming to himselfe a great Polititian, thought that he should doe a notable peece of seruice to his Prince; if he could reduce the Acheans vnto the same degree of subjection, wherein the Macedonians liued. To bring this to passe during the late Expedition hee had caused some of the Macedonians to thrust the Acheans out of their lodgings, and to strip them of the bootie that they had gotten. Proceeding further, as occasion fell out, He was bold to chastise some of that Nation; causing his Ministers to take and whippe them. If any of them offered (as there were some of them) that could not refrain to helpe their fellows; them hee laid by the heeles, and punished as Mutinies. Hereby hee thought to bring it to passe by little and little, that they should bee qualified with an habite of blind obedience, and thinke nothing vnjust that pleased the King. But these Acheans were tenderly sensible in matter of libertie: whereof if they could haue bene contented to suffer any little diminution, they needed not haue troubled the Macedonians to helpe them them in the warre against Cleomenes: They bemoaned themselves vnto old Aratus, and besought him to thinke vpon some good order, that they might not bee oppressed by degrees. Aratus forthwith dealt earnestly with the King, as in a matter more weightie, than at first it might seeme. The King beflowed gracious words vpon those that had bene wronged; and forbad Apelles to follow the course hee beganne. Hereat Apelles was inwardly vexed, though hee dissembled his choller for a time. He thought so well of his owne Proiect, that he could not endure to lay it aside; being perhaps vnable to doe the King any valuable seruice, in businesse of other nature. Hee purposed therefore hereafter to beginne at the head, first, in biting at the taile, the fish had shot away from his mouth. It could not otherwise bee than that among the Acheans there were some, who bore no heartie affection to Aratus. These he enquired out: and sending for them, entertained them with wordes of Court; promising to become their especial friend, and commend them vnto the King. Then brake he his purpoe with the King himselfe: letting him know, that as long as he continued to make much of Aratus, He must be faine to deale precisely with the Acheans, and, as it were by Indenture, according to the letter of the Contract: whereas if he would be pleased to giue countenance vnto those others whom he himselfe commended, then should the Acheans, and all other Peloponnesians, bee quickly brought to conform themselves vnto the dutie of obedient Subjects. By such persuasions, He drew the King to be present at Ægium, where the Acheans were to hold election of a new Prætor. There with much more labour, than would haue bene needfull in a businesse of more importance; the King, by faire words and threatnings together, obtained so much, That Eperatus, a verie insufficient man, but one of Apelles his new Favourites, was chole n Prætor, instead of one more worthe for whom Aratus had laboured. This was thought a good introduction vnto greater matters that should follow. The King from thence passed along by Patrias and Dyma, to a verie strong Castle held by the Eleans, which was called Tichor. The Garrison yielded it vp for feare, at his first coming: whereof hee was glad; for that hee had an earnest desire to bestow it vpon the Dymæans, as hee presently did.

The King thought it strange, that all this while hee had of no messengers from the Eleans, to sue for peace. For at his departure out of their Countie the last Winter, hee had let loose one Amphidamus a Captaine of theirs, that was his Prisoner; because hee found him an intelligent man, and one that undertooke to make them forsake their alliance with the Ætolians, and ioyne with him vpon reasonable termes. This if they could be contented to do, He willed Amphidamus to let them vnderstand, That he would render vnto them freely all prisoners which hee had of theirs; That he would defend them from all forrein inuasion; and that they should hold their libertie entire, liuing after their owne Lawes, without paying any manner of Tribute, or being kept vnder by any Garrison. These Conditions were not to be despised, if they had found credit as they might haue done. But when Philip came to the Castle of Tichor, and made a new inuasion vpon their Countie: then beganne the Eleans, (that were not before out of haste to beleue such faire promises) to suspect Amphidamus as a Traitor, and one that was set on worke for no other end, than to breed a mutuall diffidence betweene them and the Ætolians. Wherefore they purposed to lay hands vpon him, and send him Prisoner into Ætolia. But hee perceived their intent, and got away to Dyma: in good time for himselfe; in better for Aratus. For the King (as was said) maruailling what should be the cause, that he heard no news from the Eleans, concerning the offers which hee had made vnto them by Amphidamus: Apelles, his Counsailler, thereby tooke occasion to supplant Aratus. He said that old Aratus, and his sonne together, had such deuices in their heads, as tended little to the Kings good; And long of them hee said it was, that the Eleans did thus hold out; For when Amphidamus was dismissed home, the two Ætoli (the father and the sonne) had taken him aside and giuen him to vnderstand, that it would be verie prejudiciall to all Peloponnesus, if the Eleans once became at the deuotion of the Macedonians; And this was the true cause, why neyther Amphidamus was verie careful in doing this message, nor the Eleans in hearkning to the Kings offers. All this was a false lie, deuicd by Apelles himselfe, vpon no other ground than his owne malice. Philip had no sooner heard his tale, but in a great rage hee sent for the two Arats, and bad Apelles rehearse it ouer againe to their faces. Apelles did so, and with a bold countenance, talking to them as to men alreadye convicted. And when hee had said all the rest, ere eyther Philip or they spoke any word; He added this claiffe, as it were in the Kings name: Since the King hath found you such vngreatfull wretches; it is his meaning to hold a Parliament of the Achaens; and therein hauing made it knowne what ye are, to depart into Macedon, and leaue you to your selues. Olde Arats grauely admonished the King; That whensoever hee heard any accusation, especially against a friend of his owne or a man of worth; He should forbear awhile to giue credit, vntill he had diligently examined the businesse. For such deliberation was Kingly, and hee should neuer thereof repent him. At the present hee said there needed no more, than to call in those that had heard his talke with Amphidamus; and especially him that had brought this goodly tale to Apelles. For it would be a verie absurd thing, That the King should make himselfe Authour of a report in the open Parliament of Achaia, whereof there was none other euidence, than one mans yeas, and anothers no. Hercof the King liked well, and said that he would make 20 sufficient inquirie. So passed a few dayes: wherein whilst Apelles delaied to bring in the prooffe, which indeed he wanted; Amphidamus came from Elis, and told what had befallen him there. The King was not forgetfull, to examine him about the conspiracie of the Arats: which when hee found no better than a meere deuice against his honourable friends; Hee entertained them in louing manner as before. As for his loue to Apelles, though it was hereby somewhat cooled; yet by means of long acquaintance and daily employment, no remission therein could be discerned.

The varesfull temper of Apelles, hauing with much vehemencie brought nothing to passe; began (as commonly Ambition vseth) to swell and grow venomous: for want of his free motion. Hee betakes himselfe to his cunning againe: and as before, being checkt in his doings with those of the vulgar, hee had prepared a snare for the Arats; so sayling of them hee thinks it wisdome to lay for the King himselfe, and for all at once which were about him. In such manner sometime, the Spider thought to haue taken the Swallow which draue away Flies out of the chimney; but was carried (net and all) into the Ayre by the bird, that was too strong to be caught and held by the subtle workmanship of a Cob-web. Of the foure that next vnto Apelles were left by Antigonus in chiefe place about Philip; Taurion, his Lieutenant in Peloponnesus; and Alexander Captaine of the Guard, were faithful men, and such as would not be corrupted. The other two, Leontius Captaine of the 40 Targueters, and Megaleus chiefe of the Secretaries, were easily wonne to be at Apelles his disposition. This Polititian therefore studied how to remove the other two from their places, and put some Creatures of his owne into their roomes. Against Alexander He went to worke the ordinarie way, by calumination and priue detraction. But for the supplanting of Taurion hee vied more sinencesse; loading him with daily commendations, as a notable man of warre, and one, whom for his many vertues, the King might ill spare from being alwayes in his presence. By such art he thought to haue removed him, as wee say, Out of Gods blessing into a warme Sunne. In the meane season Arats retired himselfe; and fought to auoid the dangerous friendship of the King, by forbearing to meddle in affaires of State. As for the new Prætor of Achaia, lately chosen by such vehement instance of the King; He was a man of no dispatch, and one that had no grace with the People. Wherefore a great deale of time was lost, whilst Philip wanted both the monie and the Corne, wherewith he should haue bene furnished by the Achaens. This made the King

vnderstand his owne error; which he wisely fought to reforme betimes. Hee perfwaded the Achaens to rejourne their Parliament from Argum, to Sicyon the Towne of Aratus. There he dealt with the old man and his sonne: perfwading them to forget what was past; & laying all the blame vpon Apelles, on whom thenceforth he intended to keepe a more diligent eye. So by the trauell of these worthe men, Hee easilie obtained what he would of the Achaens. Fiftie talents they gaue him out of hand, with great store of Corne: and further decreed, That so long as he himselfe in person followed the warres in Peloponnesus, he should receiue ten talents a moneth. Being thus enabled, he began to prouide shipping, that so he might invade the Ætolians, Eleans, and Lacedemonians; that were maritime people, at his pleasure, and hinder their excursions by Sea.

It vexed Apelles beyond measure, to see things goe forward so well without his helpe; euen by the ministerie of those whom he most hated. Wherefore he entered into conspiracie with Leontius and Megaleus: binding himselfe and them by oath, to crosse and bring to nought, as well as they were able, all that the King should take in hand. By so doing they thought to bring it to passe, that verie want of abilitie to doe any thing without them, should make him speake them faire; and be glad to submit himselfe to their directions. The King it is like had stood in some awe of them whilst he was a child: and therefore these wise men perfwaded them some selues, that, by looking bigge vpon him, and imputing vnto him all that fell out ill through their owne misgouernment of his affaires, they might rule him as a child still. Apelles would needes goe to Chalcis, there to take order for the prouisions, which were to come that way out of Macedon: The other two staid behind with the King, to play their parts; all more mindfull of their wicked oath, than of their dutie.

His fleet and Armie being in a readines: Philip made countenance, as if he would haue bent all his forces against the Eleans; to whose aid therefore the Ætolians sent men, little fearing that the mischief would haue fallen, as soone after it did, vpon themselves. But against the Eleans and those that came to help them, Philip thought it enough to leaue the Achaens, with some part of his and their Mercenaries. Hee himselfe with the body of his Armie putting to Sea, landed in the Ile of Cephallenia: whence the Ætolians, dwelling ouer against it, vied to furnish themselves of shipping, when they went to roue abroad. There he besieged the Towne of Palæa, that had bene very seruicable to the Enemie against him and his Confederates; and might be very vie full to him, if hee could get it. Whilst hee lay before this Towne, there came vnto him fiftene ships of war from Sparta; and many good souldiers, from the Epirits, Acarnanians, and Messenians. But the Towne was obstinate; and would not be terrified with numbers. It was naturally fenced on all parts faue one, on which side Philip carried a Mine to the wall, wherewith hee overthrew two hundred foot thereof. Leontius Captaine of the Targettiers, was appointed by the King to make the assault. But he, remembering his couenant with Apelles, did both willfully forbear to doe his best; and caused others to doe the like. So the Macedonians were put to foile, and many layne; not of the worst souldiers, but such as had gotten ouer the breach, and would haue carried the Towne, if the Treason of their Captaine, and some by him corrupted, had not hindered the victory. The King was angry with this: but there was no remedie; & therefore he thought vpon breaking vp the siege. For it was easier vnto the Towne-men to make vp the gap in their wall, than for him to make it wider. Whilst he stood thus perplexed, and vncertaine what course to take: the Messenians and Acarnanians lay hard vpon him, each of them desirous to draw him into their owne Countrie. The 50 Messenians alleaged, that Lyongus was busie in waisting their Countrie: vpon whom the King might come vnawares in one day; the Ælian windes which then blew, seruing finely for his Navigation. Hereto also Leontius perfwaded; who considered that those windes, as they would easilie carrie him thither, so would they detain him there perforce (blowing all the Dog-daies) and make him spend the Summer

Sommer to small purpose. But Aratus gave better counsaile, and prevailed. Hee shewed how visiting it were, to let the Aetolians ouer-run all Thessalia againe, and some part of Macedon, whilst the King withdrew his Armie farre off to seeke small adventures. Rather, he said, that the time now fited well to carry the war into Aetolia; since the Pretor was gone thence abroad on roving, with the one halfe of their strength. As for Lyonguius, hee was not strong enough to doe much harme in Peloponnesus; and it might suffice, if the Acheans were appointed to make head against him. According to this aduice, the King fers saile for Aetolia; and enters the Bay of Ambrosia, which diuided the Aetolians from Acarnania. The Acarnanians were glad to see him on their borders; and ioyned with him as many of them as could beare armes, to helpe in taking vengeance vpon their bad neighbours. Hee marched vpon into the in-land Countre: and taking some places by the way, which he filled with Garrisons to assure his Retraite; He passed on to Thermans; which was the Receptacle of the Aetolians, and furest place of defence in all extremities. The Countrey round about was a great Fallneffe, enuironed with rockie Mountaine of very narrow, steepe, and difficult ascent. There did the Aetolians vse to hold all their chiefe meetings, their Faires, their election of Magistrates, and their solemne games. There also they vied to bestow the most precious of their goods, as in a place of greatest securitie. This opinion of the naturall strength, had made them careless in looking vnto it. When Philip therefore had ouercome the bad way, there was nothing else to doe than to take spoile: whereof hee found such plentie, that he thought the paines of his iourne well recompenced. So he loaded his Armie; and consuming all that could not be carried away, forgot not to raze a goodly Temple, the chiefe of all belonging vnto the Aetolians; in remembrance of the like their courteisie, shewed vpon the Temples of Dium and Dodona. This burning of the Temple, might (questionlesse) more for the Kings honour haue bene forborne. But perhaps he thought, as Nonisier du Gourgues the French Captaine told the Spaniards in Florida, That they which had no faith, needed no Church. At his returne from Thermans, the Aetolians laid for him: which that they would doe, he beleued before; and therefore was not taken vnawares. Three thousand of them there were; that lying in ambush fell vpon his skirts: but hee had laid a Counter-ambush for them of his Illyrians; who staying behind the rest, did set vpon the backs of the Aetolians, whilst they were busily charging in Rere the Armie that went before. So with slaughter of the enemy, he returned the same way that he came: and burning downe those places that he had taken before, as also wasting the Countrey round about him, Hee safely carried all that hee had gotten aboard his Fleet. Once the Aetolians made countenance of fight, issuing out of Stratus in great brauerie. But they were beaten home faster than they came, and followed to their verie gates.

The Ioy of this victorious Expedition being euerie way complete, and not deformed (as commonly happens) by any finall accident; it pleased the King to make a great feast vnto all his friends and Captaines. Thither were invited among the rest Leontius, with his fellow Megaleus. They came, because they could not choose: but their heauie lookes argued, what little pleasure they tooke in the Kings prosperitie. It grieved them to thinke, that they should be able to giue no better account vnto Apelles, of their hindring the Kings businesse; since Apelles himselfe, as will be shewed anon, had plaied his own part with a most mischieuous dexterity. The sorrow and indignation, which they could ill dissemble in their faces, brake out after supper, when they had warmed themselves with drinke, into open riot. Finding Aratus on the way home to his Tent: they fell to railing him, throwing stones at him, so that they caused a great vprore; many running in (as happens in such cases) to take part with the one or the other. The King sending to inquire of the matter, was truly informed of all that had passed. Which made him send for Leontius and his fellows. But Leontius was gotten out of the way: Megaleus, and another with him, came. The King began to reate them for their disorder; and they, to giue him froward answers: in so much as they said at length, That they would neuer giue ouer, till they had rewarded Aratus with a mischiefe as hee deserved. Heereupon the King committed them to ward. Leontius hearing of this, comes boldly to the King, with his Targettiers at his heeles: and with a proud grace demanded, who it was that had dared to lay hands vpon Megaleus; yea and to cast him into prison? Why, said the King, It was eu en I. This resolute answer, which Leontius had not expected, made him depart both sad and angrie, seeing himselfe out-frowned, and not knowing how to remedie the matter. Shortly after Megaleus was called forth to his answer, and was charged by Aratus with many great crimes. Among which were, The hinderance of the Kings victorie at Palea, and the Compact made with Apelles: matters no lesse touching Leontius, that stood by as a looker on, than Megaleus that was accused. In conclusion, the presumptions against him were so strong, and his answers thereto so weak; that he, and Crimon one of his fellows, were condemned in twentie Talents: Crimon being remanded backe to prison; and Leontius becoming Bayle for Megaleus. This was done vpon the way home-ward, as the King was returning to Corinth.

Philip dispatched well a great deale of businesse this yeere. For as soone as he was at Corinth, he tooke in hand an Expedition against the Lacedaemonians. These and the Illyans had done what harme they could in Peloponnesus, whilst the King was absent. The Acheans had opposed them as well as they could; with ill success: yet so, as they hindered them from doing such harme as else they would haue done. But when Philip came, hee ouer-ran the Countrey about Lacedaemon: and was in a manner at the gates of Sparta, ere men could well beleue that he was returned out of Aetolia. Hee tooke not in this expedition any Cities, but made great wast in the fields: and hauing beaten the enemy in some skirmishes, carried backe with him to Corinth a rich bootie of Cattell, slaues, and other Countrey spoile. At Corinth hee found attending him, Embassadors from the Rhodesians & Chians: that requested him to set Greece at quiet, by granting peace vnto the Aetolians. They had gracious audience: and hee willed them to deale first with the Aetolians; who, if they would make the same request, should not finde him vnreasonable. The Aetolians had spent ill that yeere, neither saw they any likeli hope for the yeeres following. The Armie that they had sent forth to waite Thessalia and Macedon, found such opposition on the way; that not daring to proceed, it returned home without bringing any thing to effect. In the meane season they had bene grievously afflicted, as before is shewed, by Philip in the center of their owne Countrey. All Greece and Macedon was vp in armes against them, and their weak Allies the Illyans and Lacedaemonians. Neither was it certaine, how long the one or other of these their Peloponnesian friends should be able to hold out; since they were not strong enough to keepe the field, but had already suffered those miseries of war, which by a little continuance would make them glad, each, to seeke their owne peace, without regard of their Confederates. Wherefore the Aetolians readilie entertained this Negotiation of peace: and taking truce for thirtie dayes with the King, dealt with him by intercession of the same Embassadors, to entreat his presence at a Diet of their Nation, that should be held at Rhums; whither if he would vouchsafe to come, they promised that hee should finde them conformable to any good reason.

Whilst these things were in hand, Leontius and Megaleus thought to haue terrified the King, by raising sedition against him in the Armie. But this device forced to no good effect. The fouldions were easily and quickly incensed against many of the Kings friends; who were said to be the cause, why they were not rewarded with so much of the bootie, as they thought to belong of right vnto them. But their anger spent it selfe in noise, and breaking open of odors; without further harme done. This was enough to informe the king (who easily pacified his men with gentle words) that some about him were verie false. Yea the fouldions themselves, repenting of their insolence, desired to haue the Authors of the tumult sought lought out, and punished according to their deserts. The King made shew as if he had not cared to make such inquisition. But Leontius and Megaleus were fore afraid, lest the matter would soon come out of it selfe to their extreme danger. Wherefore they sent vnto Apelles, the Head and Archetect of their treason; requesting him speedilie to repaire to Corinth, where he might stand betwene them and the Kings displeasure. Apelles had not all this while bene wanting to the businesse, vnderaken by him and his treacherous companions. He had taken vpon him, as a man that had the Kings heart in his owne hand: and thereby was he growne into such credit, that all the Kings Officers in Macedon and Thessalie addressed themselves vnto him; and received from him their dispatch in cuerie businesse. Likewise the Greekes in all their flattering Decrees, tooke occasion to magnifie the vertue of Apelles; making slight mention (onely for fashion sake) of the king: who seemed no better than the Minister and Executioner of Apelles his will and pleasure. Such was the arrogance of this great man, in setting himselfe out vnto the people: but in manning the kings affaires, he made it his especiall care, that monie, and all things needfull for the publicke seruice, should be wanting. Yea he enforced the King, for verie neede, to sell his owne Plate and household velleils: thinking to resolute these and all other difficulties, by onely saying, Sir, be ruled wholly by mee, and all shall be as you would wish. Hereof the king would giue assent; then had this Politician obtained his hearts desire. Now taking his iourne from Chalcis in the Isle of Euboea, to the Citie of Corinth where Philip then lay: he was fetched in with great pompe and royaltie, by a great number of the Captaines and souldiours; which Leontius and Megaleus drew forth to meete him on the way. So entering the Citie with a goodly traine, he went directly to the Court, and towards the Kings Chamber. But Philip was well aware of his pride; and had vehement suspicion of his fallhood. Wherefore one was sent to tell him, that he should waite awhile, or come another time, for the king was not now at leisure to be spoken with. It was preiudiciall, that such a check as this made all his attendants forsake him, as a man in disgrace; in such sort that going thence to his lodging, he had none to follow him save his owne Pages. After this, the King vouchsafed him now and then some slender graces: but in consultations, or other matters of priuacie, he vsed him not at all. This taught Megaleus to looke vnto himselfe, and runne away betimes. Hereupon the King sent forth Tarrian his Lieutenant of Peloponnesus, with all the Targettiers, as it were to doe some peece of seruice; but indeed of purpose to apprehend Leontius in the absence of his followers. Leontius being taken, dispatched away a messenger presently to his Targettiers, to signifie what was befallen him: and they forthwith sent vnto the King in his behalfe. They made request, That if any other thing were objected against him, he might not be called forth to triall before their returne: as for the debt of Megaleus, if that were all the matter, they said that they were ready to make a purse for his discharge. This affection of the souldiours, made Philip more halfe than else he would haue bene, to take away the Traitors life. Neither was it long, ere letters of Megaleus were intercepted, which he wrote vnto the Aetolians; vntill the king with opprobrious words: and bidding them not to hearken after peace, but to hold out awhile, for that Philip was euen ready to sinke vnder the burden of his owne pueritie. By this the king vnderstood more perfectly the fallhood, not onely of Megaleus, but of Apelles; whose cunning head had laboured all this while to keepe him so poore. Wherefore he sent on to pursue Megaleus, that was fled to Thebes. As for Apelles, he committed both him, his sonne, and another that was inward with him, to prison: wherein all of them shortly ended their liues. Megaleus also, neither daring to stand to triall, nor knowing whither to flee, was wearie of his owne life, and slew himselfe about the same time.

The Aetolians, as they had begun this warre vpon hope of accomplishing what they listed in the Nonage of Philip: so finding that the vigour of this yong Prince, tempered with the cold aduice of Arctus, wrought verie effectually toward their ouerthrow; ouerthrow; they grew verie delirious to make an end of it. Neuerthelesse being a turbulent Nation, and ready to lay hold vpon all aduantages: when they heard what was hapned in the Court, the death of Apelles, Leontius, and Megaleus, together with some indignation thereupon conceiued by the Kings Targettiers; they began to hope anew, that these troubles would be long lasting, and thereupon brake the day appointed for the meeting at Rhodus. Off this was Philip nothing at all forie. For being in good hope thoroughly to tame this vnruler Nation, He thought it much to concerne his owne honour, that all the blame of the beginning and continuing the warre should rest vpon themselves. Wherefore he willed his Confederates, to lay a full and thought of peace, and so prepare for war against the yeere following; wherein he hoped to bring it to an end. Then gratified he his Macedonian souldiours, by yielding to let them winter in their owne Countrie. In his returne homeward, he called vnto iudgement one Ptolemie, a companion with Apelles and Leontius in their Treasons: who was therefore condemned by the Macedonians; and suffered death. These were the same Macedonians, that lately could not endure to heare of Leontius his imprisonment: yet now they thinke the man worthe to die, that was but his adherent. So vaine is the confidence, on which Rebels vse to build, in their fauour with the Multitude.

During his abode in Macedon, Philip was some bordering Townes; from which the Perinthians, Aetolians, and other his ill neighbours, were accustomed to make rodes into his kingdom when he had thus provided for safetie of his owne, the Aetolians might well know what they were to expect. But there came againe Embassadors from the Rhodians and Chians, with others from Ptolemie King of Egypt, and from the Citie of Byzantium, recontinuing the former solicitation about the Peace. This fallshion had bene taken vp in matters of Greece, euer since the Kings that reigned after Alexander, had taken vpon them to set the whole Countrie at libertie: No sooner was any Prouince or Citie in danger to be oppressed, and subdued by force of war, but presently there were found intercessours, who pitying the estuation of Greekish blood, would importune the stronger to relinquish his aduantage. By doing such friendly offices in time of neede, the Princes and States abroad sought to binde vnto them those people, that were, howsoever weak in numbers, yet verie good souldiours. But hereby it came to passe, that the more forward sort, especially the Aetolians, whose whole Nation was addicted to fallshood and roberie, durst enter boldly into quarrels with all their neighbours: being well assured, that if they had the worst, The loss of Greece would be sufficient to redeeme their quit. They had, since the late Treatie of peace, done what harme they could in Peloponnesus: but being beaten by the Acheans, and standing in feare to be more soundlie beaten at home, they desired now, more earnestlie than before to make an end of the warre as soone as they might. Philip made such answer to the Embassadors, as he had done the former yeere; That he gaue no occasion to the beginning of this warre, nor was at the present either afraid to continue it, or vnwilling to end it: but that the Aetolians, if they had a desire to lue in rest, must first be dealt withall, to signifie plainly their determination, whereto himselfe would returne such answer as he should thinke fit.

Philip had at this time no great liking vnto the Peace, being a yong Prince, and in hope to increase the honour which he daily got by the warre. But it happened in the middle of this Negotiation, that he was aduertised by letters out of Macedon, what a notable victorie Hannibal had obtained against the Romans in the battell at Thysdruum. These letters he communicated vnto Demetrius Phrygius: who greatly encouraged him to take part with Hannibal: and not to sit still, as an idle beholder of the Italian warre. Hereby he grew more inclinable than before vnto Peace with the Aetolians: which was concluded shortly in a meeting at Naupactus. There did Agelaus an Aetolian make a great Oration: telling, how happie it was for the Greekes, that they might at their owne pleasure dispute about finishing war between themselves.

scelus : without being molested by the Barbarians. For when once either the Romans, or the Carthaginians, had subdued one the other ; it was not to be doubted, that they would forthwith looke Eastward, and seeke by all meanes to set footing in Greece. For this cause he said it were good, that their Countrie should be at peace within it selfe : and that Philip, if he were desirous of war, should lay hold on the opportunitee, now fitly serving, to enlarge his dominion, by winning somewhat in Italie. Such aduice could the Ætoliens then giue, when they stood in feare of danger threatening them at hand : but being soone after wearie of rest, as accustomed to enrich themselves by pillage, they were so farre from obseruing and following their owne good counsell, that they inuited the Romans into Greece; wherby they brought themselves and the whole Countrie, (but themselves before any other part of the Countrie) vnder seruitude of strangers. The Condition of this Peace was simple, That euery one should keepe what they held at the present, without making restitution, or any amends for damages past.

§. III.

PHILIP, at the perswasion of DEMETRIUS PHARIUS, enters into League with HANNIBAL, against the Romans. The Tenour of the League betwene HANNIBAL, and PHILIP.

THis being agreed vpon: the Greekes betooke themselves to quiet courses of life ; and Philip, to prepare for the business of Italie, about which hee consulted with Demetrius Pharius. And thus passed the time away, till the great battaile of Cannæ : after which he ioyned in League with Hannibal, as hath beene shewed before. Demetrius Pharius bore great malice vnto the Romans ; and knew no other way to be auenged vpon them, or to recouer his owne lost Kingdome, than by procuring the Macedonian, that was in a manner wholly guided by his counsaile, to take part with their enemies. It had other wise beene furre more expedient for Philip, to haue supported the weaker of these two great Cities against the more mightie. For by so doing, hee should perhaps haue brought them to peace vpon some equal termes ; and thereby, as did Hiero a farre weaker Prince, haue loth secured his owne Estate, and caused each of them to be desirous of cheif place in his freindship. The issue of the counsaile which he followed, will appeare soone after this. His first quarrell with the Romans ; the trouble which they and the Ætoliens did put him to in Greece ; and the Peace which they made with him for a time, vpon Conditions that might easily be broken : haue bene related in another place as belonging vnto the second Punick warre. Wherefore I will onely here set downe the tenour of the League betwene Him and Carthage : which may seeme not vnworthie to be read, if onely in regard of the forme it selfe then vsed ; though it had bene ouer-long to haue been inserted into a more busie peece.

ship or make Alliance hereafter in this Region; be preferred by King PHILIP and the Macedonians, and such of the Greekes as are their Associates. In like manner shall King PHILIP and the Macedonians, and other the Greekes his Associates, be saved and preserved by the Cartaginian Armies, and by the Uticans, and by all Cities and Nations that obey the Cartaginians, and by their Associates and Souldiers, and by all Nations and Cities in Italie, Gaule, and Liguria, that are of our Alliance, or shall hereafter ioyne with Vs in Italie. We shall not take counsaile one against the other, nor deale fraudulently one with the other. With all readinesse and good will, without deceit or subtiltie, We shall be enemies vnto the enemies of the Cartaginians, excepting those Kings, Townes, and Hauens, with which We haue already league and freindship. We also shall be enemies to the enemies of King PHILIP, excepting those Kings, Cities, and Nations, with which We haue already league and freindship. The war that We haue with the Romans, haue Ye also with them, vntill the Gods shall giue vs a new and happie end. Ye shall aide Vs with those things whereof We haue neede, and shall doe according to the Couenants betweene Vs. But if the Gods shall not giue vnto You and Vs their helpe in this warre against the Romans and their Associates; then if the Romans offer freindship, We shall make freindship in such wise that Ye shall be partakers of the same freindship. With Condition, That they shall not haue power to make war vpon you: Neither shall the Romans bee Lords ouer the Corcyreans, nor ouer those of Apollonia, nor Dyrrachium, nor over Pharus, nor Dimalle, nor the Parthini, nor Atintania. They shall also render vnto DEMETRIUS PHARIUS all those that belong vnto him, as many as are within the Romans Dominions. But if the Romans (after such peace made) shall make war vpon Ye or Vs; We will succour one another in that warre, as either shall haue neede. The same shall be obserued in warre made by any other, excepting those Kings, Kings, Cities, and States, with whom We hold already league and freindship. To this League if We or Ye shall thinke fit to adde or detract. Such addition or detraction shall be made by our common consent.

§. IIIL.

How PHILIP yielded to his natural vices, being therein soothed by DEMETRIUS PHARIUS. His desire to tyrannize vpon the free States his Associates: With the troubles, into which he thereby fell, which he bore a part in the second Punicke warre. He possessed ARATVS: and grooves hatefull to the Achians.

Therto Philip had carried himselfe as a vertuous Prince. And though with more commendation of his wildome, he might haue offered his freindship to the Romans, that were like to be oppressed, than to the Cartaginians who had the better hand: yet this his meddling in the Punicke warre, proceeded from a royall greatness of minde, with a desire to secure and increase his owne estate, adding therewithall reputation to his Countrie. But in this businesse he was guided (as hath bene said) by Demetrius Pharius: who, looking thoroughly into his nature, did accommodate himselfe to his desires: and thereby shortly gouerned him, euen as he listed. For the vertues of Philip were not indeed such as they seemed. He was lustfull, bloudie, and tyrannicall: desirous of power to doe what he listed, and not otherwise listig to doe what hee ought, than so farre forth, as by making a faire shew he might breed in men such a good opinion of him, as should helpe to serue his turne in all that hee tooke in hand. Before he should busie himselfe in this, hee thought it requisite in good policie, to bring the Greekes that were his Associates vnder a more absolute forme of subiection. Heere vnto Apelles had aduised him before: and hee had liked reasonably well of the counsell. But Apelles was a boisterous Counsellor, and one that referring all to his owne glory, thought himselfe deeply wronged if hee might not wholly haue his owne way, but were driuen to await the Kings opportunitie at better times. Demetrius Pharius could well be contented to obscure the Kings humours: and guided, like a Coach man with the reins in his hand, those affections which himselfe did onely seeme to follow. Therefore hee grew daily more and more in credit: so as, without any manner of contention, hee supplanted Aratus: which the violence of Apelles could neuer doe.

There arose about these times a verie hote Faction among the Messenians, betweene the Nobilitie and Commons: their vehement thoughts being rather diuerted (as happens often after a forrein war) vnto domesticall objects: than allayed and reduced vnto a more quiet temper. In proceesse of no long time, the contention among them grew so violent, that Philip was entreated to compound the differences. Hee was glad of this: resolving so to end the matter, that they should not henceforth strive any more about their Government: for that he would assume it wholly to himselfe. At his coming thither, hee found Aratus but lie among them to make all friends, after a better manner than agreed with his owne secret purpose. Wherefore he consulted not with this reuerend old man: but talked in priuate with such of the Messenians as repaired vnto him. He asked the Gouernours, what they meant to stand thus disputing: and whether they had not Lawes, to bridle the insolence of the vnruly Rabble: Contrariwise, in talking with the heaides of the popular popular Faction, He said it was strange, that they being so many, would suffer themselves to be oppressed by a few; as if they had not hands to defend themselves from Tyrants. Thus which each of them presumed on the Kings assistance; they thought it best to go roundly to worke, ere he were gone that should countenance their doings. The Gournours therefore would haue apprehended some seditious Oratours, that were, they said, the stirrers vp of the multitude vnto sedition. Vpon this occasion the People tooke Armes: and running vpon the Nobilitie and Magistrates, killed of them in a rage almost two hundred. Philip thought, it seemes, that it would be easie to worrie the sheep, when the Dogges their guardians were slaine. But his falshood and double dealing was immediatly found out. Neyther did the yonger Aratus forbear, to tell him of it in publick, with verie bitter and disgracefull words. The King was angrie at this. But hauing already done more than was commendable, or excusable: and yet further intending to take other things in hand wherein hee should need the helpe and countenance of his best friends; Hee was content to smother his displeasure, and make as faire weather as he could. He led old Aratus aside by the hand; and went vp into the Castle of Ithome, that was ouer Messenias. There he pretended to doe sacrifice: and sacrifice he did. But it was his purpose to keepe the place to his owne vse; for that it was of notable strength, and would serue to command the further parts of Peloponnesus, as the Citadell of Corinth, which hee had already, commaunded the entrance into that Countrie. Whilst hee was therefore sacrificing, and had the entrails of the Calt deliuered into his hands, as was the manner; Hee shewed them to Aratus, and gently asked him, whether the tokens that he saw therein did signifie, That being now in possession of this place, hee should quietly goe out of it, or rather keepe it to himselfe. He thought perhaps, that the old man would haue soothed him a litle; were it onely for desire to make amends, for the angrie words newly spoken by his sonne. But as Aratus stood doubtfull what to answer, Demetrius Phorius gaue this verdict: If thou bee a Southsayer, thou must goe thy wayes, and let slippe this good advantage, if thou be a King, thou must not neglect the oportunitie, but hold the Oxe by both his hornes. Thus he spake, resembling Ithome and Acrocorinthus vnto the two hornes of Peloponnesus. Yet would Philip needs heare the opinion of Aratus: who told him plainly, That it were well done to keepe the place, if it might be kept without breach of his faith vnto the Messenians: But if, by seizing vpon Ithome, Hee must loose all the other Castles that hee held, and especially the strongest Castle of all that was left vnto him by Antigonos, which was his credit; then were it farre better to depart with his soldiers, and keepe men in dutie, as hee had done hitherto, by their owne good wils, than by fortifying any strong places against them, to make them of his friends become his Enemies.

To this good aduice Philip yielded at the present: but not without some dislike, thenceforth growing betwene Him and the Arati; whom hee thought more forward than befemed them, in contradicting his will. Neyther was the old man desirous at all, to deale any longer in the Kings affaires, or be in ward with him. For as he plainly discovered his Tyrannous purposes: so likewise he perceived, that in resorting to his house, He had beene dishonest with his sonnes wife. Hee therefore staid at home: where at good leisure he might repent, that in despite of Cleomenes, his owne Countirman, and a temperate Prince, hee had brought the Macedonians into Peloponnesus.

Philip made a Voyage out of Peloponnesus into Epirus, wherein Aratus refused to beare him companie. In this iourne He found by experience what Aratus had lately told him; That vn honest counsailes are not so profitable in deed, as in appearance. The Epirots were his followers and dependants; and so they purposed to continue. But He would needs haue them so to remaine, whether they purposed it or not. Wherefore to make them the more obnoxious vnto his will, Hee seized vpon their Towne of Orium, and laid siege to Apollonia; hauing no good colour of these

these doings: but thinking himselfe strong enough to doe what hee listed, and not seeing whence they should procure friends to helpe them. Thus in stead of setting the countrie, as his intended Voyage into Italie required: He kindled a fire in it which he could neuer quench; vntill it had laid hold on his owne Palace. Whilst he was thus labouring to bind the hands that should haue fought for him in Italie, M. Valerius the Roman came into those parts; who not onely maintained the Epirots against him, but procured the Aetolians to breake the Peace, which they had lately made with him.

Thus began that warre; the occurrences whereof wee haue related before, in 10 place whereto it belonged. In manning whereof though Philip did the offices of a good Captaine: yet when leisure serued, Hee made it apparant that hee was a vicious King. Hee had not quite left his former desire, of oppressing the libertie of the Messenians; but made another iourne into their Countrie, with hope to deceive them, as before. They vnderstood him better now than before; and therefore were not hallic to trauell him too farre. When he saw that his cunning would not serue, He went to worke by force; and calling them his Enemies, invaded them with open warre. But in that warre hee could doe little good; perhaps, because none of his Confederates were desirous to helpe him in such an enterprise. In this attempt vpon Messenias hee lost Demetrius Phorius; that was his 15 Counsailler, and Flatterer, not his persecuter; as appeares by his growing daily more naught in following times. The worse that hee sped, the more angrie he waxed against those, that seemed not to fauour his iniurious doings. Wherefore by the Ministerie of Tamion, his Leutenant, he poisoned old Aratus; and shortly after that, hee poisoned also the yonger Aratus: hoping that these things would neuer haue bene knowne, because they were done secretly, and the poisons themselves were more 30 sure, than manifest in operation. The Sicyonians, and all the people of Achaia, decreed vnto Aratus more than humane honours, as Sacrifices, Hymnes, and Processions, to be celebrated euery yeare twice, with a Priest ordained vnto him for that purpose; as was accustomed vnto the Herons, or men, whom they thought to bee 35 translated into the number of the Gods. Hercunto they are said to haue bene encouraged by an Oracle of Apollo: which is like enough to haue bene true; since the helpe of the Deuill is neuer failing to the increase of Idolatrie.

The louing memorie of Aratus their Patron, and singular Benefactor, could not but worke in the Achaens a maruolous dislike, of that wicked King, which had made him thus away. He shall therefore heare of this hereafter, when they better dare to take counsaile for themselves. At the present, the murder was not generally knowne or beleieued; neither were they in case to submitt without his helpe; that had committed it. The Aetolians were a most outrageous people, great darters and themselves robbers. With these the Romans had made a League: whereof the Conditions were soone 40 diluiged, especially that maine point, concerning the diuision of the purchase which they should make, namely, That the Aetolians should haue the countrie and townes; but the Romans the spoile, and carrie away the people to sell for slaves. The Achaens, who in times of greater quiet could not endure to make straight alliance with the Aetolians, as knowing their vnciuill disposition; were much the more averse from them, when they perceived how they had called in the Barbarians (for such did the Greekes account all other Nations except their owne) to make hauck of the Countrie. The same consideration moued also the Lacedaemonians, to stand off awhile, before they would declare themselves for the Aetolians; whose friendship they had embraced in the late warre. The industrie the efore of Philip, and the great care 50 which he seemed to take of the Achaens his Confederates, sufficed to retaine them: especially at such time, as their owne necessitie was thereto constrained. More particularly he obliged vnto himselfe the Dymeans, by an inestimable benefit: recouering their Towne, after it had bene taken by the Romans and Aetolians; and reducing their people wherefoeuer they might bee found, that had bene carried away

Captiue, and sold abroad for slaues. Thus might he haue blotted out the memorie of offences past; if the malignitie of his natural condition had not otherwhiles broken out, and giuen men to vnderstand; that it was the Time, and not his Vertue, which caused him to make such a shew of goodnesse. Among other foule acts, whereof he was not ashamed; He tooke Polyratia the wife of the younger Aratus, and carried her into Macedon: little regarding how this might serue to confirme in the people their opinion, that he was guiltie of the old mans death. But of such faults he shall be told, when the Romans make warre vpon him the second time: for of that which happened in this their first Inuasion, I holde it superfluous to make re-

§. V.

Of PHILOTOENEN Generall of the Achaens: and MACHANIDAS, Tyrant of Lacedemon. A battaile betwene them, wherein MACHANIDAS is slaine.

IT happens often, that the decease of one eminent man discouers the vertue of another. In the place of Aratus there stood vp Philopamen:
whose notable valour, and great skill in Armes, made the Nation of the Achaens redoubtable among all the Greekes, and carelesse of such protection, as in former times they had needed against the violence of their neighbours. Thisisthat Philopamen: who being then a yong man, and hauing no command; did especial seruice to Antigonus at the battaile of Selasia against Cleomenes. Thenceforward vntill now he had spent the most part of his time in the Ile of Crete, the Inhabitants whereof being a valiant people, and seldome or neuer at peace betwene themselves; Hee bettered among them his knowledge, and practise in the Art of warre. At his returne home, Hee had charge of the Horse: wherein he carried himselfe so strictly, traauiling with all the Cities of the Confederacie to haue his followers well mounted, and armed at all peeces: as also he so diligently trained them vp in all exercise of seruice, that hee made the Achaens verie strong in that part of their forces. Being after chosen Prætor or Generall of the Nation, Hee had no lesse care to reforme their militarie discipline throughout, whereby his Countre might be strong enough to defend it selfe, and not any longer (as in former times) need to depend vpon the helpe of others. Hee perswaded the Achaens to cut off their vaine expence of brauerie, in apparell, household stuffe, and curious faine, and to bestow that cooll vpon their Armes: wherein by how much they were the more gallant, by so much were they like to proue the better Souldiers; and fureable in behauiour, vnto the pride of their furniture. They had serued hitherto with little light Bucklers, and slender Darts, to cast as farre off: that were vellefull in skirmishing at some distance, or for Surprizes, or sudden and hastie Expeditions; whereto Aratus had become most accustomed. But when they came to handle strokes, they were good for nothing: so as they were wholly driuen to relie vpon the courage of their Mercenaries. Philopamen altered this: causing them to arme themselves more weightily, to vse a larger kind of sheild, with good swords, and strong pikes. fit for seruice at hand. He taught them also to fight in close orders; and altered the forme of their embattailing: not making the Files so deepe as had bene accustomed, but extending the Front, that he might vse the seruice of many hands.

Eight Moneths were spent of that yeere, in which hee first was Prætor of the Achaens; when Machanidas the Tyrant of Lacedemon caused him to make triall, how his souldiers had profited by his discipline. This Machanidas was the successor vnto Lyorgus, a man more violent than his fore-goe. He kept in pay a strong Armie of Mercenaries: and he kept them not only to fight for Sparta; but to hold the the Citie in obedience to himselfe perforce. Wherefore it behoued him not to take part with the Achaens, that were fauourers of libertie; but to strengthen himselfe by freindship of the Asiatians: who, in making Alliances, tooke no further notice of Vice or Vertue, than as it had reference to their owne profit. The people also of Lacedemon, through their inueterate hatred vnto the Argines, Achaens, and Macedonians; were in like sort (all or most of them) inclinable to the Asiatian Faction. Verie vnwisely. For in seeking to take reuenge vpon those, that had lately hindered them from getting the Lordship of Peloponnesus; they hindred themselves thereby from recouering the Maistrie of their owne Citie. This affection of the Spartans, together with the regard of his owne securitie, and no small hope of good that would follow, suffered not Machanidas to be idle; but made him alwaies readie to fall vpon his neighbours backes, and take of theirs what he could, whilst they were enforced, by greater necessitie, to turne face another way. Thus had hee often done, especially in the absence of Philip: whose sudden coming into those parts, or some other opposition made against him, had usually made him faile of his attempts. At the present Hee was stronger in men, than were the Achaens; and thought his owne most better souldiours than were theirs.

Whilst Philip therefore was busied else where, hee entred the Countre of the Maninians: being not without hope to doe as Cleomenes had done before him; yea and perhaps to get the * Lordship of Peloponnesus, as hauing stronger freindes, and weaker opposition, than Cleomenes had found. But Philopamen was readie to entertaine him at Maninias, where was fought betwene them a great battaile. The Tyrant had brought into the fildes vpon Carres a great many of Engines; wherewith to beate vpon the Squadrons of his Enemies, and put them in disorder. To preuent this danger, Philopamen sent forth his light-armature a good way before him; so as Machanidas was faine to doe the like. To scold these, from the one and the other side came in continual supplie; till at length all the Mercenaries, both of the Achaens and of Machanidas, were drawne vp to the fight: being so far aduanced, each before their owne Platons, that it could no otherwise be discerned which pressed forward, or which recoyled, than by rising of the dust. Thus were Machanidas his Engines made vsurfeicable, by the interposition of his owne men; in such manner as the Canon is hindered from doing execution, in most of the battailes fought in these our times. The Mercenaries of the Tyrant preuailed at length: not onely by their aduantage of number, but (as Polybius well obserueth) by surmounting their opposites in degree of courage; wherein usually the hired souldiers of Tyrants exceed those that are waged by free States. For as it is true, that a free people are much more valiant, than they which lie oppressed by Tyrannie, since the one, by doing their best in fight, haue hope to acquire somewhat beneficiall to themselves, whereas the other doe fight (as it were) to assure their owne seruitude: so the Mercenaries of a Tyrant, being made partakers with him in the truites of his prosperitie, haue good cause to maintain his quarrell as their owne; whereas they that serue vnder a free State, haue no other motive to doe manfully, than their bare stipend. Further than this, When a free State hath gotten the Victorie: many Companies (if not all) of foreine Auxiliaries are presently cast; and therefore such good fellows, will not take much paines to bring the warre to an end. But the victorie of a Tyrant, makes him stand in neede of more such helpers: because that after it he doth wrong to more, as hauing more subjects; and therefore stands in feare of more, that should seek to take reuenge vpon him. The stipendiaries therefore of the Achaens, being forced to giue ground, were vrged so violently in their retreat by those of Machanidas, that shortly they be-tooke themselves to flight; and could not be staid by any perswasions of Philopamen, but ranne away quite beyond the battaile of the Achaens. This disaster had bene sufficient to take from Philopamen the honour of the day; had hee not wisely obserued the demcanour of Machanidas, and found in him that error which might restore

reitore the victorie. The Tyrant with his Mercinaries gaue chace vnto those that fled: leauing behind him in good order of battaile his Lacedemonians; whom hee thought sufficient to deale with the Acheans, that were alreadye disheartned by the flight of their companions. But when this his rashnesse had carried him out of sight, Philopamen aduanced towards the Lacedemonians that stood before him. There lay betwene them athwart the Countrie a long ditch, without water at that time; and therefore passable (as it seemed) without much difficultie, especially for Foot. The Lacedemonians adu ventured ouer it, as thinking themselves better fouldiers than the Acheans; who had in a manner alreadye lost the day. But hereby they greatly disordered their owne Battaille; and had no sooner the foremost of them re-
 10 covered the further banke, than they were stoutly charged by the Acheans, who draue them headlong into the ditch againe. Their firft ranks being broken, all the rest began to shrink: so as Philopamen getting ouer the ditch, easily chased them out of the Field. Philopamen knew better how to vse his aduantage, than Machanidas had done. He suffered not all his Armie to disband and follow the chace: but retained with him a sufficient strength, for the custodie of a bridge that was ouer the ditch, by which he knew that the Tyrant must come backe. The Tyrant with his Mercinaries returning from the chace, looked verie heauily when he saw what was fillen out. Yet with a lustie Troupe of Horse about him Hee made, towards the bridge: hoping to find the Acheans in disorder, and to set vpon their backs, as they 20 were carelessly pursuing their Victorie. But when he and his Companie saw Philopamen readie to make good the bridge against them; then beganne euerie one to looke, which way he might liuit for himselfe. The Tyrant, with no more than two in his companie, rode along the ditch side; and searched for an easie passage ouer. He was easily discouered by his purple Callocke, and the costly trappings of his Horse. Philopamen therefore leauing the charge of the bridge vnto another, coasted him all the way as he rode; and falling vpon him at length in the ditch it selfe, as he was getting ouer it, slew him there with his owne hand. There died in this Battaille on the Lacedemonians side about four thousand: and more than foure thousand were taken Prisoners. Of the Achean Mercinaries, probable it is that the losse was 30 not greatly cared for; since that War was at an end, and for their monie they might hire more when they should haue need.

§. V I.

PHILIP hauing peace with Rome, and with all Greece, prepares against Asia.
 Of the Kings of Pergamus, Cappadocia, Pontus, Paphlagonia, Bithynia, and their Linages. Of the Galatians.

BY this victorie the Acheans learned to thinke well of themselves. Neither needed they indeed after awhile (such was their discipline, and continual exercise) to account themselves in matter of warre inferior to any, that should haue brought against them no great oldes of number. As for the Macedonian, Hee made no great vse of them: But when he had once concluded peace with the Romans and Aetolians, He studied how to enlarge his Dominion Eastward; since the fortune of his friends the Carthaginians declined in the West. He tooke in hand many matters together, or verie nearly together, and some of them not honest: wherein if the Acheans would haue done 50 him seruice; they must, by helping him to oppress others that neuer had wronged him, haue taught him the way how to deale with themselves. He greatly hated Attalus King of Pergamus, who had joynd with the Romans and Aetolians in warre against him.

This

This Attalus, though a King, was scarce yet a Noble man, other wise than as he was ennobled by his owne, and by his Fathers vertue. His fortune beganne in Philetarus his Vncle: who being guelDED, by reason of a mishap which he had when he was a child, grew after wards thereby to be the more esteemed: as great men in those times reposed much confidence in Eunuches, whose afflictions could not be obliged vnto wifes or children. He was entertained into the familie of Decimus, a Captaine following Antigonus the first; and after the death of Antigonus, he accompanied his Master, that betooke himselfe to Lysimachus King of Thrace. Lysimachus had good opinion of him; and put him in truit with his monie and accompts. But when at length he stood in feare of this King, that grew a bloudie Tyrant: Hee 10 fled into Asia, where he seized vpon the Towne of Pergamus, and nine thousand talents belonging to Lysimachus. The towne and monie, together with his owne seruice, He offered vnto Seleucus the first, that then was readie to giue Lysimachus battell. His offer was kindly accepted, but neuer performed; for that Seleucus hauing slaine Lysimachus, died shortly after himselfe, before he made vse of Philetarus or his monie. So this Eunuch still retained Pergamus with the Countrie about it; and reigned therein twentie yeeres as an absolute King. Hee had two brethren: of which the elder is said to haue been a poore Carter, and the younger perhaps was not much better, before such time as they were raised by the fortune of this Eunuch. Philetarus left his Kingdome to the elder of these, or to the sonne of the elder called Eumenes. This Eumenes enlarged his Kingdome; making his aduantage of the difference, betwene Seleucus Calinicus and Antiochus the first; the sonnes of the second Antiochus. He fought a battaille with Alexander, neere vnto Sardes; and won the victorie. At which time, to animate his men against the Gauls that serued vnder his Enemy, he fed a pretie deuice. He wrote the word VICTORIE vpon the band of his Souldiery, in 20 such colours as would easily come off: and when the hostieler of the beast that was sacrificed, had cleanly taken the print of the letters, He published this vnto his Armie as a Miracle, plainly fore-shewing that the gods would be assistant in that Battaille.

After this victorie, he grew a dreadfull enemy to Seleucus: who neuer durst attempt to recouer from him, by warre, the Territorie that hee had gotten and held. Finally when he had reigned two and twentie yeeres, hee died by a surfeit of four-much drinke; and left his Kingdome to Attalus, of whom wee now entreat, that was sonne vnto Attalus the youngest brother of Philetarus. Attalus was an undertaking Prince, verie bountifull, and no lesse valiant. By his owne proper forces He restored his friend Ariarathes the Cappadocian into his Kingdome, whence hee had been expelled. He was grieuouly molested by Acheans: who setting vp himselfe as King against Antiochus the great, reigned in the lesser Asia. He was belieged in his owne Citie of Pergamus: but by helpe of the Tectosages, a Nation of the Gauls, whom hee called ouer out of Thrace, Hee recouered all that he had lost. When these Gauls had 40 once gotten footing in Asia, they neuer wanted employment: but were either entertained by some of the Princes reigning in those quarters; or interposed themselves, without inuitation, and found themselves worke in quarrels of their owne making. They caused Prusias King of Bithynia to cease from his warre against Byzantium. Whereunto when he had condescended; they neuerthelesse within a while after inuaded his Kingdome. Hee obtained against them a great victorie; and vsed it with great crueltie, sparing neither age nor sexe. But the swarme of them increasing; they occupied the Region about Nicomedia: where, in seating themselves, they were much beholding vnto Attalus. Neuerthelesse, presuming afterwards
 50 vpon their strength; they forced their neighbour Princes and Cities to pay them tribute. In the sharpe exaction whereof, they had no more respect vnto Attalus than to any that had worse deserved of them. By this they compelled him to fight against them: and Hee being victorious, compelled them to containe themselves within the bounds of that Prouince, which tooke name from them in time following.

ing, and was called Galatia. Yet continued they still to oppress the weakest of their neighbours; and to fill up the Armies of those, that could best hire them.

The Kings reigning in those parts, were the posteritie of such, as had saved themselves and their Provinces, in the slothful reigns of the Perians; or in the buie times of Alexander, and his Macedonian followers. The Cappadocians were verie ancient. For the first of their line had married with Atossa, sister vnto the great King Cyrus. Their Countrey was taken from them by Perdiccas, as is shewed before. But the son of that King, whom Perdiccas crucified, espying his time while the Macedonians were at ciuill warres among themselves, recovered his dominion, and passed it ouer to his offspring. The Kings of Pontus had also their beginning from the Persian Empire; and are said to haue issued from the royall house of Achamenes. The Phrygians deuied themselves from Pylamenes, a King that assisted Prismus at the warre of Troy. These, applying themselves vnto the times, were alwaies conformable vnto the strongest. The Ancestors of Prusias had begun to reigne in Bithynia, some few generations before that of the great Alexander. They lay somewhat out of the Macedonians way: by whom therefore, hauing other employment, they were the lesse molested. Calpurnius, one of Alexanders Captaines, made an Expedition into their Countrey; where hee was vanquished. They had afterwards to doe with a Lieutenant of Antigonius, that made them somewhat more humble. And thus they suffred, as did the rest, vntill the reigns of Prusias, whom wee haue already some-<sup>20</sup> times mentioned.

§. VII.

The Towne of Cius taken by Philip, at the instance of Prusias King of Bithynia, and cruelly destroyed. By this and like actions, Philip grows hatefull to many of the Greekes; and is warred vpon by Attalus King of Pergamus, and by the Rhodians.

PRUSIAS as a neighbour King, had many quarrels with Attalus; whose greatness he suspected. He therefore strengthened himselfe, by taking to wife the daughter of Philip; as Attalus, on the contrarie side, entered into a strict Confederacie with the Aetolians, Rhodians, and other of the Greekes. But when Philip had ended his Aetolian warre, and was dealing with Antiochus about sharing betwene them two the Kingdome of Egypt, wherein Ptolemie Philopater a friend vnto them both was newly dead, and had left his sonne Ptol. Epiphanes a yong child his heire; the Bithynian entreated this his Father-in-law to come ouer into Asia, there to winne the Towne of the Cians, and bestow it vpon him. Prusias had no right vnto the Towne, nor iust matter of quarrell against it: but it was fitly seated for him; and therewithall rich. Philip came; as one that could not well denie to helpe his Sonne-in-law. But hereby hee mightily offended no small part of Greece. Embassadors came to him whilst hee lay at the seige, from the Rhodians, and diuers other States: entreating him to forsake the Enterprise. He gaue dilatorie, but otherwise gentle answeres: making shew as if he would condescend to their request; when he intended nothing lesse. At length hee got the Towne: where, euen in presence of the Embassadors, of whose sollicitation hee had seemed so regardfull, He omitted no part of crueltie. Hereby hee rendered himselfe odious to his neighbours, as a peridious and cruell Prince. Especially his Fact was detested of the Rhodians: who had made vehement intercession for the poore Cians; and were aduertised by Embassadors of purpose sent vnto them from Philip, That, howsoeuer it were in his power to winne the Towne as soon as he listed; yet in regard of his loue to the Rhodians, Hee was contented to

grieue it ouer. And by this his clemencie the Embassadors said, that he would manifest vnto the World, what slanderous tongues they were; which noyed abroad such reports, as went of his fallhood and oppressions. Whilst the Embassadors were delecting at Rhodes in the Theater to this effect, there came some that made a true relation of what had hapned: shewing that Philip had sacked and destroyed the Towne of Cius, and, after a cruell slaughter of the Inhabitants, had made slaues of all that escaped the sword. If the Rhodians tooke this in great despight, no lesse were the Aetolians inflamed against him: since they had sent a Captaine to take charge of the Towne; being warned before by his doings at Lysimachia and Chalcidion (which he had withdrawne from their Confederacie to his owne) what little trust was to be reposed in the faith of this King. But most of all others was Attalus moued, with consideration of the Macedonians violent ambition, and of his owne estate. He had much to loose; and was not without hope of getting much, if he could make a strong Partie in Greece. He had already, as a new King, followed the example of Alexanders Captaines, in purchasing with much liberality the loue of the Athenians; which were notable Trumpeters of other mens vertues, hauing lost their owne. On the freindship of the Aetolians hee had cause to presume; hauing bound them vnto him by good offices, many and great, in their late warre with Philip. The Rhodians that were mightie at Sea, and held verie good intelligence with the Aegyptians, Syrians, and many other Princes and States, Hee easily drew into a straight Alliance with him; by their hatred newly conceived against Philip.

Vpon confidence in these his friends, but most of all in the readie assistance of the Rhodians, Attalus prepared to deale with the Macedonian by open warre. It had beene vnseasonable to procrastinate, and expect whereto the doings of the Enemy tended; since his desire to fallen vpon Asia was manifest, and his fallhood no lesse manifest, than was such his desire. They met with him shortly not farre from Cnius, and fought with him a battaile at Sea: wherein though Attalus was driuen to runne his owne shippe on ground, hardly escaping to land: though the Admiral of the Rhodians tooke his deaths wound: and though Philip after the battaile tooke harbour vnder a Promontorie, by which they had fought, so that hee had the gathering of the Wracks vpon the shore: Yet so much as Hee had suffered farre greater losse of ships and men, than had the Enemy: and since Hee durst not in few dayes after put forth to Sea, when Attalus and the Rhodians came to braue him in his Port; the honour of the victorie was adjudged to his Enemies. This notwithstanding, Philip afterwards besieged and wanne some Townes in Caria: whether onely in a brauerie, and to despight his opposites; or whether vpon any hopefull desire of conquest; it is vncertaine. The stratageme, by which hee wonne Prinassus, is worthe of noting. Hee attempted it by a Myne: and finding the Earth so stonie, that it resisted his worke, Hee neuertheless commanded the Pyoniers to make a noyde vnder ground; and secretly in the night-time Hee rayed great Mounts about the entrance of the Myne, to breed an opinion in the besieged, that the work went meruailously forward. At length hee sent word to the Townesmen: that by his vnder-myning, two acres of their wall stood onely vpon wooden props: to which if hee gaue fire, and entred by a breach, they should expect no mercie. The Prinassians little thought, that hee had fetcht all his earth and rubbish by night a great way off; to raise vp those heapes which they saw; but rather that all had beene extracted out of the Myne. Wherefore they suffered themselves to be out-ficed; and gaue vp the Towne as lost, which the Enemy had no hope to winne by force. But Philip could not stae to fettle himselfe in those parts. Attalus and the Rhodians were too strong for him at Sea, and compelled him to make halt back into Atacodon; whither they followed him all the way in manner of pursuit.

§. VIII.

§. VIII.

The Romans, after their Carthaginian warre, seek matter of quarrell against PHILIP. The Athenians, upon slight cause, proclaime warre against PHILIP, moved thereto by ATALUS; whom they flatter. PHILIP winnes divers Townes: and makes peremptorie answer to the Roman Embassadors. The furious resolution of the Athenians.

THese Asiaticke matters, which no way concerned the Romans, yet forced well to make a noyle in Rome; and fill the peoples heads, it not with a desire of making warre in Macedon, at least with a conceipt that it were expedient so to doe. The Roman Senate was perfectly informed of the state of those Easterne Countries; and knew, that there was none other Nation than the Greekes, which lay betwene them and the Lordship of Asia. These Greekes were factious, and seldom or neuer at peace. As for the Macedonians, though length of time, and continuall dealings in Greece ever since the Reignes of Philip and Alexander, had left no difference betwene him and the Naturals: yet most of them abhorred his Dominion, because Hee was originally forsooth a Barbarian: many of them hated him upon ancient quarrels: and they that had bene most beholding vnto him, were neuertheless wearie of him, by reason of his personall faults. All this gaue hope, that the affaires of Greece would not long detain the Roman Armies: especially since the diuisions of the Countrey were such, that euery petty Estate was apt to take counsaile apart for it selfe; without much regarding the generalitie. But the poore Commonaltie of Rome, had no great affection to such a chargeable enterprise. They were alreadie quite exhauished, by that grieuous warre with Hannibal: wherein they had giuen by Loan to the Republicke all their monie: neyther had they as yet receiued, neyther did they receiue vntill fifteene or sixteene yeares after this, their whole summe backe againe. That part of payment also which was alreadie made, being not in present monie, but much of it in Land: it behoued them to reit awhile; and bestow the more diligence in tilling their grounds, by how much they were the lesse able to bestow cost. Wherefore they tooke no pleasure to heare, that Attalus and the Rhodians had sent Embassadors to sollicite them against Philip, with report of his bold attempts in Asia: or that Antiochus, their Agent in Greece, had sent letters of the same tenour to the Senate, and magnified his intelligence, by setting out the preparations of this dangerous enemie, that solicited not only the Townes vpon the Continent, but all the lands in those Seas, visiting them in person, or sending Embassadors, as one that meant thorowly to hold warre with the Romans vpon their owne ground. Philip had indeed no such intent: neither was he much too strong, either of himselfe, or by his alliance in Greece, to be resisted by Attalus and the Rhodians, especially with the helpe of the Italian their good friends, and (in a manner) his owne professed enemies. But such things must be published abroad, if only to predispose men vnto the warre, and giue it the more honest colour.

Philip was a man of ill condition; and therefore could not thrive by intermeddling in the affaires of those, that were more mighty than him selfe. Hee was too vnskillfull, or otherwise too vnapt, to retaine his old friends: yet hee had needes bee seeking new enemies. And he found them such, as hee desired to haue them: for hee offered his helpe to their destruction, when they were in miserie, and had done him no harme. It behoued him therefore, either to haue strained his forces to the vtmost in making warre vpon them; or, in dissuading from that injurious course, to haue made amends for the wrongs past, by doing friendly offices of his owne accord. But Hee, hauing broken that League of peace which is of all other the most naturall, natural, binding all men to offer no violence willingly, vnlesse they think themselves iustly provoked; as afterwards too fondly persuaded, that he might well be secured the Romans, because of the written Couenants of peace betwene him & them. There is not any forme of oath, whereby such articles of peace can bee held inuiolable, save only by the water of Styx; that is, by Aesetie: which whillett it bindes one partie, or both vnto performance, making it apparent that hee shall bee a looser who starts from the Conditions; it may so long (and so long onely) bee presumed, that there shall be no breach. Till Hannibal was vanquished, the Romans neuer hearkened after Philip: for necessitie made them let him alone. But when once they had peace with Carthage, then was this Riuer of Styx dried vp: and then could they sweare, as Mercutio did in the Comedie, by their owne selues, euen by their good sword, that they had good reason to make warre vpon him. The Voyage of Sapient into Africke, and the present warre against Attalus; were matter of quarrell as much as needed: or if this were not enough, the Athenians helped to furnish them with more.

The Athenians, being at this time Lords of no more than their owne barren Territories, tooke state vpon them neuertheless, as in their ancient fortune. Two yong Gentlemen of Acarania entering into the Temple of Ceres, in the dayes of Initiation, (wherein were deliuered the mysteries of Religion, or rather of Idolatrous superstition, vainly said to bee auaileable vnto felicity after this life) discouered themselves by some impertinent questions, to be none of those that were initiated. Hereupon they were brought before the Officers: and though it was apparent, that they came into the place by mere error, not thinking to haue therein done amiss; yet, as it had bene for some heinous crime, they were put to death. All their Countymen at home tooke this in ill part; and sought to reuenge it as a publike iniurie, by warre vpon the Athenians. Procuring therefore of Philip some Macedonian to helpe them, they entered into Attica: who waited it with fire and sword; and caried thence away with them a great bootie. This indignitie stirred vp the high-minded Athenians; and made them thinke vpon doing more, than they had abilitie to performe. All which at the present they could doe, was to send Embassadors to King Attalus; gratulating his happie successe against Philip, and entreating him to visit their Citie. Attalus was hereto the more willing; because Hee vnderstood, that the Roman Embassadors, boursing about Greece for matter of intelligence, had a purpose to bee there at the same tyme. So hee went thither, accompanied, besides his own followers, with some of the Rhodians. Landing in the Præse, he found the Romans there, with whom he had much friendly conference: they reioycing that hee continued enemie to Philip; and Hee being no lesse glad, when he heard of their purpose to renew the warre. The Athenians came forth of their Citie, all the Magistrats, Priests, and Citizens, with their wives and children, in as solempne pompe as they could deuise, to meet and honour the King. They entertained the Romans that were with him, in verie louing manner: but towards Attalus himselfe they omitted no point of obsequence, which their flatterie could suggest. At his first coming into the Citie they called the people to Assembly: where they desired him to honour them with his presence, and let them heare him speake. But he excused himselfe, saying, That with an euill grace he should recount vnto them those many benefits, by which hee studied to make them know what loue he bore them. Wherefore it was thought fit, that he should deliuer in writing, what he would haue to bee propounded. Hee did so. The points of his Declaration were; first, what hee had willingly done for their sake; then, what had lately passed betwene him and Philip: lastly, an exhortation vnto them to declare themselves against the Macedonians, whilst Hee with the Rhodians, and the Romans, were willing and readie to take their part: which if they now refused to doe, Hee protested, that afterwards it would be vaine to craue his helpe. There needed little entreatie: for they were as willing to proclaime the warre, as Hee to desire it. As for other matters, they loaded him with immoderate honours:

and ordained, That vnto the ten Tribes, whereof the bodie of their Citizens consisted, should be added another, and called after his name; as if Hee were in part one of their Founders. To the Rhodiens they also decreed a Crowne of Gold, in reward of their vertue; and made all the Rhodiens free Citizens of Athen.

This beganne a great noyse of warre, wherein little was left vnto the Romans for their parts, Attalus and the Rhodiens taking all vpon them. But while these were vainly mispending the time, in seeking to draw the Ætoliens to their partie: they contrarie to their olds manner were glad to bee at quiet: Philip waſne the Townes of Macedonia and Ænus, with many other strong places about the Helleſpont. Likewise passing over the Helleſpont, Hee laid siege vnto Abydus; and wanne it, though Hee was faine to haile there long. The Towne held out, rather vpon an obſtinate reſolution, and hope of ſuccour from Attalus and the Rhodiens, than any great abilitie to defend it ſelfe againſt ſo mightie an Enemy. But the Rhodiens ſent thither onely one Quadrimeſ Gallie: and Attalus no more than three hundred men; farre to weaken aide to make good the place. The Roman Embaſſadours wondred much at this great negligence, of them that had taken ſo much vpon them.

Theſe Embaſſadours C. Claudius, M. Æmilius, and P. Sempronius, were ſent vnto Ptolemie, Epiphane King of Egypt, to acquaint him with their Viſtorie againſt Hannibal, and alſo to thanke him for his fauour vnto them ſhewed in that warre; and to deſire the continuance thereof, if they ſhould neede it againſt Philip. This Egyptian King was now in the third or fourth year of his Reigne, (as his Father Philipper had done before him) Hee beganne a verie young boy. The courteſie for which the Romans were to thanke him, was, That out of Egypt they had lately bene ſupplied with Corne, in a time of extreme Dearth; when the miſeries of Warre had made all their owne Prouinces vnable to relieue them. This meſſage could not but be welcome to the Egyptian: ſince it was well knowne, how Philip and Antiochus had combined themſelves againſt him; conſpiring to take away his Kingdome. And therefore it might in reaſon bee hoped, that Hee, or ſo his Councell for him, ſhould offer to ſupplie the Romans with Corne: ſince this Macedonian Expedition, concerned his Eſtate no leſſe than theirs.

But as the errand was for the moſt part complementall: ſo had the Embaſſadours both leiſure, and direction from the Senate, to looke vnto the things of Greece by the way. Wherefore they agreed, that M. Æmilius the youngeſt of them ſhould ſteppe aſide, and viſit Philip, to trie if Hee could make him leaue the ſiege of Abydus; which elſe Hee was like to carrie. Æmilius, coming to Philip, telles him, that his doings are contrarie to the League that Hee had made with the Romans. For Attalus and the Rhodiens, vpon whom Hee made Warre, were Confederate with Rome: and the Towne of Abydus, which Hee was now beſieging, had a kind of dependencie vpon Attalus. Hereto Philip answered, That Attalus and the Rhodiens had made Warre vpon him: and that Hee did onely requite them with the like. Doe you alſo (ſayd Æmilius) requite theſe poore Abydens with ſuch terrible Warre, for any ſuch like Inuſion by them firſt made vpon you? The King was angrie to heare himſelfe thus taken ſhort: and therefore Hee roundly made anſwere to Æmilius; it is your youth, Sir, and your beautie, and (above all) your being a Roman, that makes you thus preſumptuous. But I would wiſh you to remember the League that yett haue made with me, and to keepe it: if you doe otherwiſe, I will make you vnderſtand, that the Kingdome of Macedonia is in matter of Warre, no leſſe noble than the Roman. So Hee diſmiſſed the Embaſſadour; and had the Towne immediately yeelded to his diſcretion. The people had entertained a reſolution, to haue died euerie one of them and ſet their Towne on fire; binding themſelves hereto by

by a fearefull oath, when Philip denied to accept them vpon reaſonable Conditions. But hauing in deſperate fight, once repelling him from the Breach, loſt the greateſt number of their Youth: it was thought meet by the Gouvernours and Ancients of the Citie, to change this reſolution, and take ſuch peace as could be gotten. So they carried out their Gold and Silver to Philip: about which whileſt they were buſie, the memorie of their oath wrought ſo effectually in the younger ſort that, by exhortation of their Priests, they ſet to murdering their women, children, and themſelves. Hereof the King had ſo little compaſſion, that He ſaid, he would grant the Abydens three dayes leiſure to die: and to that end forbade his men to enter the Towne, or hazard themſelves in interrupting the violence of thoſe mad fooles.

The Romans decree warre againſt Philip, and ſend one of their Conſuls into Greece, ſit were in defence of the Athenians their Confederates.
How poore the Athenians were at this time,
both in qualitie and eſtate.

His calamitic of the Abydens, was likened by the Romans vnto that of the Saguntines: which indeed it nearely reſembled; though Rome was not alike intereſſed in the quarrell. But to helpe themſelves with pretence for the warre, they had found out another Saguntum, euen the Citie of Athen: which if the Macedonian ſhould winne, then reſted there no more to doe, than that he ſhould preſently embarke himſelfe for Italie, whether he would come, not as Hannibal from Saguntum in ſixe monethes, but in the ſhort ſpace of ſixe dayes ſaying. Thus P. Sulpicius the Conſul tolde the Multitude, when he exhorted them to make warre vpon Philip, which at his firſt propounding they had denied. The example of Pyrrhus was by him alleadged; to ſhew, what Philip, with the power of a greater kingdome, might dare to undertake: as alſo the fortunate Voyage of Scipio into Aſtick, to ſhew the difference of making warre abroad, and admitting it into the bowels of their owne Countreie. By ſuch arguments was the Commonalty of Rome induced to beleeue, that this warre with the Macedonian was both juſt and neceſſarie. So it was decreed: and immediately the ſame Conſul halted away towards Macedonia, hauing that Prouince allotted vnto him before, and all things in a readineſſe, by order from the Senate; who followed other Motiues, than the people muſt be acquainted with. Great thanks were giuen to the Athenian Embaſſadours, for their conſtancie (as was ſaid) in not changing their faith at ſuch time as they ſtood in danger of being beſieged. And indeed great thanks were due to them; though not vpon the ſame occaſion. For the people of Rome had no cauſe to thinke it a benefit vnto themſelves, that any Greece Towne, reſuſing to ſue vnto the Macedonian for peace, requelted their helpe againſt him. But the Senate intending to take in hand the Conqueſt of the Eaſterne partes, had reaſon to giue thanks vnto thoſe, that miniſtred the occaſion. Since therefore it was an vntrue ſuggeſtion, that Philip was making readie for Italie: and ſince neyther Attalus, the Rhodiens, nor any other State in thoſe quarters, deſired the Romans to giue them protection: theſe buſie-headed Athenians, who falling out with the Acarnanians, and conſequently with Philip, about a matter of May game, (as was ſhewed before) ſent Embaſſadours into all parts of the World, euen to Ptolemie of Egypt, and to the Romans, as well as to Attalus and other their neighbours; muſt be accepted as cauſe of the warre, and Authours of the benefit thence redounding.

Neuertheleſſe as it loues to fall out where the meaning differs from the pretence: the doings of P. Sulpicius the Conſul were ſuch, as might haue argued Athen to bee the leaſt part of his care. Hee failed not about Peloponneſus, but tooke the readie way to Macedonia, and landing about the Riuer of Apfus, betwene Dyrachium and Apollonia, there beganne the warre. Soone vpon his comming the Athenian Embassadors were with him, and craued his helpe: whereof they could make no benefit whilst he was so farre from them. They bemoaned themselves as men besieged, and entreated him to deliuer them. For which cause He sent vnto them C. Claudius with twentie Gallies, and a competent number of men: but the maine of his forces He retained with him, for the prosecution of a greater designe. The Athenians were not indeede befieged: onely some Rouers from Chalcis, in the Ile of Euboea, and some bands of aduenturers out of Corinth, vsed to take their shippes and spoile their fields, because they had declared themselves against King Philip, that was Lord of these two Townes. The Robberies done by these Pyrats and free booters, were by the more eloquent than warlike Athenians, in this declining Age of their Fortune and Vertue, called a Seige. From such detriment the arrival of Claudius, and shortly after of three Rhodian Gallies, easily precluded them. As for the Athenians themselves, they that had beene wont, in ancient times, to vndertake the Conquests of Aegypt, Cyprus, and Sicily, to make warre vpon the great Persian King; and to hold so much of Greece in subjection, as made them redoubtable vnto all the rest: had now no more than three Shippes, and those open ones, not much better than long Boates. Yet thought they not themselves whitt the worse men; but stood as highly vpon the glorie and vertue of their Ancestors, as if it had beene fill their owne.

§. X.

The Towne of Chalcis in Euboea, taken and sackt by the Romans and their Associates, that lay in Garrison at Athens. PHILIP attempteth to take Athens by Surprise: murthereth the Countie about, and makes a iourne into Peloponnesus. Of NABIS the Tyrant of Lacedemon, and his wife. PHILIP offers to make warre against NABIS for the Achaens, he returneth home through Attica, which he spoileth againe, and provides against his Enemies. Some exploits of the Romans. Divers Princes ioyne with them. Great labouring to draw the Etoliens into the warre.

PHILIP, returning home from Abydos, heard newes of the Roman Consul his being about Apollonia. But ere he stirred forth to giue him entertainments or perhaps before hee had well resolved, whether it were best while to sit still, and trie what might bee done for obtaining of peace, or whether to make opposition, and resist these Inuaders with all his forces: Hee receiued aduertisement from Chalcis of a grievous mishap there befallen him, by procurement of the Athenians. For C. Claudius with his Romans, finding no such worke at Athens as they had expected, or as was answerable to the fame that went abroad, purposed to doe somewhat that might quicken the Warre, and make his owne employment better. Hee grew soone wearie of sitting as a Scarre-Crowe, to saue the Athenians grounds from spoile; and therefore gladly tooke in hand a businesse of more importance. The Towne of Chalcis was negligently guarded by the Macedonian Souldiours therein, for that there was no enemy at hand, and more negligently by the Townsmen, who reposed themselves vpon their Garrison. Hereof Claudius hauing aduertisement, sailed thither by night for feare of being defiered; and, arriving there a little before breake of day, tooke it by Scalado. He vsed no mercie, but slew all that came in his way: and wanting men to keepe it (vnlesse he should haue left the heartlesse Athenians to their owne defence) He set it on fire, consuming the Kings Magazines of Corne, and all provisions for warre, which were plentifully filled. Neither were He and his Associates contented contented with the great abundance of spoile which they carried aboard their shippes; and with enlarging all those, whom Philip, as in a place of most securitie, kept there imprisoned: but to shew their despiight and hatred vnto the King, they ouerthrew and brake in peeces the Statues vnto him there erected. This done, they halted away towards Athens: where the newes of their exploit were like to be ioyfully welcomed. The King lay then at Demetrias about some twentie miles thence: whither when these tidings, or part of them, were brought him, though he saw that it was too late to remedie the matter; yet hee made all hast to take revenge. Hee thought to haue taken the Athenians with their trustie friends, bulie at worke in ransacking the Towne, and loading themselves with spoile: but they were gone before his comming. Fieue thousand light-armed foot hee had with him, and three hundred horse: whereof leauing at Chalcis onely a few to burie the dead, Hee marched thence away speedily towards Athens: thinking it not vnpossible to take his enemies, in the ioy of their victorie, as full of negligence, as they had taken Chalcis. Neither had he much failed of his expectation; if a Foot-poll, that stood Scour for the Citie vpon the borders, had not defiered him a far off, and twisfly carried word of his approach to Athens. It was midnight when this Post came thither: who found all the Towne asleepe, as fearelesse of any danger. But the Magistrates, hearing his report, caused a trumpet out of their Citadell to sound the Alarme; and with all speed made readie for defence. Within a few houres Philip was there: who seeing th: many lights, and other signes of bulie preparation vsuall in such a case, vnderstood that they had newes of his comming; and therefore willed his men, to repose themselves till it were day. It is like, that the paucitie of his followers did helpe well to animate the Citizens, which beheld them from the wals. Wherefore though Claudius were not yet returned (who was to fetch a compasse about by Sea, and had no cause of halt) yet hauing in the Towne some mercinarie fouldiours; which they kept, of their owne, besides the great multitude of Citizens; they aduentured to issue forth at a gate, whereto they saw Philip make approach. The King was glad of this; reckoning all those his owne, that were thus hardie. Hee therefore only willed his men to follow his example; and presently gaue charge vpon them. In that fight he gaue singular proofe of his valour: and beating downe many of the Enemies with his owne hands, draue them with great slaughter backe into the Citie. The heat of his courage transported him further, than discretion would haue allowed, euen to the verie gate. But he retired without harme taken; for that they which were vpon the Towers ouer the gate, could not vse their calling weapons against him, without endangering their owne people that were thronging before him into the Citie. There was a Temple of Hercules, a place of exercise, with a Grove, and many goodly Monuments besides, nere adioyning vnto Athens: of which he spared none; but sufferd the rage of his anger to extend, euen vnto the sepulchers of the dead. The next day came the Romans, and some Companies of Attalus his men from Aegina; too late, in regard of what was alreadye past; but in good time, to preuent him of satisfiying his anger to the full, which as yet hee had not done. So he departed thence to Corinth: and hearing that the Achaens held a Parliament at Argos, He came thither to them vnexpected.

The Achaens were deuiing vpon warre, which they intended to make against Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedemon: who being started vp in the roomes of Machinidas, did greater mischiefte than any that went before him. This Tyrant relied wholly vpon his Mercinaries; and of his subjects had no regard. He was a cruell oppressor; a greedy extortioner vpon those that liued vnder him; and one, that in his naturall condition smelt rankly of the Hangman. In these qualities, his wife Apegea was very fitly matched with him: since his dexteritie was no greater in spoiling the men, than hers in fleeing their wiuers; whom shee would neuer suffer to be at quiet, till they had presented her with all their iewels and apparell. Her husband was so delighted with her propertie, that hee caused an Image to bee made liuely representing her; and

and apparelled it with fuch colly garments as thee vsed to weare. But it was indeede an engine, lurking to torment men. Hercof he made vse, when hee meant to trie the vertue of his Rhetoricke. For calling vnto him some rich man, of whose monie hee was delirous; and hee would bring him into the roome where this counterfeit Apega stood, there vsed all his art of perswasion, to get what hee desired, as it were by good will. If hee could not so speede, but was answered with excuses: then tooke he the refractorie denier by the hand, and told him, that perhaps his wife Apega (who late by in a chaire) could perswade more effectually. So hee led him to the Image, that rose vp and opened the armes, as it were for embracement. Those armes were full of sharpe yron nailes, the like whereof were also sticking in the breasts, though hidden with her clothes; and herewith the griped the poore wretch to the pleasure of the Tyrant, that laughed at his cruell death. Such and worse (for it were long to tell all here that is spoken of him) was Nabis in his Gouernement. In his dealings abroad hee combined with the Aetolians, as Machinidas and Lycorgus had done before him. By these hee grew into acquaintance with the Romans; and was comprehended in the League which they made with Philip, at the end of their former warre. Of Philopamen vertue hee stood in feare; and therefore durst not prouoke the Achaens, as long as they had such an able Commander. But when Cyclades, a farr worse Capitaine, was their Prætor; and all or the greatest part of their Mercenaries were discharged; Philopamen being also gone into Crete, to follow his beloued Occupation of warre: then did Nabis fall vpon their Territory, and walking all the felds, made them distrust their owne safetie in the Townes.

Against this Tyrant the Achaens were preparing for warre, when Philip came among them; and had set downe, what proportion of souldiours cuerie Citie of their Corporation should furnish out. But Philip willed them, not to trouble themselves with the care of this businesse, forasmuch as he alone would ease them of this warre, and take the burden vpon himselfe. With exceeding ioy and thanks they accepted of this kind offer. But then he told them, that whilst hee made warre vpon Lacedæmon, hee ought not to leaue his owne Townes vnguarded. In which respect he thought they would be pleased, to send a few men to Corinth, and some Companies into the Ile of Eubœa; that so he might securely pursue the war against Nabis. Immediately they found out his deuce: which was none other, than to engage their Nation in his war against the Romans. Wherefore their Prætor Cyclades made him answer, That their Lawes forbade them to conclude any other matters in their Parliament, than those for which it was assembled. So passing the Decree, vpon which they had agreed before, for preparing war against Nabis; hee brake vp the Assemblie, with cuerie mans good liking: whereas in former times, hee had leene thought no better than one of the Kings Parafites.

It grieued the King to haue thus fayled in his purpose with the Achaens. Nevertheless hee gathered vp among them a few Voluntaries; and so returned by Corinth backe into Attica. There he met with Philotes one of his Captaines, that with two thousand men had been doing what harme he might vnto the Countrey. With this addition of strength, he attempted the Castle of Eleusine, the Hauens of Pyræus, and euen the Citie of Athens. But the Romans made fuch hast after him by Sea, thrusting themselves into cuerie of these places; that hee could no more than weake his anger vpon those goodlie Temples, with which the Land of Attica was at that time singularly beautified. So He destroyed all the workes of their notable Artificers, wrought in excellent Marble: which they had in plenty, of their owne; or, having long agoe bene Masters of the Sea, had brought from other places, where best choice was found. Neither did hee onely pull all downe: but caused his men to breake the verie stones, that they might be vsuerceable to the reparation. His losse at Chalcis being thus reuenged vpon Athens, hee went home into Macedon: and there made prouision, both against the Roman Consul that lay about Apollonia; and against the Dardaniens, with other his bad neighbours, which were likely to self felt him. Among his other cares he forgot not the Aetolians: to whose Parliament, shortly to be held at Naupactus, he sent an Embassage; requesting them to continue in his friendship. Thus was Philip occupied.

Sulpicius the Roman Consul encamped vpon the Riuer of Aspis. Thence he sent forth Apustius, his Lieutenant, with part of the Armie to walt the borders of Macedon. Apustius tooke fundrie Castles and Townes; vining fuch extremities of sword and fire at Antipatria, the first good Towne which he wan by force, that none durst afterwards make resistance, vnlesse they knew themselves able to hold out. Returning towards the Consul with his spoile, He was charged in Rece, vpon the passage of a Brooke, by Athenagoras a Macedonian Capitaine: but the Romans had the better; and killing many of these enemies, tooke prisoners many more, to the increase of their bootie, with which they arrived in safetie at their Campe. The successe of this Expedition, though it were not great; yet serued to draw into the Roman freindship, those that had formerly no good inclination to the Macedonian. These were Pleuratus, the sonne of Sceadalaides the Thyrian; Aminander King of the Albanians; and Bato, the sonne of Longarus, a Prince of the Dardaniens. They offered their assistance vnto the Consul, who thanked them: and said, That hee would shortly make vse of Pleuratus and Bato, when hee entred into Macedon: but that the freindship of Aminander, whose Countrey lay betwene the Aetolians and Thessalies, might be perhaps auailable with the Aetolians, to stirre them vp against Philip.

So the present care, was wholly set vpon the Aetolian Parliament at hand. Thither came Embassadors from the Macedonian, Roman, and Athenian. Of which, the Macedonian spake first: and said, That as there was nothing fallen out, which should occasion the breach of peace betwene his Master and the Aetolians: so was it to be hoped, that they would not suffer themselves without good cause, to be carried away after other mens fancies. He prayed them to consider, how the Romans heretofore had made shew, as if their warre in Greece tended onely to defence of the Aetolians: and yet notwithstanding had bene angry, that the Aetolians, by making peace with Philip, had no longer neede of such their Patronage. What might it be that made them so buile, in obtruding their protection vpon those that needed it not? Surely it was euen the generall hatred, which these Barbarians bore vnto the Greekes. For euen after the same sort had they leant their help to the Momertines: and afterwards deliuered Syracuse, when it was oppressed by Carthaginian Tyrants: but now both Syracuse and Messana, were subiect vnto the Rods and Axes of the Romans. To the same effect hee alledged many examples, adding, That in like sort it would happen to the Aetolians: who, if they drew fuch Masters into Greece, must not looke hereafter to hold, as now, free Parliaments of their owne, wherein to consult about Warre and Peace: the Romans would ease them of this care, and send them fuch a Moderator, as went cuerie yeere from Rome to Syracuse. Wherefore he concluded, That it was best for them, whilst as yet they might, and whilst one of them as yet could helpe the other, to continue in their League with Philip: with whom if at any time, vpon light occasion, they happened to fall out, they might as lightly be reconciled: and with whom they had three yeares agoe made the peace which stil continued; although the same Romans were then against it, who sought to breake it now.

It would haue troubled the Romans, to frame a good answer to these obiections. For the Macedonian had spoken the verie truth, in shewing whereto their Patronage, which they offered with fuch importunity, did tend. Wherefore the Athenians were set on by them to speake next: who had store of eloquence, and matter of recrimination enough, to make Philip odious. These affirmed, that it was a great impudence in the Macedonian Embassador, to call the Romans by the name of Barbarians: knowing in what barbarous manner his owne King had, in few dayes past, made war vpon the gods themselves, by destroying all their Temples in Attica. Herewithall they made a pittifull rehearsal of their

owne calamities: and said, that if Philip might haue his will: Ætolia, and all the reſt of Greece, ſhould feele the ſame that Attira had felt; yea that, Athens it ſelfe, together with Minerva, Iupiter, Ceres, and other of the gods, were like to haue felt, if the wals and the Roman armes had not defended them. Then ſpoke the Romans: who excuſing, as well as they could, their owne oppreſſion of all thoſe, in whoſe defence they had heretofore taken armes, went roundly to the point in hand. They ſaid, that they had of late made warre in the Ætolians behalfe, and that the Ætolians had without their conſent made peace: whereof ſince the Ætolians muſt excuſe themſelues, by alleging that the Romans, being buſied with Carthage, wanted leiſure to giue them aid conuenient: ſo this excuſe being now taken away, and the Romans wholly bent againſt their common Enemy, it concerned the Ætolians to take part with them in their war and victorie, vneleſſe they had rather periſh with Philip.

It might eaſily be perceiued, that they which were ſo vehement, in offering their helpe ere it was deſired: were theſe ſelues carried into the war by more carnell motives, than a ſimple deſire to helpe thoſe friends, with whom they had no great acquaintance. This may haue bene the cauſe, why Dorymeas the Ætolian Prætor thiſted them off awhile with a dilatorie answer: though hee told his Countreymen, That by referring themſelues, till the matter were inclined one way or other, they might afterwards take part with thoſe that had the better fortune. His answer was, firſt, in generall termes; That our much had was an enemy to good conſeil: for which cauſe they muſt further deliberate, ere they concluded. But coming neerer to the matter in hand, He paſſed a Decree, That the Prætor might at any time call an Aſſembly of the States, and therein conſider upon this buſineſſe, any Law to the contrary notwithstanding: whereas other wiſe it was vnlawfull to treat of ſuch affaires, except in two of their great Parliaments, that were held at ſet times.

§. XI.

The meeting of Philip with the Romans, and ſkirmiſhing with them on his borders. The Ætolians invade his dominions, and are beaten home. Some doings of Attalus and the Roman Fleet.

PHILIP* was glad to heare, that the Romans had ſped no better in their ſolicitation of the Ætolians. He thought them hereby diſappointed, in the very beginning, of one great helpe; and meant himſelfe to diſappoint them of another. His ſonne Perſeus, a very boy, was ſent to keepe the ſtreights of Pelagonia againſt the Dardaniens; hauing with him ſome of the Kings Councell, to gouerne both him and his armie. It was iudged as may ſeeme, that the preſence of the Kings ſonne, how young ſoever, would both encourage his followers, and terrifie the enemies; by making them at leaſt beleeue, that he was not weakly attended. And this may haue been the reaſon, why the ſame Perſeus, a few yeares before this, was in like manner left vpon the borders of Ætolia by his father; who more earneſt buſineſſe called thence another way. No danger of enemies being left on either hand: it was thought, that the Macedonian Fleet vnder Heraclides, would ſerue to keepe Attalus, with the Rhodiens and Romans, from doing harme by ſea, when the Kings backe was turned; who tooke his iourne Weſtward againſt Sulpicius the Conſul.

The Armes met in the countrey of the Dafarctis, a people in the vmoſt borders of Macedon towards Thyria, about the mountains of Candæus; that running along from Flamini in the North vntill they ioyn in the South with Findus, incloſe the Weſterne parts of Macedon. Two or three daies they lay in fight the one of the other, without making offer of battaile. The Conſul was the firſt that iſſued forth of his Campe into the open field. But Philip was not confident in the ſtrength which he had then about him; and therefore thought it better to ſend forth ſome of his light-armed Mercenaries, and ſome part of his horſe, to entertaine them with ſkirmiſh. Theſe were eaſily vanquiſhed by the Romans, and druen backe into their Campe. Now although it was ſo, that the King was vnwilling to hazard all at firſt vpon a Caſt, and therefore ſent for Perſeus with his Companies, to increaſe his owne forces: yet being no leſſe vnwilling to looſe too much in reputation; He made theſe adayafter, as if he would haue fought. He had found the advantage of a place fit for ambuſh, wherein he beſet as many as he thought meet of his Targettiers: and ſo gaue charge to Athenagoras, one of his Captaines, to prouoke out the Romans to fight; intruſting both him and the Targettiers, how to behaue themſelues reſpectively, as opportunitie ſhould fall out. The Romans had no miſtruſt of any ambuſh; hauing fought vpon the ſame ground a day before. Wherefore perhaps they might haue ſuſtained ſome notable detriment, if the Kings directions had bene well followed. For when Athenagoras began to fall backe, they charged him ſo hotly, that they draue him to an haſtie flight, and purſued him as hard as they were able. But the Captaines of the Targettiers, not ſtaying to let them runne into the danger, diſcouered themſelues before it was time; and thereby made fruſtrate the worke, to which they were appointed. The Conſul hereby gathered, that the King had ſome deſire to trie the fortune of a battaile: which he therefore preſented the ſecond time; leading forth his Armie, and ſetting it in order, with Elephants in front: a kind of helpe which the Romans had neuer vied before, but had taken theſe of late from the Carthaginians. Such are the alterations wrought by Time. It was ſcarce about foureſcore yeeres ere this, that Pyrhus carried Elephants out of Greece into Italie, to aſſright the Romans, who had neuer ſcene any of thoſe beaſts before. But now the ſame Romans, (whileſt poſſibly ſome were yet aliue, which had known that Expedition of Pyrhus) come into Macedon, bringing Elephants with them: whereof the Macedonians and Greekes haue none. Philip had patience to let the Conſul braue him at his Trenches: wherein he did wiſely: for the Romans had greater neede to fight, than hee. Sulpicius was vnwilling to looſe time: neither could he without great danger, lying ſo neere the Enemy, that was ſtrong in horſe, ſend his men to fetch in corne out of the fields. Wherefore he remoued eight miles off: preſuming that Philip would not aduenture to meet him on euery ground; and ſo the more boldly he ſuffered his Forragers to ouer run the Countrey. The King was nothing ſorry of this: but permitted the Romans to take their good pleaſure ſeuen till their preſumption, and his owne ſuppoſed feare, ſhould make them careleſſe. When this was come to paſſe, he tooke all his horſe and light-armed-foote, with which hee occupied a place in the midway, betwene the Forragers and their Campe. There he ſtayed in Conert with part of his forces; to keepe the paſſages that none ſhould eſcape. The reſt hee ſent abroad the Countrey, to fall vpon the ſtaglers: willing them to put all to the ſword, and let none run home with newes to the Campe. The ſlaughter was great: and thoſe which eſcaped the hands of them that were ſent abroad to ſcour the fields, lighted all or moſt of them vpon the King and his companies in their flight: ſo as they were cut off by the way. Long it was ere the Campe had newes of this. But in the end there eſcaped few: yet who though they could not make any perfect relation how the matter went: yet by telling what had happened to themſelues, raiſed a great tumult. Sulpicius hereupon ſends forth all his horſe, and bids them helpe their fellowes where they ſaw it needfull: He himſelfe with the Legions followed. The companies of Horſe diuided themſelues, accordingly as they met with aduerſements vpon the way, into many parts: not knowing where was moſt of the danger. Such of them as lighted vpon Philip Troupes, that were cauſing the field, tooke their taſke where they found it. But the maine bulke of them fell vpon the King himſelfe. They had the diſadvantage: as coming fewer, and vnprepared, to one that was readie for them.

So they were beaten away: as their fellows also might haue bene, if the King had well be thought himselfe, and giuen ouer in time. But while, not contented with such an haruill, he was too greedie about a poore gleaning: the Roman Legions appeared in sight: which emboldened their horse to make a re-charge. Then the danger apparent, enforced the Macedonians to looke to their owne safetie. They ranne which way they could: and (as men that lie in wait for others, are feldome heedfull of that which may befall themselves) to escape the Enemy, they declined the fairest way: so as they were plunged in Marishes and Bogges, wherein many of them were lost. The Kings horse was slaine vnder him: and there had he bene cast away, if a louing subiect of his had not alighted; mounted him vpon his owne horse; and deliuered him out of perill, at the expence of his owne life, that running on foot was ouertaken, and killed.

In the common opinion Philip was charged with improvident rashnesse, and the Consul, with as much dulnesse; for this daies seruice. A little longer stay would haue deliuered the King from these enemies without any blow: since when all the felids about them were wasted, they must needs haue retired backe to the Sea. On the other side it was not thought vnlike, That if the Romans following the King, had let vpon his Campe, at such time as he fled thither halfe amazed with feare of being either slaine or taken; they might haue won it. But that noble Historian Liuie, (as is commonly his manner) hath iudiciously obserued, That neither the one, nor the other, were much too blame in this daies worke. For the maine bodie of the Kings Armie lay safe in his Campe; and could not be so astonied with the losse of two or three hundred Horse, that it should therefore haue abandoned the defence of the Trenches. And as for the King himselfe; He was aduertised, that Pleuratus the Thyrian, and the Dardaniens, were fallen vpon his Countrey; when they found the passage therein open, after Perseus was called away from custodie of the Streights. This was it which made him aduenture to doe somewhat betimes; that he might let the Romans going the sooner, and afterwards looke vnto his troublesome neighbours. In consideration of this, Philip was desirous to cleere himselfe of the Romans, as soon as he might. And to that purpose he sent vnto the Consul; requesting a day of truce for buriall of the dead. But in stead of so doing, he marched away by night, and left fires in his Campe to beguile the Enemy, as if he had not stirred out of the place. Sulpicius, when he heard of the Kings departure, was not slow to follow him. He ouertooke the Macedonians in a place of strength, which they had fencd (for it was a woodie ground) by cutting downe trees, and laying them athwart the way where it was most open. In making of such places good, the Macedonian Phalangis was of little vse; being a square battaile of pikes, not fit for euerie ground. The Archers of Crete were iudged, and were indeed, more seruicable in that case. But they were few; and their arrowes were of small force against the Roman shield. The Macedonians therefore helped them by flinging of stones. But to no purpose. For the Romans got within them; and forced them to quit the place. This victorie (such as it was) laid open vnto the Consul some poore Townes there about; which partly were taken by strong hand; partly yielded for feare. But the spoile of these, and of the felids adjoining, was not sufficient to maintaine his Armie; and therefore he returned backe to Apollonia.

The Dardaniens, hearing that Philip was come backe, withdrew themselves apace out of the Countrey. The King sent Athenagoras to waite vpon them home; whilst he himselfe went against the Ætolians. For Damocritus the Prætor of the Ætolians, who had rescued himselfe and his Nation vnto the cunct of things, hearing report, that Philip was beaten once and againe: as also that Pleuratus and the Dardaniens were fallen vpon Macedon, grew no lesse busie on the sudden, than before he had bene wile. He persuaded his Nation to take their time; and so, not slaying to proclaime war, ioynd his forces with Aminander the Albanian; and made inuallion vpon Theffalie. They tooke and cruelly sacked a few Townes: whereby they grew confident; as if, without any danger, they might doe what they listed. But Philip came vpon them ere they looked for him: and killing them as they lay dispersed, was like to haue taken their Campe; if Aminander, more warie than the Ætolians, had not helped at need, and made the Retreat through his owne mountainous Countrey.

About the same time, the Roman Fleet, assisted by Attalus and the Rhodiens, had taken some small Islands in the Ægean Sea. They tooke likewise the Towne of Oreum in the Ile of Euboea; and some other places thereabout. The Townes were giuen to Attalus, after the same Compact that had formerly bene made with the Ætolians: the goods therein found were giuen to the Romans; and the people, for slaues. Other attempts on that side were hindred; eyther by foule weather at Seas or by want of daring, and of meanes.

¶ XII.

VILLIUS the Roman Consul wastes a year to no effect. Warre of the Gauls in Italie. An Embasie of the Romans to Carthage; MASANISSA, and VERMINA, The Macedonian prepares for defence of his Kingdome:

us the time ranne away: and P. Villius, a new Consul, tooke charge of the Warre in Macedon. Hee was troubled with a Mutinie of his oldest Souldiers: whereof two thousand, having serued long in Sicily and Africke, thought themselves much wronged, in that they could not bee suffered to looke vnto their owne estates at home. They were (belike) of the Legions that had serued at Cannæ: as may seeme by their complaint, of hauing bene long absent from Italie; whither home they would haue returned, when by their Colonels they were shipped for Macedon. How Villius dealt with them, it is vncertaine. For the Historie of his year is lost: whereof the melle is not great; since hee did nothing memorable. Valerius Antias, as we find in Liuie, hath adorned this Villius with a great exploit against Philip. Yet since Liuie himselfe, an Historian to whom few of the best are matchable, could find no such thing recorded in any good Authour; we may reasonably beleeue, that Villius his year was idle.

In the beginning of this Macedonian Warre, the Romans found more trouble than could haue bin expected with the Gauls. Their Colonie of Placentia, a goodly and strong Towne, which neyther Hannibal, nor after him Asdrubal, had bene able to force, was taken by these Barbarians, and burnt in a manner to the ground. In like sort Cremona was attempted; but saved herselfe, taking warning by her neighbours calamitie. Amilcar a Carthaginian, that had staid behind Asdrubal, or Mago, in those parts; was now become Capitaine of the Gauls, in their enterprises. This when the Romans heard: they sent Embassadors to the Carthaginians; giuing them to vnderstand, That, if they were not wearie of the peace, it behoud them to call home, and deliuer vp, this their Citizen Amilcar, who made warre in Italie. Herevnto it was added (perhaps lest the message might seeme otherwise to haue fauoured a little of some feare) That of the Fugitiue slaues belonging vnto the Romans, there were some reported to walk vp and down in Carthage; which if it were so, then ought they to bee restored backe to their Masters; as was conditioned in the late Peace. The Embassadors that were sent on this errand; had further charge to treat with Masaniissa, as also with Vermina the sonne of Syphax. Vnto Masaniissa, besides matter of complement, they were to signifie what pleasure Hee might doe them, by lending them some of his Numidian Horse, to serue in their Warre against the Macedonian, Permina had entreated the Senate, to vouchsafe vnto him the name of King; and promised thereafter to deferue it, by his readinesse in doing them all good offices. But they were somewhat scrupulous in the matter: and said, That hauing bene, and being still (as they tooke it) their Enemy, Hee ought first of all to desire peace; for that the name of King, was an honour which they vsed not to conferre vpon any, saue only vpon such as had royally deferued it at their hands. The authoritie to make peace with him, was wholly committed vnto these Embassadors vpon such termes as they should thinke fit; without further relation to the Senate and People. For they were then busied with greater cares. The Curiatians made a gentle answer, That they wholly disclaimed Amilcar: banishing him; and confiscating his goods. As for the Fugitiues: they had restored as manie as they could finde; and would in that point, as farre as was requisite, giue satisfaction to the Senate. Herewithall they sent a great proportion of Corn to Rome; and the like vnto the Armie that was in Macedon. King Masaniassa would haue lent vnto the Romans two thousand of his Numidian Horle: but they were contented with halfe the number; and would accept no more. Permina met with the Embassadors, to giue them entertainment, on the borders of his Kingdome; and, without any disputation, agreed with them vpon termes of peace.

Thus were the Romans busied in taking order for their Macedonian Warre, that they might pursue it strongly, and without interruption. As for Amilcar and his Gauls; they had seige vnto Crenones; where L. Ennius a Roman Prator came vpon them, fought a battaile with them, and ouercame them. Amilcar the Carthaginian died in this battaile; and the fruit of the Victorie was such, as both made amends for losses past, and left the worke easie to those, that afterwards should haue the manning of warre among those Gauls. So was there good leisure to thinke vpon the businesse of Macedon: where Philip was carefully providing to giue contentment vnto his subjects, by punishing a bad Counsaillour whom they hated; as also to assure vnto himselfe the Acheans, by rendering vnto them some Townes that he held of theirs; and finally to strengthen his Kingdome, not onely by exercising and trayning his people, but by fortifying the passages that led thercinto out of Epirus. This was in doing, when Villius, hauing vnprofitably laboured to find way into Macedon, taking a iourne (as Sulpius had done before him) wherein he could not be supplied with victuals, determined at length to trie a new course. But then came aduertisement, that T. Quintus Flaminius was chosen Consul, and had Macedon allotted him for his Province, whose coming was expected; and he very shortly arrived at the Armie.

§. XIII.

The Romans beginne to make warre by negotiation. T. Quintus winnes a passage against Philip. Thessalus wassed by Philip, the Romans, and Aetolians. The Acheans for saking the Macedonian take part with the Romans. Atreus of peace, that was vaine. Philip delivers Argos to Nabis the Tyrant, who presently enters into League with the Romans.

THe Roman; had not bene wont in former times, to make Warre after such a trifling manner. It was their vse, to giue battaile to the Enemy, as soone as they met with him. If hee refused it, they belieged his Townes: and so forced him to trie the fortune of a day, with his disadvantage in reputation, when hee had long forborne it (as it would bee interpreted) vpon knowledge of his owne weaknesse. But in this their Warre with Philip, they beganne to learne of the subtle Greekes, the art of Negotiation: wherein wherein hitherto they were not growne so fine, as within a little while they proued. Their treasure was poore, and stood indebted, * manie yeares after this, vnto private men, for part of those monies that had bene borrowed in the second Punicke Warre. This had made the Commonaltie auerfe from the Macedonian Warre; and had thereby driuen the Senators greedie of the enterprize, to make vse of their cunning. Yet being wearie of the slow pace wherewith their businesse went forward, they determined to increase their Armie; that they might haue the lesse need to rely vpon their Confederates. So they leauied eight thousand foot and eight hundred Horle (the greater part of them of the Latines) which they sent with T. Quintus Flaminius the new Consul into Macedon. Their Naule, and other meanes could well haue serued, for the setting forth and transportation of a greater Armie: but by straining themselves to the moit of their abilitie, they should (besides other difficulties, incident vnto the fulnesse of those that are too manie and too farre from home) haue bred some ieaoulie in their friends of Greece, and thereby haue lost some friends, yea perhaps haue increased the number of their enemies more than of their owne Souldiours. This present augmentation of the forces was verie requisite, for that Attalus, about the same time, excused himselfe vnto them, by his Embassadors; requesting that cyther they would vndertake the defence of his Kingdome against Antiochus who inuaded it; or else that they would not take it vn courteously, that he quitted the Warre with Philip; and returned home, to looke vnto that which more concerned him. Their answer was remarkable. They said, That it was not their manner to vse the aid of their friends, longer than their friends had good opportunitie, and could also bee well contented to afford it; That they could not honestly take part with Attalus, their good friend though hee were, against Antiochus, whom they held in the like account; but That they would deale with Antiochus by Embassadors, and (as common friends vnto both of the Kings) doe their best to perswade an attonement betwene them. In such louing filshion did they now carrie themselves, towards their good friend the King Antiochus: who reciprocally, at their entreatie, withdrew his Armie from the Kingdome of Attalus. But how little they regarded these tearmes of friendship, after that once they had made an end with Philip; it will verie soone appeare.

T. Quintus halting away from Rome, came betimes into his Province, with the supply decreed vnto him; which consisted, for the most part, of olde Souldiours, that had serued in Spain and Africk. He found Villius the old Consul, (whom at his coming hee presently discharged) and King Philip of Macedon, encamped one against the other, in the Streights of Epirus; by the Riuer of Aspus or Don. It was manifest, that cyther the Romans must fetch a compasse about, and seeke their way into Macedon through the poore Countrie of the Dassaretians; or else winne, by force, that passage which the King defended. In taking the former way, they had already readie two yeares together mispent their time, and bene forced to returne backe without profit, for want of victuals: whereof they could neither carrie with them store sufficient, nor find iron the way. But if they could once get ouer these Mountaines, which diuided the South of Epirus from Thessalie: then should they enter into a plentifull Countrie; and which, by long dependance on the Macedonian, was become (in a manner) part of his Kingdome, whereof it made the South border. Neuerthelesse the desire of winning this passage, was greater than the likelihood. For the Riuer of Aspus, running along through that Valley which alone was open betwene the Mountaines, made it a deep Marish and vnpassable Bogge: a verie narrow way excepted, and a path cut out of the maine Rock by mans hand. Wherefore Quintus assailed to climbe in the Mountaines: but finding himselfe disappointed of this hope, through the diligence of his Enemy, who neglected not the gard of them that was verie easie; Hee was compelled to sit still, without doing any thing, for the space of fortie dayes.

This long time of rest gaue hope vnto Philip, that the warre might bee ended by compulsion, vpon some reasonable termes. He therefore so dealt with some of the Epirots, (among whom he had many friends) that He and the Consul had a meeting together. But nothing was effected. The Consul would haue him to set all Townes of Greece at libertie; and to make amends for the injuries, which hee had done to many people in his late Warres. Philip was contented to giue libertie to those whom hee had subdued of late; but vnto such, as had beene long subiect vnto him and his Ancestors. He thought it against all reason, that he should relinquish his claime and Dominion ouer them. He also said, That as farre forth as it should appeare, that hee had done wrong vnto any Towne or people whatsoever, He could well be pleased to make such amends, as might seeme conuenient in the judgment of some free State, that had not bene interested in those quarrels. But herewithall Quintius was not satisfied. There needed, (hee said) no judgment or compromise; forasmuch as it was apparant, that Philip had alwayes bene the Inuader; and had not made warre, as one prouoked, in his owne defence. After this alteration, when they should come to particulars: and when the Consul was required to name those Townes, that he would haue to be set at libertie; the first that hee named were the Thessalians. Those had bene subiects (though conditionally) vnto the Macedonian Kinges, euer since the dayes of Alexander the Great and of Philip his father. Wherefore, as soone as Flamininus had named the Thessalians; the King in a rage demanded, what sharper Condition Hee would haue laid vpon him, had hee bene but vanquished. And herewithall abruptly hee flang away; refusing to heare any more of such discourse.

After this the Consul stroue in vaine, two or three dayes together, to haue preuailed against the difficulties of that passage which Philip kept. When he had well wearied himselfe, and could not resolue what course to take: there came to him an Herdman, sent from Charopus a Prince of the Epirots that fauoured the Romans, who hauing long kept beasts in those Mountaines, was thoroughly acquainted with all by-paths; and therefore undertooke to guide the Romans, without any danger, to a place where they should haue aduantage of the Enemy. This guide, for feare of treacherous dealing, was fast bound: and, being promised great reward, in case hee made good his word; had such Companies, as was thought fit, appointed to follow his directions. They traualled by night (it being then about the full of the Moone) and rested in the day-time, for feare of being discovered. When they had recovered the hill-toppes, and were about the Macedonians, (though vndercovered by them because at their backs) they raised a great smoke; whereby they gaue notice of their successe vnto the Consul. Some skirmishes, whilst those were on their iourney, T. Quintius had hold with the Macedonians; thereby to auert him from thought of that which was intended. But when on the third morning he saw the smoke arise more and more plainly, and thereby knew that his men had attained vnto the place whither they were sent: He pressed as neare as he could vnto the Enemies Campe; and assailed them in their strength. He preuailed as little as in former times; vntill the shoutings of those that ranne downe the Hill, and charged Philip on the backe, astonished him to the Macedonians; that they brooke themselves to flight. The King, vpon first apprehension of the danger, made all speed away to saue himselfe. Yet anon considering, that the difficultie of the passage must needs hinder the Romans from pursuing him: He made a stand at the end of fife miles; and gathered there together his broken troupes, of whom hee found wanting no more than two thousand men. The greatest losse was of his Campe and prouisions: if not rather perhaps of his reputation; for that now the Macedonians beganne to stand in feare, lest being driuen from a place of such aduantage, they should hardly make good their partie against the Enemy, vpon equal ground. Neyther was Philip himselfe much better perswaded. Wherefore hee called the Thessalians, as many of them as in his hasty retreat hee could visit, to forsake their Townes and Countrie, carrying away with them as much as they were able, and spoiling all the rest. But all of them could not be per(swaded, thus to abandon (for the pleasure of their King) their ancient habitations, and all the substance which they had gotten. Some there were that forcibly resisted him: which they might the better doe, for that hee could not stay to see any great compulsion. He also himselfe tooke it verie grieuously, that he was driuen to make such wast of a most pleasant and fruitful Countrie, which had euer bene well affected vnto him: so that a little hinderance did serue, to make him breake off his purpose; and withdraw himselfe home into his Kingdom of Macedon.

The Ætians and Albanians, when this fell out, were euen in a redinesse to invade Thessalie; whereinto the waies lay more open, out of their seuerall Countreies. When therefore they heard for certaintie, that Philip was beaten by the Romans; they followed not the occasion; but made all speede, each of them to lay hold vpon what they might. T. Quintius followed them within a little while: but they had gotten so much before his coming, that He, in gleaning after their harvest, could not finde enough to maintaine his Armie. Thus were the poore Thessalians, of whose libertie the Romans a few daies since had made shew to be verie desirous, wasted by the same Romans and their Confederates, not knowing which way to turne themselves, or whom to auoid. T. Quintius wan Phaleria by assault: Metropolis and Piera yeelded vnto him. Rhage hee besieged; and hauing made a faire breach yet was vnable to force it; so stoutly it was defended both by the inhabitants, and by a Macedonian Garrison therein. Philip also at the same time, hauing somewhat recoiled his spirits, haued about Tempe with his Armie; thrusting men into all places, that were like to be distressed. So the Consul, hauing well neare spent his vittualles, & seeing no hope to preuaile at Rhage; brake vp his siege, and departed out of Thessalie. Hee had appointed his shippes of burden to meet him at Antigra, an Hauent towne of Phocia, on the Gulfe of Corinth: which Countrie being freind to the Macedonians, hee presently invaded; not so much for hatred vnto the people, as because it lay conueniently seated betwene Thessalie and other Regions, wherein hee had busines, or was shortly like to haue. Many Townes in Phocia hee wan by assault: many were yeelded vp vnto him for feare; and within short space hee had (in effect) mastered it all.

In the meane time L. Quintius the Consuls brother, being then Admirall for the Romans in this war, ioynd with King Attalus and the Rhodian Fleet. They wan two Cities in Euboea; and afterward laid siege vnto Cenchree, an Hauent and Arceall of the Corinthians on their Easterne Sea. This enterprife did somewhat helpe forward the Acheans, in their desire to leaue the part of Philip: since it might come to pass, that Corinth it selfe, ere long time were spent; and that Cenchree, with other places appertaining to Corinth, now verie shortly; should be rendered vnto their Nation, by fauour of the Romans.

But there were other Motiues, inducing the Acheans to prefer the freindship of the Romans, before the patronage of Philip; whereto they had bene long accustomed. For this King had so many waies offended them in time of peace, that they thought it the best course to rid their hands of him; whilst being entangled in a dangerous war, he wanted meanes to hinder the execution of such counsaile, as they should hold the safest. His tyrannous practises to make himselfe their absolute Lord: His poisoning of Aratus their old Gouernour: His false dealing with the Messeniens, Epirots, and other people their Confederates, and his owne dependants: together with many particular outrages by him committed, had caused them long since to hold him as a necessary euill, euen whilst they were vnable to be without his assistance. But since by the vertue of Philopamen, they were growne somewhat confident in their owne strength, so as without the Macedonians helpe they could as well subdill, as hauing him to freind: then did they only thinke how euill hee was; and thereupon reioyce the more, in that he was become no longer necessary. It angered him to perceiue how they stood affected: and therefore he sent murderers, to take away the life of Philopamen. But sayling in this enterprife, and being detected:

he did thereby onely set fire to the Wood, which was thoroughly drie before, and prepared to burne. Philopemen wrought so with the Acheans: that no discourse was more familiar with them, than what great cause they had to with-draw themselves from the Macedonian. Cycladus, a principal man among them, and lately their Prætor, was expelled by them, for shewing him selfe passionate in the cause of Philip: and Ariflanus cholen Prætor, who laboured to ioyne them in societie with the Romans.

These newes were verie welcome to T. Quintus. Embassadors were sent from the Romans, and their Confederates King Attalus, the Rhodiens, and Athenians, to treat with the Acheans; making promise, that they should haue Corinth restored vnto them, if they would forsake the Macedonian. A Parliament of the Acheans was held at Steyon, to deliberate and resolue in this weightie case. Therein the Romans and their adherents desired the Acheans, to ioyne with them in making warre vpon Philip. Contrariwise, the Embassadors of Philip, whom he had also sent for this buisnes, admonishing the Acheans of their Alliance with the King, and of their faith due vnto him; requested them, that they would be contented to remaine as Neuters. This moderate request of Philips Embassador, did no way aduance his Masters cause. Rather it gaue the Acheans to vnderstand, That hee, who could be satisfied with so little at their hands, knew him selfe vnable to gratifie them in any reciprocal demand. Yet were there many in that great Councill; who remembering the benefits of Philip and Antigonus, laboured earnestly for the prefruation of the ancient League. But in fine, the sense of late iniuries, and expectation of like or worse from him in the future; preuailed against the memorie of those old good turnes, which he, (and Antigonus before him) had partly sold vnto them, and partly had vsed as baits, whereby to allure them into absolute subiection. Neither was it perhaps of the least importance, That the Romans were strong, and likely to preuaile in the end. So after much alteration the Decree passed, That they should thenceforward renounce the Macedonian, and take part with his enemies in this war. With Attalus & the Rhodiens: they forthwith entered into societie with the Romans (because no League would be of force, vntill the Senate and People had approued it) they forbore to decree any societie at the present, vntill the returne of those Embassadors from Rome, which they determined to send thither of purpose. The Megacopolitans, Cynaans, & Argines, hauing done their best for the Macedonian, as by many respects they were bound; rose vp out of the Councell, and departed before the passing of the Decree, which they could not resist, nor yet with homelie thereto giue assent. For this their good will, and greater which they shortly manifested, the Argives had so little thanks; that all the rest of the Acheans may be the better held excused, for escaping how they might, out of the hands of so fell a Prince.

Soone after this, vpon a solempne day at Argos, the affection of the Citizens discovered it selfe so plainly, in the behaue of Philip; that they which were his Partisans within the Towne, made no doubt of putting the Citie into his hands, if they might haue any small assistance. Pholades, a Lieutenant of the Kings, lay then in Corinth; which he had manfully defended against the Romans and Attalus. Him the Conspirators drew to Argos: whither comming on a sudden, and finding the Multitude ready to ioyne with him; He easily compelled the Achean Garrison to quit the place.

This getting of Argos, together with the good defence of Corinth and some other Townes, as it helped Philip a little in his reputation, so they gaue him hope to obtaine some good end by Treatie: whilst as yet with his honour he might seek it, and when (the Winter being now come on) a new Consul would shortly be chosen, who should take the worke out of Titus his hands, if it were not concluded the sooner. Titus had the like respect vnto himselfe; and therefore thought it best, since more could not be done, to pradiaspole things vnto a conclusion, for his owne reputation. The meeting was appointed to be held on the Sea-shore, in the Bay

then called the Malian, or Lamian Bay; now (as is supposed) the Golfe of Ziton, in the Aegean Sea, or Archipelago. Thither came Titus, with Aminander the Athamasian; an Embassador of Attalus; the Admirall of Rhodes; and some Agents for the Aetholians and Acheans. Philip had with him some few of his owne Captaines, and Cycladus, lately banished for his sake out of Achia. He refused to come on shore: though fearing (as he said) none but the immortal gods: yet milder doubting some treachery in the Aetholians. The demands of Titus in behaue of the Romans were, That he should set all cities of Greece at libertie; deliuer vp to the Romans and their Confederates, all prisoners which he had of theirs, and Renegado's; likewise whatsoeuer he held of theirs in Ithria; and whatsoeuer about Greece or Asia he had gotten from Ptolemie then King of Egypt, after his fathers death. Attalus demanded restitution to be made entire, of Ships, Townes, and Temples, by him taken and spoiled in the late warre betweene them. The Rhodiens would haue againe the Countrey of Peræa, lying ouer against their Iland; as also that hee should withdraw his Garrisons, out of diuers Townes about the Hellespont, and other Hauens of their friends. The Acheans desired restitution of Argos and Corinth: about the one of which they might, not vniuallly, quarrell with him; the other had bene long his owne by their consent. The Aetholians tooke vpon them angrily, as Patrons of Greece: willing him to depart out of it, euen out of the whole Countrey, leauing it free; and withall: to deliuer vp vnto them, whatsoeuer he held that had at any time bene theirs. Neither were they here-withall content: but insolently declaimed against him, for that which he had lately done in Theffalie; corrupting (as they said) the rewards of the victors, by destroying, when he was vanquished, those Townes which else they might haue gotten. To answer these malapert Aetholians, Philip commanded his Gallie to row nearer the shore. But they began to plic him a fresh: telling him, that he must obey his betters; vnlesse he were able to defend himselfe by force of armes. He answered them, (as he was much giuen to gybing) with sundrie scoffes; and especially with one, which made the Roman Consul vnderstand, what manner of companions these Aetholians were. For he said, That he had often dealt with them; as likewise, the rest of the Greekes; desiring them to abrogate a wicked Law, which permitted them to take spoile from spoile: yet could he get no better an answer, than that they would sooner take Aetholia out of Aetholia. Titus wondered what might be the meaning of this strange Law. So the King told him, That they held it a laudable custome, as often as warre happened betweene their friends, to hold vp the quarrell by sending voluntaries to serue on both sides, that should spoile both the one and the other. As for the libertie of Greece; He said it was strange that the Aetholians should be so carefull thereof, since diuers Tribes of their owne, which he there named, were indeed no Græciens: wherefore he would faine know, whether the Romans would giue him leaue to make slaues of those Aetholians, which were no Greekes. Titus hereat smiled: and was no whit offended, to heare the Aetholians well rated vp; touching whom he began to vnderstand, how odious they were in all the Countrey. As for that general demand of letting all Greece at libertie; Philip acknowledged, that it might well become the greatnesse of the Romans; though he would also consider, what might become his owne dignitie. But that the Aetholians, Rhodiens, and other pettie Estates, should thus presume, vnder countenance of the Romans, to take vpon them, as if by their great might hee should be hereto compelled: it was, he said, a strange and ridiculous insolence. The Acheans be charged with much ingratitude: reciting against them some Decrees of their owne; wherein they had loaden both Antigonus and him, with more than humane honors.

Neuertheless he said, that he would render Argos vnto them: but, as touching Corinth, that he would further deliberate with Titus himselfe. Thus he addressed himselfe wholly to the Roman General: vnto whom if he could giue satisfaction, he cared little for all the rest. With Attalus and the Rhodiens, his late warre, (he said) was onely defensue; they hauing bene the offenders: or if he gaue them any occasion, it was onely in helping Perseus, his sonne-in-law; neither did hee see why they should rather seeke amends at his hands, than he at theirs. For whereas they complained, that, spoyling a Temple of Venus, hee had cut downe the Grove and pleasure-walkes thereabouts: what could hee doe more, than send Gardiners thither with young Plants; if one King of another would stand to aske such recompence. Thus he cleared the matter out: but offered neuertheless, in honour of the Romans, to giue backe the Region of Persea to the Rhodians; as likewise to Atolus, the Ships and Prisoners of his, whereof he had then possession. Thus ended that daies conference, because it was late: Philip requiring a night his leisure to thinke vpon the Articles, which were many and he ill provided of Counsaile, wherewith to aduise about them. For your being so ill provided of counsaile, said Titus, you may euen thank your selfe, as hauing murdered all your friends, that were wont to aduise you faithfully. The next day Philip came not, vntill it was late at night: excusing his long stay by the weightinesse of the things propounded, whercon he could not suddenly tell how to resolve. But it was belieued, that hee thereby sought to abridge the Aetolians of leisure to raile at him. And this was the more likely; for that hee desired conference in priuate with the Roman Generall. The summe of his discourse, as Titus afterward related it, was, That he would giue to the Achaens both Argos and Corinth; as also that he would render vnto Attalus and the Rhodians, what he had promised the day before; likewise to the Aetolians that hee would grant some part of their demands; and to the Romans, whatsoever they would challenge. This when Titus his associates heard, they exclaimed against it: saying, That if the King were fultured to retaine any thing in Greece, he would shortly get possession of all which hee now rendered vp. The onely that they made came to Philips care: who thereupon desired a third day of meeting; and protested, that if he could not perswade them, hee would suffer himselfe to be perswaded by them. So the third day they met early in the morning: at what time the King entreated them all, that they would with sincere affection hearken vnto good offers of peace; and immediately conclude it, if they could like well of those Conditions, which he had already tendered; or otherwise, that they would make truce with him for the present, and let him send Embassadors to Rome, where hee would referre himselfe to the courtlesse of the Senate.

This was euen as Quintius would haue it: who stood in doubt, least a new Consul might happen to defraud him of the honour, which hee expected by ending of the warre. So he easily prevailed with the rest, to assent herunto: forasmuch as it was Winter, a time vniuersall for seruice in the warre; and since, without authoritie of the Senate, he should be vnable to proceed resolutely either in warre or peace. Further he willed them to send their seuerall Embassadors to Rome: which intimating vnto the Senate what each of them required, should easily hinder Philip, from obtaining any thing to their prejudice. Among thereth he perswaded King Antiochus, to make a iourne to Rome in person: knowing wel, that the name of a King, together with the confluence of so many Embassadors, would serue to make his owne actions more glorious in the Citie. All this tended to procure, that his owne Command of the Armie in Greece might be prorogued. And to the same end had he dealt with some of the Tribunes of the people at Rome: who had already (though as yet he knew not so much) obtained it for him, partly by their authoritie, partly by good reason which they alleged vnto the Senate.

The Embassadors of the Greekes, when they had audience at Rome, spake bitterly against the King, with good liking of the Senate; which was more desirous of victory, than of satisfaction. They magnified the honourable purpose of the Romans, in vndertaking to set Greece at libertie. But this (they sayd) could neuer be effected; vnlesse especial care were taken, that the King should be dispossessed of Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias. In this point they were so vehement, producing a Map of the Countrey, and making demonstration how those places held all the rest in seru-

litt; that the Senate agreed to haue it euen so as they desired. When therefore the Embassadors of Philip were brought in, and began to haue made a long Oration; they were briefly cut off in the midst of their Preface, with this one demand: Whether their Master would yeeld up Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias: Hereunto they made answer, That, concerning those places, the King had giuen them no direction or Commission what to say, or doe. This was enough. The Senate would no longer hearken to Philips desire of peace; wherein they said hee did no better than aske. Yet might his Embassadors haue truly said, That neither the Aetolians, Achaens, nor any of their fellowes, had in the late Treaite required by name, that Chalcis and Demetrias should be yeelded vp. For which of them indeed could make any Claime to either of these Townes? As for Corinth, whereto the Achaens had some right; (though their right were no better, than that, hauing stolne it from One Macedonian King in a night, they had, after mature deliberation, made it away by bargain vnto an Other) Philip had already confedered to giue it backe vnto them. And this perhaps would haue bene alleadged, euen against the Greekes in excuse of the King, by some of Quintius his friends; that so he might haue had the honour to conclude the warre, if a Successor had bene decreed vnto him. But since He was appointed to continue Generall: neither his friends at Rome, nor Hee himselfe, after the returne of the Embassadors into Greece, cared to giue care vnto any talke of peace.

Philip, seeing that his Achaens had forsaken him, and ioyned with their common enemies; thought euen to deale with them in the like manner, by reconciling himselfe vnto Nabis, whom they hated most. There were not many years past, since the Lacedaemonians vnder Cleomenes, with little other helpe than their owne strength, had bene almost strong enough both for the Macedonians and Achaens together. But now the condition of things was altered. Nabis his force consisted in a manner wholly in his Mercenaries: for he was a Tyrant; though styling himselfe King. Yet he sorely vexed the Achaens: and therefore seemed vnto Philip one likely to stand him in great stead, if he could be won. To this purpose it was thought meet, that the Towne of Argos, which could not otherwise be easily defended, should be consigned ouer into his hands; in hope, that such a benefit would serue to tie him fast vnto the Macedonian. Philoctetes the Kings Lieutenant, who was appointed to deale with Nabis, added further, That it was his Masters purpose to make a streight alliance with the Lacedaemonians, by giuing some daughters of his owne in marriage vnto Nabis his sonnes. This could not but be well taken. Yet Nabis made some scruple in accepting the Towne of Argos; vnlesse by decree of the citizens themselves He might be called into it. Hereabout Philoctetes dealt with the Argines: but found them so averse; that, in open assemblie of the people, they detected the verie name of the Tyrant, with many railing words. Nabis hearing of this, thought hee had thereby a good occasion to rob and seece them. So he willed Philoctetes, without more adoe, to make ouer the Towne which he was ready to recieve. Philoctetes accordingly did let him with his Armie into it by night; and gaue him possession of the strongest places therein. Thus dealt Philip with the Argines: who for verie loue had forsaken the Achaens, to take his part. Early in the morning, the Tyrant made himselfe Master of all the Gates. A few of the principall men, vnderstanding how things went, fled out of the Citie at the first tumult. Wherefore they were all banished, and their goods confiscated. The rest of the chiefe Citizens that staid behind, were commanded to bring forth, out of hand, all their Gold and Silver. Also a great imposition of monie was laid vpon all those, that were thought able to pay it. Such as made their contribution readily, were dismissed without more adoe. But if any stood long vpon the matter: or plaid the chieues, in purloyning their owne goods; they were put to the whip and besides losse of their wealth, had their torments to boot. This done, the Tyrant began to make popular Lawes: namely such, as might serue to make him gracious with the rascall multitude: abrogating gating all debts, and diuiding the Lands of the rich among the poore. By such art of opprelling the great ones, it hath bene an old custome of Tyrants, to assure themselves of the Vulgar for a time.

As soone as Nabis had gotten Argos, He sent the newes to T. Quintius, and offered to ioyne with him against Philip. Titus was glad of it: so he tooke the paines to crosse ouer the Streights into Peloponnesus, there to meet with Nabis. They had soone agreed (though King Attalus, who was present with the Consul, made some euill touching Argos) and the Tyrant lent vnto the Romans fixe hundred of his Mercenaries of Crete; as also hee agreed with the Achaens, vpon a Truce for foure moneths, reseruing the finall conclusion of peace betwene them vntill the Warre 10 of Philip should be ended; which after this continued not long.

§. XIII.

The battaile at Cynosephala, wherein PHILIP was vanquished by T. QUINTIVS.

TITUS QUINTIVS, as soone as he vnderstood that he was appointed to haue Command of the Armie, without any other limitation of time, than during the pleasure of the Senate; made all things readie for diligent pursuit of the Warre. The like did Philip: who hauing failed in his negotiation of peace, and no lesse failed in his hopes of getting Nabis to friend in that Warre; meant afterwarde wholly to relye vpon himselfe.

Titus had in his Armie about six and twentie thousand: and Philip a proportionable number. But neither of them knew the others strength, or what his Enemie intended to doe. Onely Titus heard that Philip was in Thessalie; and thereupon addressed himselfe to seeke him out. They had like to haue met vnawares, neare vnto the Citie of Phera: where the vnt-couriers on both sides discovered each other; 30 and sent word thereof vnto their severall Captaines. But neither of them were over-hastie, to commit all to hazard vpon so short warning. The day following each of them sent out three hundred Horse, with as many light armed Foot, to make a better discouerie. These met, and fought a long while: returning finally backe into their severall Campes, with little advantage vnto either side. The Countie about Phera was thicke set with Trees: and otherwise full of Gardens and mud wals; which made it vnproper for service of the Macedonian Phalanx. Wherefore the King dislodged, intending to remoue backe vnto Scutisain the Frontier of Macedon; where he might be plentifully served with all necessities. Titus conceived aright his meaning: and therefore purposed also to march thitherwards; were it onely to wait the Countie. 40 There lay betwene them a great ledge of hills, which hindered the one from knowing what course the other tooke. Neuertheless they encamped not farre asunder, both the first and the second night; though neither of them vnderstood what was become of the other. The third daie was verie tempestuous; and forced each of them to take vp his lodging, where he found it, by chance. Then sent they forth discouersers againe, in greater number than before. These meeting together, held a long fight, wherein at first the Macedonians had the worke. But Philip anon sent in such strong supply; that if the resistance of the Aetolians had not bene desperate, the Romans their fellows had bene driuen backe into their Campe. Yet, all resistance notwithstanding, the Macedonians prevailed: so that Titus himselfe was faine to bring forth his Legions, that were not a little discouraged, by the defeat of all their Horse, to animate those which were in flight.

It was altogether besides the Kings purpose, to put the fortune of a battaile in trust that day, with so much of his estate as might thereon depend. But the newes came came to him thicke and tumultuously, how the enemies fled; and how the day was his own; if he could vse an occasion, the like whereof he should not often find. This caused him to alter his purpose: in so much as he embattailed his men; and climbed vp those hills, which for that the knops thereon had some resemblance vnto Dogs heads, were called, by a word signifying as much, Cynosephala. As soone as he was on the hill-top; it did him good to see that they of his owne light armature were busie in fight, almost at the verie Campe of the Enemies; whom they had repelled so farre. He had also libertie to chosse his ground, as might serue best his advantage; so farre as the Romans were quite driuen from all parts of the Hill. But of this commoditie he could make no great vse: the roughnesse of the place among those 10 Dog-heads, as they were called, seruing nothing aptly for his Phalanx. Neuertheless hee found conuenient roome, wherein to marshall the one part of his Armie: and gave order vnto his Captaines, to follow with the rest; embattailing them as they might. Whilest hee was doing this: Hee perceived that his Horsemen and light armature beganne to shrink; as being fallen vpon the Roman Legions, by force whereof they were driuen to recoyle. He flect forward to helpe them: and they no lesse hastily draw vnto him for succour; hauing the Romans not farre behind them.

As the Legions beganne to climbe the Hill, Philip commanded those of his Phalanx to charge their pikes, and entertaine them. Here Titus found an extreme difficult peece of worke. For this Phalanx, being a great square battaile of armed pikes, like in all points to those which are now vsed in our moderne Warres: and being in like manner vsed, as are ours; was not to be resisted by the Roman Targettiers, as long as the Phalanx it selfe held together vndissolued. The Macedonians were embattailed in verie close order: so that two of them stood opposite to one of the Romans; as also the pikes of the first ranke, had their points advanced two or three foot before their fore-man. Wherefore it is no maruel, if the Romans gaue backe: euerie one of them being troubled (as it were) with tenne enemies at once; and not able to come nearer vnto the next of them, than the length of a dozen foot or thereabout. Titus 30 finding this, and not knowing how to remedie it; was greatly troubled: for that still the Phalanx bare downe all which came in the way. But in the meane while hee obserued, That they which were appointed by Philip to make his left wing, were not able, through the much vneuennesse of the ground, to put themselves in order: so as cyther they kept their places on the Hill-tops; or else (which was worse) vpon desire cyther of beholding the pastime, or of seeming to be partakers in the worke, ranne foolishly along by the side of their fellowes, which were occupied in fight.

Of this their disorder He made great and present vse. Hee caused the right wing of his Battaille to march vp the hill, against these ill ordered troupes: his Elephants leading the way, to increase the terrour. The Macedonians were readier to dispute 40 what should be done in such a case, than well aduised what to doe; as hauing no one man appointed, to command that part in chiefe. Indeed if they should haue done their best, it could not haue serued; since the ground whereon they stood, made their weapons vnsuccessfull. For let it be supposed, that Philip hauing fixe and twentie thousand in his Armie (as he is said to haue bene equall to the Enemie in number) had foure thousand Horse, foure thousand Targettiers, and foure thousand light-armed: so shall there remaine fourteene thousand Pikes; whereof hee himselfe had embattailed the one halfe in a Phalanx; the other halfe in the left wing: are they whom Quintius is readie now to charge. The Phalanx hauing vsually fixteene in File, mult, when it consisted of seuen thousand, haue well neare foure hundred and fortie in ranke: but foure hundred would serue, to make a Front long enough; the other fortie or seuen and thirtie Files might be cut off, and reckoned in the number of the Targettiers, or light-armed. Allow- 50 ing therefore, as Polybius doth, to euerie man of them three foot of ground: this Front must haue occupied twelue hundred Foot, or two hundred and fortie paces; that that is, verie neare a quarter of a mile in length. Such a space of open Champaines free from inbrancie of Trees, Ditches, Hillocks, or the like impediments, that must of necessity disioyne this close battaile of the Phalanx; was not euerie where to be found. Here at Cynosephale Philip had so much roome, as would onely suffice for the one halfe of his men: the rest were faine to stand still and looke about them, being hindered from putting themselves in order, by the roughnesse of the Logges heads. But the Romans, to whom all grounds were much alike, were not hindered from coming vp vnto them; nor found any difficultie in mairling those enemies, whose feet were in a manner bound by the discommoditie of the place. The verie first impression of the Elephants, caused them to giue backe; and the coming on of the Legions, to betake themselves vnto flight. A Roman Tribune or Colonell, seeing the victorie on that part assured, left the prosecution of it vnto others: and being followed by twentie Ensignes or Maniples, that is, (as they might fallow) by some two thousand men, tooke in hand a notable peece of worke, and mainly helpfull to making of the Victorie compleere. He considered that Philip, in pursuing the right wing of the Romans, was runne on so farre; as that himselfe with his fellows, in mounting the Hill to charge the left wing of the Macedonians, was already gotten about the Kings head. Wherefore hee turned to the left hand; and making downe the Hill after the Kings Phalanx, fell vpon it in the Rere. The hindmost ranks of the Phalanx, all of them indeed saue the first Hue, were accustomed, when the battailes came to joyning, to carrie their Pikes vpright; and with the whole weight of their bodies to thrust on their foremen: and so were they doing at the present. This was an other great inconvenience in the Macedonian Phalanx, That it serued neyther for offence nor defence, except onely in Front. For though it were so, that Alexander, when he was to fight with Darius in Megopotamis, arranged his Phalanx in such order, that all the foure sides of it were as so many Fronts looking sundrie wayes, because hee expected that he should be encompassed round: yet it is to be vnderstood, that herein he altered the vsuall forme; as also at the same time he embattailed his men in loose order, that so with ease they might turne their weapons, which way need should require. Likewise it is to be considered, That Alexanders men being thus disposed, were fit onely to keep their own ground; not being able to follow vpon the Enemy, vnlesse their hindmost ranks could haue marched backwards. But in this present case of Philip, there was no such prouision for resistance. Therefore his men, being otherwise vnable to helpe themselves, threw downe their weapons, and fled. The King him selfe had thought vntill now, that the fortune of the battaile was euerie where alike, and the day his owne. But hearing the noyse behind him, and turning a little aside with a troupe of Horse, to see how all went: when he beheld his men casting downe their weapons, and the Romans at his backe on the higher ground; Hee presently betooke himselfe to flight. Neyther could he afterwards in any place (except onely a small while about Tempe thre to foure furlonges as were dispersed in this ouerthrow) vntill hee was gotten into his owne Kingdome of Macedon.

There died of the Roman Armie in this battaile, about seuen hundred: of the Macedonians about eight thousand were slaine; and fise thousand taken Prisoners.

T. QUINTIVS falleth out with the Aetolians; and grantes truce vnto PHILIP, with conditions, vpon which the peace is ratified. Libertie proclaimed vnto the Greeks. The Romans quarrelled with ANTIOCHVS.

THE Aetolians wonderfully vanted themselves; and desired to haue it noised through all Greece, That the victorie at Cynosephale was gotten (in a manner) wholly by their valour. They had gotten indeed the most of the bootie; by sucking the Macedonian Campe, whilst the Romans were busied in the chace. Titus therefore being offended both at their vaine glorie, and at their rauous condition; purposed to reach them better manners, by regarding them as slightly, as they thought highly of themselves. He also well perceiued, That by vying them with any extraordinary fauor, he should greatly offend the rest of his Confederates in Greece; who detested the Aetolians much more vehemently, than euer they had done the Macedonians. But this displeasure brake not forth yet awhile.

After the battaile Titus made halt vnto Larissa, a Citie of Thessalie: which he presently tooke. Before his coming, Philip had sent thither one of his Countiers to burne all his letters, and passages whatsoeuer in writing, betwixt him and others, of which many were there kept. It was well done of the King, that among the cares of so much aduertise, he forgot not to provide for the safety of his friends. Yet by his thus doing, they of Larissa might well perceine, that he gaue them as alreadie lost. Wherefore we finde not that they, or any of their neighbours, did make delay of opening their gates to Titus. At the same time, the Towne of Leucas bordering vpon Aeacania, was taken by the Roman Fleet: and verie soone after, all the Aeacnians, a warlike Nation, and in hatred of the Aetolians euer true to Philip; gaue vp themselves vnto the Romans, hearing of the victorie at Cynosephale. The Rhodians also were then in hand with the conquest of Persea, a Region of the Continent ouer against their Iland; whereof they had demanded restitution, in the late Treatie of peace with Philip. They did herein more manly, than any other of the Greeks: forasmuch as they awaited not the good leisure of the Romans, but with an Armie of their owne, and some helpe which they borrowed of the Achaean and other their friends, gaue battaile to Dinocrates the Kings Lieutenant, wherein they had the victorie, and presently recovered the whole Prouince. It angered Philip worse than all this, that the Dardaniens gathered courage out of his affliction, to invade his Kingdome; waiting and spoiling, as if all had beene abandoned to their discretion. This made him gather an Armie in all hast, of six thousand foot and six hundred horse: wherewith coming vpon them, he draue them, with little or no losse of his owne, and great slaughter of theirs, hastily out of the Kingdome. Which done, He returned to Thessalonica.

In this one enterprise He had successfull answerable to his desire: but seeing what bad fortune accompanied his affaires, in all other parts at the same time, he thought it wisdome to yeeld vnto necessities; and therefore sent in all hast Linnus and Demetrius, with Cyclades the banished Achaean, in whom hee reposed much confidence, Embassadors vnto Titus. These had conference along while in priuate, with Titus and some of his Roman Colonels: by whom they were gently entertained, and in verie freindly wise dismissed. It seemes that they had Commission, to conferre all vnto Titus his owne discretion: as Philip himselfe in few daies after did. There was granted vnto them a Truce for fifteene daies: in which time, the King himselfe might come and speake with the Roman Generals. In the meane season

nie suspicious rumors went of Titus as if he had been corrupted with great rewards from the King, to betray the Greeks his Confederates. Of these bruits the Ætolians were chief authors: who being wont to regard neither freindship nor honestie, where profited them a wrong way, iudged a like of all men else. But against the day appointed for the meeting betwixt him and Philip, Titus had sent letters vnto his Allocateds; willing them to haue their Agents readie by a time appointed, at the entrance of Tempe, where the Treatie should be held. There when they were all assembled, they entred into consultation before the Kings arrival, what should be most expedient for the common benefit of them all, and for euery Estate in particular. The poore King Aminander besought them all, and especially the Romans, that they would think vpon him, and considering his weaknes which he confessed, make such prouision, that after the Romans had turned their backs, and were gone home, Philip might not wreake his anger vpon him who was not able to resist. Then spake Alexander one of the Ætolians: who commending Titus for so much as he had thus assembled the Confederates to aduise vpon their owne good, and had willed them to deliuer their mindes freely: added, That in the maine of the purpose which hee had in hand, he was vtterly decciued: for that by making peace with Philip, hee could neither assure the Romans of their quiet, nor the Greeks of their libertie. There was, he said, none other end to be made of the war, which could agree either with the purpose of the Senate and People of Rome, or with the faire promises made by Titus himselfe vnto the Greeks, than the chasing of Philip quite out of his Kingdome. And to this effect he made a long discourse. But Titus answered, That this Ætolian was ill acquainted, either with the good pleasure of the Senate and People of Rome, or with the laudable customes which they generally held: for that it was not the manner of the Romans, to seeke the vtter destruction of any King or Nation, at such time as they first made warre with them; vntill by some rebellion they found it a matter of necessitie, to take such a rigorous course. And hercof he alledged the Carthaginians as a notable example: adding, That victorie, to generous mindes, was onely an inducement vnto moderation. As concerning the publik benefit of Greece: it was (he said) expedient, that the Kingdome of Macedon should be greatly weakened and brought low; not that it should be vtterly destroyed: forasmuch as it serued as a barre, to the Thracians, Gauls, and a multitude of other sauage Nations, which would soone ouerflow the whole Continent of Greece, if this kingdome were not interposed. Wherefore he concluded, that if Philip would yeeld vnto those demands, wherewith he had pressed him in the former Treatie; then was there no reason to denie him peace. As for the Ætolians: if they thought otherwise, it should be at their owne pleasure, to take counsaile apart for themselves as they thought good. Then began Phanaces, an other of the Ætolians, to say, That all was come to nothing; for that ere long, Philip would trouble all the Greeks, no lesse than hee had done in time before. But Titus interrupted him, and bid him leaue his babbiling; saying, That his selfe would take such order, as that Philip were he neuer so delirious, should thenceforth not haue it in his power to molest the Greeks.

The next day King Philip came thither: whom Titus vied friendly: and suffering him to repose himselfe that night, held a Councell the day following; wherein the King yeelded vnto all that had beene required at his hands, offering yet further, to stand to the good pleasure of the Senate, if they would haue more added to the Conditions. Phanaces the Ætolian, insulting ouer him, said it was to be hoped, that he would then at length giue up to the Ætolians a many of towne (which he there named) bidding him speake, whether he would, or not. His answer was, that they might take them all. But Titus interposing himselfe, said it should be otherwise; so that these were Thessalian Townes, and should all be free: one of them onely excepted, which not long agoe had refused to commit it selfe to the faith of the Romans, and therefore should now be giuen to the Ætolians. Hereto Phanaces cried out that it was too great an iniurie, thus to defraud them of the Townes that had sometime belonged belonged vnto their Common-weale. Rather he willed Titus to consider, that by an ancient Couenant betwene them and the Romans; all the Townes taken ought to be their owne, and the Romans to haue nothing saue the pillage and captiues. It is true, that there had beene such a Condition in the former warre: but it ceased to be of any validitie, as soone as the Ætolians made peace with Philip. And thus much Titus gaue them to vnderstand, asking them whether they thought it reasonable, that all the Townes in Greece, which had let in the Romans by compulsion, should be deliuered into subiection of the Ætolians. The rest of the Confederates were verie much delighted, with these angry passages betwene the Roman and the Ætolians: neither had they great reason, to feare any hard measure; since Titus was so earnest in behalfe of those Thessalians, to giue them libertie, though they had stood out against him, euen till verie feare made them open their gates. Wherefore they opposed not themselves; but gaue their consent willingly vnto a Truce for foure Moneths.

The chiefe cause that moued Titus to grant peace so readily to the Macedonians, besides that laudable custome by him before alleaded; was, the fame of Antiochus his comming with an Armie from Syria, and drawing neere toward Europe. He had also perhaps yet a greater motiue; euen the consideration that his succellor might happen to defraud him of the honour, if the warre should happen to be protracted. And hee was in the right. For when his letters, together with Embassadors from the Macedonian, and sundrie States of Greece, came vnto Rome, new Consuls were chosen: who, (especially the one of them) stood verie earnestly against the peace; alleading friuolous matter of their owne suspicion, in hope to get the honour of concluding the warre. The Senate began to be doubtfully affected, between the Embassadors of Philip offering to stand to whatsoeuer was demanded, and the letters of Titus pressing them to accept this offer, on the one side; and the importunitie of the Consul on the other; who said, that all these goodly shewes were fraudulent, and that the King would rebell, as soone as the Armie was called out of Greece. But the matter was taken out of the Senators hands by two of the Tribunes, that referred it to an Assemblies of the People; by whose soueraine authoritie it was concluded, That Peace should be granted vnto the King. So ten Embassadors were sent from Rome ouer into Greece: in which number were they, that had beene Consuls before Titus; and it was ordained by their aduice, That Titus should goe through with the businesse of Peace. These would verie faine haue retained those three important Cities of Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias, vntill the state of Greece were somewhat better settled. But finally Titus prevailed so, that Corinth was (though not immediately) rendred vnto the Achaens; and all the other Greece Townes which Philip held, as well in Asia as in Greece, restored vnto libertie.

The Conditions of the Peace granted vnto Philip, were, That before the celebration of the next Ithmian Games, He should withdraw his Garrisons out of all the Greece Townes which he held, and consigne them ouer to the Romans: That hee should deliuer vp vnto them all Captiues that he had of theirs, and all Renegado's: Likewise all his shippes of war, referring to himselfe onely five of the lesser sort, and one of extraordinarie greatness, wherein fixteene men laboured at euerie oare: Further, that he should pay a thousand talents, the one halfe in hand, the other in ten yeeres next following, by euen portions. Hereto Lucius adds, That he was forbidden to make war out of Macedon, without permission of the Senate. But I finde not that he obserued this Article, or was at any time charged with the breach of it. Foure hundred talents hee had already deliuered vnto Titus, together with his younger sonne Demetrius, to remaine as hostage for his true dealing in this matter of peace, at such time as he lately sent his Embassadors to Rome: when it was promised, that the monie, and his sonne, should be restored backe vnto him, if the Senate were not pleased with the agreement. Whether this monie were reckoned as part of the thousand talents, I cannot find: and it seemeth otherwise, forasmuch as young Demetrius, who together with those foure hundred Talents was given for hostage, remained still in custodie of the Romans, as a part of the bargain which Titus formerly had made. Letters also were then sent by Titus vnto Protes, King of Bithynia: giuing him to vnderstand, what agreement was made with Philip in behalfe of the Greekes; and how the Senate held it reasonable, that the Cians, most miserably spoiled and oppressed by Philip to gratifie this Bythinian his sonne-in-law, should be restored to libertie; and permitted to enioy the same benefit of the Romans, which other of their Nation did. What effect these letters wrought it was not greatly materially, since the Romans were shortly busied with Antiochus, in such wise that they lo had not leisure, to examine the conformitie of Protes to their wil.

All Greece rejoiced at the good bargain, which Titus had made with Philip. One-ly the Ætolians found themselves agreed that they were vnto neglected; which was to the rest no smal part of their contentment. The Beotians continued to fauour the Macedonians; and thereby occasioned much trouble vnto themselves. There were some among them well affected to the Romans: who seeing how things were like to goe, made their complaint vnto Titus, saying, that they were no better than lost, for the good will which they had borne vnto him; vnto this time, when he lay close by them with his Armie, their Pretor which was head of the opposite Faction might be made away. Titus refused to haue an hand in the execution, yet so neuertheless did animate them in their purpose. So they committed the fact, and hoped to haue kept themselves vndiscovered. But when the murder came out, and somewhat was confessed by those that were put to torture: the hatred of the people brake out violently against the Romans; in such wise, that how soeuer they durst not take armes against them, yet such of them as they found stragling from their Campe, they murdered in all parts of the Countrie. This was detected within awhile, and many of the dead bodies found. Hereupon Titus requires of the Beotians, to haue the murderers deliuered into his hands; and for five hundred sculdors, which he had lost by them, to haue paid vnto him five hundred Talents. In stead of making any such amends, they paid him with excuses; which he would not take as good satisfaction. He sends Embassadors to the Acheans and Athenians, informing them what had happened: and requested them not to take it amiss, though he dealt with these their friends as they had deserved. Herevnto he falls to wailing their Countrey; and beseegeth two such Townes of theirs, as did seeme to be most culpable of the murders lately done. But the Embassadors of the Acheans and Athenians, (especially of the Acheans who offered, if hee needed them, to helpe him in this war; yet besought him rather to grant peace vnto the Beotians) prevailed so farre with him; that he was pacified with thirtie Talents, and the punishment of such as were knowne offenders.

In like sort, though not so violently, were many States of Greece distracted; some among them rejoicing that they were free from the Macedonians; others greatly doubting, that the Roman would prouea worse neighbour. The Ætolians would haue bene glad of any Commotion; and therefore published rumors abroad, That it was the purpose of the Romans, to keepe in their owne hands all those places, wherein Philip lately had his Garrisons. Little did they, or the rest of the Greekes, conclude, that this Macedonian Warre waser as an introduction to the Warre to be made in Asia against King Antiochus; where as grew the fruit, that was to be reaped of this and many other victories. Wherefore to stay the progreffe of bad rumors, when the Isthmian games were held, which in time of peace were neuer without great solemnitie and concourse: Titus in that great assembly of all Greece, caused proclamation to be made by sound of Trumpet to this effect, That the Senate and people of Rome, and Titus Quintius Flaminius the Generall, hauing vanquished King Philip and the Macedonians, did wil to be at libertie, free from Impositions, free from Garrisons, and liuing at their owne Lawes, the Corinthians, Phocians, Lacedaemonians, Eubaeans, Eubaeans, Achaens of Phthiotis, Magnetians, Thessalians, and Persebeians. The suddenness of this Proclamation astonished men: so as though they applauded it with a great shout; yet presently they cried out to heare it againe, as if they durst scarce credit their own cares. The Greekes were Crafts-masters in the Art of giuing thanks; which they rendered now to T. Quintius with so great affection, as that they bad welcome smothered him, by thronging officiously about him.

This good will of all the Greekes, was like to be much more auailable vnto the Romans in their warre against Antiochus, than could haue bene the possession of a few Townes, yea or of all those Prouinces which were named in their Proclamation. Vpon confidence hereof; no sooner were these Isthmian games at an end, than Titus, with the Romans that were of his Councell, gaue audience to Hegesianus and Lysias King Antiochus his Embassadors: whom they willed to signifie vnto their Lord, That he should doe well to abstaine from the free Cities in Asia, and not vex them with warre: as also to restore what soeuer he had occupied, belonging to the Kings, Ptolemie or Philip. Moreouer they willed him by these his Embassadors, that he should not passe ouer his Armie into Europe; adding, That some of them would visit him in person ere it were long, to take with him further concerning these points. This done, they fell to accomplishing their promises vnto the Greekes; to the rest they gaue what they had promised. But the Phocians and Loerians they gaue vnto the Ætolians, whom they thought it no wise dome to offend ouer-much, being shortly to take a greater worke in hand. The Achaens of Phthiotis they annexed vnto the Thessalians; all saue the Towne of Thebes in Phthiotis, the same which had bene abandoned by T. Quintius to the Ætolians in the last Treatie with Philip. The Ætolians contended verie earnestly about Pharalus and Lencus. But they were put off with a dilatorie answer, and rejected vnto the Senate: for how soeuer somewhat the Councell might fauour them; yet was it not meet that they should haue their will, as it were in despite of Titus. So the Achaens were restored Corinth, Triphylia, and Hersea. So the Corinthians were made free indeede (though the Romans yet awhile kept the Acorinthians) for that all which were partakers of the Achaen Commonwealth, enjoyed their libertie in as absolute manner, as they coulde desire. To Pleuratus the Ilyrian were giuen one or two places, taken by the Romans from Philip: and vpon Aminander were bestowed those Castles, which hee had gotten from Philip during this Warre; to reigne in them and the grounds which they commanded, as hee did among his Arbmanians. The Rhodians had bin their owne Caruers. Attalus was dead a little before the Victory; and therefore lost his share. Yet many that were with Titus in Councell, would haue giuen the Townes of Oreum and Eretia, in the Ile of Eubaea, to his sonne and succellor King Eumenes. But finally it was concluded, that these as well as the rest of the Eubaeans, should bee suffered to enioy their libertie. Orestis, a little Prouince of the Kingdom of Macedon, bordering on Epirus, and lying towards the Ionian Sea, had yielded vnto the Romans long ere this, and since continued true to them: for which cause it was also set at libertie, and made a free Estate by it selfe.

These busineses being dispatched: it remained, that all care should be vnto how to auoid the war with King Antiochus, but how to accomplish it with most ease and prosperitie. Wherefore Embassadors were sent both to Antiochus himselfe, to pick matter of quarrell; and about vnto others, to predispose them vnto the assisting of the Romans therein. What ground and matter of Warre against this King the Romans now had, or shortly after found: as also how their Embassadors and Agents dealt and sped abroad; I referre vnto another place.

§. I.

What Kinges, of the races of SELEVCVS and PTOLÉMIE, reigned in Asia and Egypt before Antiochus the great.

Philostr.

SELEVCVS NICATOR, the first of his race, King of Asia and Syria, died in the end of the hundred twentie and fourth Olympiad. Hee was treacherously slaine by Ptolemie Ceraunus, at an Altar called Argos, hauing (as is said) bene warned before by an Oracle, to beware of Argos, as the fatal place of his death. But I neuer haue read that any mans life hath bene preferred, or any mischance auoided, by the predictions of such Deuillish Oracles. Rather I be-lieue, That many such predictions of the Heathen Gods, haue bene ante-dated by their Priests or by others, which deuised them after the euent.

Antiochus Soter, the sonne and heire of this Seleucus, was dearly beloued of his Father: who surrendered vp vnto him his owne wife Stratonice, when hee vnder-stood how much the young Prince was enamoured on her. Wherefore Ptolemie Ce-raunus had great cause to feare, that the death of Seleucus would not be vnreueged by this his Successor. But Antiochus was contented to be pacified, cyther with gifts, or perhaps onely with faire words; containing himselfe within Asia, and letting Ce-raunus enjoy that quietly, which he had purchased in Europe with the blood of Sele-ucus. It is said of this Antiochus, that although he married with the Queen Stratonice in his Fathers life, yet out of modestie he forbore to embrace her, till his Father was dead. So that perhaps his incestuous loue was partly, if not chiefly, the cause of his not prosecuting that reuenge; whereunto Nature should haue urged him. Afterwards he had warres with Antigonus Gonatas, and with Nicomedes King of Bithynia.
Alfo Lutatius and Leonorius, Kings or Captaines of the Gules, were set vpon him by the same Nicomedes. With these he fought a great battaile: wherein though otherwise the Enemies had all advantage against him; yet by the terror of his Elephants, which affrighted both their Horses and them, he wonne the Victorie. Hee tooke in hand an enterprize against Ptolemie Philadelphus: but finding ill successe in the beginning, he soone gaue it ouer. To this King Antiochus Soter it was, that Berosus the Chaldean dedicated his Historie of the Kings of Assyria; the same, which hath since been excellently falsified by the Friar Annius. He left behind him one sonne, called Antiochus Theos; and one daughter, called Apame, that was married vnto the King of Cyrene. So he died about the end of the hundred twentie and ninth Olympiad, or the beginning of the Olympiad following, in the fiftieth or one and fiftieth year of the Kingdome of the Greeces; when he had reigned nineteene yeares.

Antiochus, surnamed Theos or the god, had this vaine and impious title giuen vnto him, by flatterie of the Milesians; whom hee deliuered from Timarchus, a Tyrant that oppressed them. He held long and difficult, but fruitlesse, warre with Ptolemie

Philadelphus King of Egypt; which finally he compounded, by taking to wife Bere-nice the daughter of Ptolemie.

Of these two Kings, and of this Ladie Berenice, Saint Hierome and other Interpreters haue vnderstood that Prophecie of DANIEL: The Kings daughter of the South, shall come to the King of the North, to make an agreement; and that which fol-loweth.

Ptolemie Philadelphus was a great loue of Peace and Learning; and (setting apart his incestuous marriage with his owne sister Arfinoe) a verie excellent Prince: how-fouer, the worthiest of all that race. It was hee, that built and furnished with Bookes, that famous Librarie in Alexandria: which to adorne, and to honour the more, he sent vnto Eleazar then high Priest of the Iewes for the Bookes of Moses and other Scriptures. The benefits of this King vnto the Iewes, had formerly bin verie great: for he had set at libertie many of them, as his Father held in lauerie throughout all Egypt; and hee had sent vnto the Temple of God in Hierusalem verie rich Presents. Wherefore Eleazar yielding to the Kings desire, presented him with an Hebrew coppie: which Ptolemie caused to be translated into Greeke, by seuente of the most graue and learned persons, that could bee found among all the Tribes. In this number of the seuentie two Interpreters, or (as they are commonly called) the Seventie, Iesus the sonne of Sirach, is thought by Genebrard to haue bene one: who that he liued in this Age, it seemes to me verie sufficiently proved by Iu-snius, in his preface vnto Ecclesiasticus. The whole passage of this business between Philadelphus and the high Priest, was written (as Iulius Iulianus affirms) that was employed therein. Fortie yeares Ptolemie Philadelphus was King, reckoning the time wherein he ioyntly reigned with his Father. He was exceedingly beloued of his people; and highly magnified by Poets, and other Writers. Towards his end hee grew more voluptuous, than hee had bene in his former yeares: in which time hee boasted, that hee alone had found out the way how to liue for euer. If this had bene referred vnto his honourable deeds, it might haue stood with reason: otherwise, the Gowt, with which he was often troubled, was enough to teach him his owne error. He was the first of the Kings, deriued from Alexanders Successors, that entred into League with the Romans; as also his Offspring was the last among those Royall Families, which by them was rooted vp.

Antiochus Theos had another wife, called Laodice, at such time as he married with Berenice the daughter of this Ptolemie. After his second marriage, hee vied his first wife with no better regard, than if shee had bene his Concubine. Laodice hated his first wife: yet aduerted not to seek reuenge; vntill her owne sonne Seleucus Calpurnius was of ability to be King. This was two or three yeares after the death of Ptolemie Philadelphus: at what time shee poisoned her husband Theos; and by permission of Seleucus her sonne, murdered Berenice, together with a sonne that shee had borne to Antiochus. In true reports, that Berenice suied herselfe, together with the young Prince her child, while in the Sanctuary at Daphne: and that not onely some Cities of Asia prepared to succour her, but her brother Ptolemie Energetes, King of Egypt, came to rescue her with an Armie; though too late, for she was slaine before.

With such cruelties Seleucus Callinicus, succeeding vnto his Father that had fift-ene yeares bene King, beganne his Reigne. His subjects were highly offended at his wicked nature, which they discouered in his first entrance. Wherefore it was like, that his Estate would haue bene much endangered, if Ptolemie Energetes, who came against him, had not bene drawne backe into his owne Countrey, by some Comotions there in hand. For there were none that would beare armes against Ptolemie, in defence of their owne King: but rather they sided with the Egyptians; who tooke Laodice the Kings mother, and rewarded her with death as she had well deserued. Wherefore Seleucus, being freed from this inuasion, by occasion of those domesticall troubles which recalled Energetes home into Egypt, went about a dangerous peece of worke, euen to make Warre vpon his owne subjects becaufe of their bad affection towards him; when as it had bene much better, by well deserving, to haue changed their hatred into loue. A great Fleet hee prepared: in furnishing and manning whereof he was at such charges, that hee scarce left himselfe any other hope, it that should miscarrie. Herein hee embarked himselfe; and, 10 putting to Sea, met with such a tempest, as denoued all faue himselfe, and a verie few of his friends that hardly escaped. This calamitie, hauing left him nothing else in a manner than his naked bodie, turned neuertheless to his great good; as anon after it seemed. For when his Subjects vnderstood, in what sort the Gods (as they conceived it) it had punished him for his offences: they had commiseration of his estate; and, 10 presuming that hee would thenceforth become a new man, offered him their seruice with great alacritie. This reuiued him, and filled him with such spirits as thinking himselfe well enough able to deale with the Egyptian, he made readie a mightie Armie for that purpose. But his fortune was no better at Land, than it had bene at Sea. He was vanquished by Ptolemie in a great battaile: whence he escaped hardly; no better attended, than after his late shipwrack. Halting therefore backe to Antioch, and fearing that the Enemy would loone be at his heeles; He wrote vnto his brother Antiochus Hierax, who lay then in Asia, praying him to bring succour with all speed; and promising, in recompence of his faith and diligence, the Dominion of a great part of Asia. Antiochus was then but fourteene yeares olde; yet extremely ambitious; and therefore glad of such an occasion to make himselfe great. 20

He leued a mightie Armie of the Gauls; where with he set forwards to helpe his brother, or rather to get what he could for himselfe. Hereof Ptolemie being aduertised; and hauing no desire to put himselfe in danger more than needed,ooke Truce with Seleucus for tenne yeares. No sooner was Seleucus freed from this care of the Egyptian warre; but his brother Antiochus came vpon him; and needs would fight with him, as knowing himselfe to haue the better Armie. So Seleucus was vanquished againe; and saued himselfe, with so few about him, that hee was verily supposed to haue perished in the battaile. Thus did Gods iustice take reuenge of those murders, by which the Crowne was purchased; and selled (as might haue bene thought) on the head of this bloudie King. Antiochus was glad to heare of his brother's death; as if thereby hee had purchased his hearts desire. But the Gauls, his Mercenaries, were gladder than He. For when he led them against Eumenes; King of Pergamus, in hope to get honour by making a Conquest in the beginning of his Reigne: these perfidious Barbarians tooke counsaile against him; and deuised how to stripp him of all that hee had. They thought it verie likely, that if there were none of the Royall house to make head against them; it would be in their power, to doe what should best be pleasing to themselves, in the lower Asia. Wherefore they laid hands on Antiochus; and enforced him to ransom himselfe with monie, as if he had bene their lawfull Prisoner. Neither were they so contented; but made him enter into such Composition with them, as tended little to his honour. 30
In the meane while Seleucus had gathered a new Armie; and prepared once more to trie his fortune against his brother. Eumenes hearing of this, thought the season fit for himselfe to make his profit of their discord. Antiochus fought with him, and was beaten; which is no great meruaile, since he had great reason to stand in no lesse fear of the Gauls; his owne soldiers, than of the enemy with whom hee had to deale. After this, Eumenes wanne much in Asia; whilest Antiochus went against his brother. In the second battaile, fought betweene the brethren, Seleucus had the vpper hand; and Antiochus Hierax of the Hauke, (which surname was giuen him, because he fought his prey vpon euerie one, without care whether hee were prouoked or not) soared away as farre as he could, both from his brother, and from his owne Gauls. Hauing fetcht a great compasse through Mesopotamia and Armenia, He fell at length in Capadocia; where his father in law King Artamenes tooke him vp. Hee was entertained verie louingly in outward shew; but with a meaning to betray him.

This hee soone perceiued: and therefore betooke him to his wings againe; though he knew not well, which way to bend his flight. At length hee reloued to bestow himselfe vpon Ptolemie: his owne conscience telling him, what euill hee had meant vnto Seleucus, his brother; and therefore what little good hee was reciprocally to expect at his hands. Infidelitie can finde no sure harbour. Ptolemie well vnderstood the perfidious and turbulent nature of this Hierax. Wherefore hee laid him vp in close prison: whence though by means of an harlot hee got out; yet flying from his keepers, he fell into the hands of the eues, by whom he was murdered. Neare about the same time died Seleucus. The Parthians and Bactrians had rebelled against him, during his warres with his brother. Hee therefore made a iourneie against Arsaces founder of the Parthian kingdome: wherein his euill fortune, or rather Gods vengeance, adhered so closely to him, that he was takē prisoner. Arsaces dealt friendly with him, and dismissed him, hauing euery way giuen him royall entertainment:
but in returning home, he brake his necke by a fall from his horse, and so ended his vnhappy reigne of twentie yeeres. Hee had to wife Laodice, the sister of Andromachus one of his most trustie Captaines: which was father vnto that Achæus, who making his aduantage of this affinitie, became shortly after (as hee filled himselfe) a kings though rather indeed, a great troubler of the world in those parts. By Laodice hee had two sonnes; Seleucus the third, surnamed Ceraunus; and Antiochus the third, called afterwards the Great.

Seleucus Ceraunus reigned onely three yeeres: in which time he made war vpon Attalus the first, that was King of Pergamus. Being weake of bodie through lick-nессe, and in want of monie, He could not keepe his men of war in good order: and finally he was slaine by treason of Nicanor, and Apaturnus a Gaul. His death was reuenged by Achæus, who slue the Traitors, and tooke charge of the Armie: which he ruled verie wisely, and faithfully a while; Antiochus, the brother of Seleucus, being then a Child.

Expedition against the Parthians, Bactrians, and Indians. Somewhat of the Kings reigning in India, after the death of the Great ALEXANDER.

ANTIOCHUS was scarcely fiftene yeeres olde, when hee began his reigne, which lasted six and thirtie yeeres. In his Minoritie, Hee was wholly gouerned by one Hermias, an ambitious man; and one which magned all vertue, that hee found in any of the Kings faithfull ser-uants. This wilde qualitie in a Counsailler of such great place, how harmefull it was vnto his Lord, and finally vnto himselfe, the successe of things will shortly discover.

Soone after the beginning of Antiochus his reigne, Ptolemie Euergetes King of Egypt died; and left his heire Ptolemie Philopator, a yong boy likewise, as hath elf-where bene remembered. This was that Euergetes, who relieved Aratus and the Acheans: who afterwards tooke part with Cleomenes; and louingly entertained him, when he was chased out of Greece by Antigonus Gonatas. He annexed vnto his Dominion the Kingdome of Cyrene; by taking to wife Berenice, the daughter of King Magus. He was the third of the Ptolemies; and the last good King of the race.

T he

The name of Euergetes, or the doer of good, was giuen him by the Aegyptians; nor so much for the great spoiles which hee brought home, after his victories in Syria; as for that he recovered some of those Images or Idols, which Cambyses, when hee conquered Aegypt, had carried into Persia. He was readie to haue made war vpon the Ienes, for that Ombis their high Priest, out of meere couetousnes of monie, refused to pay vnto him his yeerely tribute of twentie talents; but he was pacified by the wisdom of Iosphus a Iew, vnto whom afterwards he let in farme the Tributes and Customes, that belonged vnto him, in those parts of Syria which he held. For Calefryria, with Palestina and all those parts of the Countrie that lay neereft vnto Aegypt, were held by the Aegyptians; either as hauing fallen to the share of Ptoleme the first, at such time as the great Antigonus was vanquished and slaine in the battaile at Ipsus; or as being won by this Euergetes, in the troublefome and vnhappy reigne of Seleucus Callinicus. The victories of this Euergetes in Syria, with the contentions that lasted for many succeeding ages betweene the Ptolemies and the Seleucides, were all foretold by Daniel in the Prophecie before cited, which is expounded by S. Hierome. This Ptoleme Euergetes reigned six and twentie yeeres; and died towards the end of the hundred thirte and ninth Olympiad. It may seeme by that, which we finde in the Prologue vnto Iesus the sonne of Sirach his booke, that he should haue reigned a much longer time. For Sirachides there saith, that he came into Aegypt in the eight and thirtieth yeere, when Euergetes was King. It may therefore be, that either this King reigned long together with his father: or that those eight and thirtieth yeeres, were the yeeres of Iesus his owne age; if not perhaps reckoned (as the Ienes did otherwhiles reckon) from some notable accident that had befallen them.

Not long after the death of Euergetes: Hermias the Counsaileur, and in a manner the Protector of King Antiochus, incited his Lord vnto warre against the Aegyptians; for the recouerie of Calefryria and the Countreies adioyning. This counsaile was verie vnseasonably giuen; when Molo, the Kings Lieutenant in Media, was broken out into rebellion, and sought to make himselfe absolute Lord of that rich Countreie. Neuertheless Hermias, being more froward than wise, maintained fustly, that it was most expedient, and agreeable with the Kings honour, to send forth against a rebellious Captain other Captaines that were faithful; whilst He in person made warre vpon one, that was like himselfe a King. No man durst gainsay the resolution of Hermias; who therefore sent Xenetas an Achaean, with such forces as he thought expedient, against the Rebelle; whilst in the meane season an Armie was preparing for the Kings Expedition into Calefryria. The King hauing marched from Apamea to Laodicea, and so ouer the Defarts into the Vallie of Musyas, between the Mountaines of Libanus and Anti-libanus; found his way there stopp'd by Theodotus an Aetolian, that serued vnder Ptoleme. So hee consumed the time there awhile to none effect: and then came heere, that Xenetas, his Capitaine, was deliroed with his whole Armie; and Molo thereby become Lord of all the Countreie, as farre as vnto Babylon.

Xenetas, whilst he was yet on his iourne, and drew neare to the Riuer of Tigris; receiued many aduertisements, by such as fled ouer vnto him from the Enemie, That the followers of Molo were, for the most part, against their wils, drawne by their Commander to beare armes against the King. This report was not altogether false; but Molo himselfe stood in some doubt lest his followers would leaue him in time of necessitie. Xenetas therefore making slow, as if he had prepared to passe the Riuer by Botes in case of his Enemie: left in the night time such as he thought meet to defend his Campe; and with all the floure of his Armie went ouer Tigris, in a place ten miles lower than Molo his Campe. Molo heard of this, and sent forth his horse to giue impediment; but hearing that Xenetas could not so be stopp'd, He himselfe dislodged, and tooke his iourne towards Media, leauing all his baggage behind him in his Campe. Whether he did this, as distrustling the faith of his owne souldiours:

souldiours: or whether thereby to deceiue his Enemie; the great follie of Xenetas made his stratageme prosperous. For Xenetas, hauing borne himselfe proudly before, vpon the countenance of Hermias by whom he was aduanced into this charge; did now presume, that all should giue way to his authoritie, without putting him to much trouble of vting the sword. Wherefore he suffered his men to feast, with the prouisions which they found readie in the forsaken Campe: or rather hee commanded them so to doe, by making Proclamation, That they should cherish vpon themselves against the iourne, which hee intended to take next day, in pursuit of the Rebels that fled. And to the same purpose he busied himselfe, in transporting the remainder of his Armie, which he had left on the other side of Tigris. But Molo went no further that day, than hee could easily returne the same night. Wherefore vnderstanding what good rule the Kings men kept: hee made such hast backe vnto them, that hee came vpon them early in the morning; whilst they were yet heauie with the wine and other good cheare, that they had spent at supper. So Xenetas and a verie few about him, died fighting in defence of the Campe: the rest were slaughtered, without making resistance; and many of them, ere they were perfectly awake. Likewise the Campe on the other side of Tigris, was easily taken by Molo: the Captaines flying thence, to save their owne liues. In the heat of this victorie, the Rebelle marched vnto Seleucia, which he presently tooke: and, mastering within a little while the Prouince of Babylonia, and all the Countreie downe to the Red Sea, or Bay of Persia, He hastened vnto Susa; where at his first coming hee wan the Citie: but failing to take the Caste that was exceeding strong, returned backe to Seleucia, there to giue order concerning this bulines.

The report of these things comming to Antiochus, whilst he lay (as is said before) in the Vale of Musyas; filled him with great sorrow, and his Campe with trouble. He tooke counsaile what to doe in this needfull case; and was well aduised by Epigenes the best man of warre he had about him, to let alone this Enterprise of Calefryria; and bend his forces thither, where more neede required them. This counsaile was put in execution with all conuenient hast. Yet was Epigenes dismised by the way, and soone after slaine, by the practise of Hermias; who could not endure to heare good counsaile giuen, contrarie to his owne good liking and allowance. In the iourne against Molo, the name and presence of the King was more available, than any oddes which hee had of the Rebelle in strength. Molo distrusted his owne followers: and thought, that neither his late good successe, nor any other consideration, would serue to hold them from returning to the Kings obedience; if once they beheld his person. Wherefore hee thought it safest for him, to assaile the Kings Campe in the might time. But going in hand with this; Hee was discovered by some that fled ouer from him to the King. This caused him to returne backe to his Campe: which, by some error, tooke alarme at his returne; and was hardly quieted, when Antiochus appeared in sight. The King was thus forward in giuing battaile to Molo, vpon confidence which hee had that many would reuolt vnto him. Neither was hee deceiued in this his beleefe. For not a few men, or Engins: but all the left wing of the Enemie, which was opposit vnto the King, changed side forthwith as soone as euer they had sight of the Kings person; and were readie to doe him seruice against Molo. This was enough to haue won the victorie: but Molo thortened the worke, by killing himselfe; as did also diuers of his friends, who for feare of torments preuented the Hang-man with their owne sword.

After this victorie came ioyfull newes, that the Queene Laodice, daughter of Mithradates king of Pontus, which was married vnto Antiochus awhile before, had brought forth a sonne. Fortune seemed bountifull vnto the king: and therefore he purposed to make what vse he could, of her freindly disposition while it lasted. Being now in the Easterne parts of his kingdome, He iudged it conuenient to visite his Frontiers; were it onely to terrifie the Barbarians, that bordered vpon him. Here vnto his Counsaileur Hermias gaue assent: not so much respecting the Kings honour;

as considering what good might thereby happen to himselfe. For if it should come to passe, that the king were taken out of the world by any casualtie: then made hee no doubt of becoming Protector to the young Prince; and thereby of lengthning his owne Government. Antiochus therefore went against Antidotasus, who reigned among the Atropatians; hauing the greatest part of his kingdom, situate betwene the Caspian and Euxine Sea. This barbarous king was verie old & fearefull; and therefore yielded vnto whatsoever Conditions it pleased Antiochus to lay vpon him. So in this iourne Antiochus got honour, such as well contented him; and then returned home wards. Vpon the way, a Physician of his brake with him as concerning Hermias; informing him truly, how odious he was vnto the people; and how dangerous he would be shortly vnto the kings owne life. Antiochus beleied this, hauing long suspected the same Hermias; but not daring, for feare of him, to utter his suspitions. It was therefore agreed, that he should be made away on the fudden: which was done, he being trained forth by a sleight a good way out of the Campe, and there killed without warning or disputation. The king needed not to haue vied so much arte, in ridding his hands of a man so much detested. For howsoeuer he seemed gracious whilst he was aliue: yett heby for feare had become most obsequious to him, whilst he was in case to doe them hurt, were as readie as the foremost, to speake of him as he had deserved; when once they were secure of him. Yea his wife and children, lying then at Apamea, were stoned to death by the wicied and children of the Citizens; whose indignation brake forth the more outrageously, the longer that it had been concealed.

About these times, Achæus (of whom we spake before) thinking that Antiochus might happen to perish in some of those Expeditions which he tooke in hand; was bold to set a Diademe vpon his owne head, and take vpon him as a King. His purpose was to haue invaded Syria: but the time of Antiochus his returning thitherwards, made him quit the enterprise; and studie to get some handsome colour on his former presumption. It is verie strange, that Antiochus neither went against Achæus; nor yett dissembled the notice which he had taken, of these his traitorous purposes: but wrote vnto him, signifying that he knew aland vpraying him with such infidelitie, as any offender might know to be vnpardonable. By these means he emboldned the Traitor: who being already detected, might better hope to maintain his former actions by strong band, than to exccute them, or get pardon by submission. Antiochus had at that time a vehement desire to recouer Calestria or what else he could, of the Dominions of Ptolemie Philopator in those parts. He began with Seleucia, a verie strong Citie neare vnto the mouth of the Riuer Orontes; which ere long he won, partly by force, partly by corrupting with bribes the Captaines that lay therein. This was that Seleucia, whereto Antigonus the great who founded it, gave the name of Antigonia: but Seleucus getting it shortly after, called it Seleucia; and Ptolemie Evergetes hauing lately won it, might, if it had so pleased him, haue changed the name into Ptolemæus. Such is the vanitie of men, that hope to purchase an endless memoriall vnto their names, by workes proceeding rather from their greedinesse, than from their vertue; which therefore no longer are their owne, than the fame greatnesse hath continuance. Theodotus the Italian, he that before had opposed himselfe to Antiochus, and defended Calestria in the behalfe of Ptolemie; was now growne forie, that he had vied so much faith and diligence, in seruice of an vnthankfull and luxurious Prince. Wherefore, as a Mercinarie he began to haue regard vnto his owne profit: which thinking to finde greater, by applying himselfe vnto him that was (questionlesse) the more worthie of these two Kings; He offered to deliuer vp vnto Antiochus, the Cities of Tyrrus and Ptolemæus. Whilst he was dealing about this treason, and had already sent messengers to King Antiochus; his practise was detected; and he belied in Ptolemæus by one of Ptolemies Captaines, that was more faithfull than himselfe. But Antiochus hating his rescue, vanquished this Captaine who met him on the way: and afterwards got possession, not onely of Tyrrus and Ptolemæus, with a good flecte of the Egyptian Kings that was in those Hauens: but of so many other Townes in that Country, as emboldned him to thinke vpon making a iourne into Egypt it selfe. Agathobolus and Solibus bore all the sway in Egypt at that time: Ptolemie himselfe being loth to haue his pleasures interrupted, with businesse of so small importance, as the saletie of his Kingdome. Wherefore these two agreed together, to make prouision as hastily, and yett as secretly as might be, for the warre: and neuerthelesse, at the same time, to presse Antiochus with daily Embassadours to some good agreement. There came in the heate of this busines, Embassadours from Rhodes, Byzantium, and Cyzicus; as likewise from the Ætoliens; according to the vsuall courtesie of the Greekes, desiring to take vp the quarrell. These were all entertained in Memphis; by Agathobolus and Solibus: who entreated them to deale effectually with Antiochus. But whilst this Treatie lasted great preparations were made at Alexandria for the warre: wherin these two Counsaillors perswaded themselves reasonably, that the victorie would be their owne; if they could get, for monie, a sufficient number of the Greekes to take their parts. Antiochus heard onely what was done at Memphis, and how desirous the Gouvernours of Egypt were to be at quiet: wherunto he gaue the readier beleeve, not onely for that hee knew the disposition of Ptolemie, but because the Rhodiens, and other Embassadours, coming from Memphis, discoursed vnto him all after one manner; as being all deceived, by the cunning of Agathobolus and his fellow. Antiochus therefore hauing wearied himselfe, at the long siege of a Towne called Dura, which he could not win: and being desirous to refresh himselfe and his Armie in Seleucia, during the Winter which then came on; granted vnto the Egyptians a Truce for foure moneths, with promise that he would be readie to hearken vnto equall Conditions, when they should be offered. It was not his meaning to be so courteous, as he would faine haue seemed; but onely to lull his enemies alleepe, whilst he tooke time to refresh himselfe; and to bring Achæus to some good order, whose treason daily grew more open and violent. The same negligence which he thought the Egyptians would haue vied, He vied himselfe; as presuming, that when time of the yeare better serued, little force would be needfull: for that the Townes would voluntarily yeeld vnto him, since Ptolemie provided not for their defence. Neuerthelesse he gaue audience to the Embassadours, and had often conference with those that were sent out of Egypt: pleasing himselfe well, to dispute about the iustice of his quarrell; which hee purposed shortly to make good by the sword, whether it were iust or no. He said, that it was agreed between Seleucus his Ancestor and Ptolemie the sonne of Lagi, that all Syria, if they could win it from Antigonus, should be giuen in possession to Seleucus: and that this bargain was afterwards ratified, by generall consent of all the Confederates, after the battaile at Issus. But Ptolemies men would acknowledge no such bargain. They said, that Ptolemie the sonne of Lagi, had won Calestria, and the Prouinces adioyning for himselfe: as also that he had sufficiently gratified Seleucus, by lending him forces to recouer his Prouince of Babylon, and the Countries about the Riuer of Euphrates. Thus whilst neither of them greatly cared for peace; they were, in the end of their disputation, as farre from concluding as at the beginning. Ptolemie demanded restitution; Antiochus thought, that he had not as yett gotten all that was his owne: Also Ptolemie would needes haue Achæus comprehended in the League betwene them, as one of their Confederates; But Antiochus would not endure to heare of this, exclaiming against it as a shameful thing, that one King should offer to deale so with another, as to take his Rebell into protection, and seeke to ioine him in Confederacie with his owne foueraigne Lord. When the Truce was expired, and Antiochus prepared to take the field againe: contrarie to his expectation he was informed, That Ptolemie, with a verie puissant Armie, was coming vp against him out of Egypt. Setting forward therefore to meet with the Enemy, he was encountered on the way by those Captaines of Ptolemie, that had resisted him

the yeere before. They held against him the passages of Libanus, whence neuertheless he draue them: and, proceeding onward in his iourne, wan so many places that he greatly increased his reputation; and thereby drew the Arabians, with diuers of the bordering people, to become his followers. As the two Kings drew neare together: many Captaines of Ptolemie forooke his pay, and fled ouer to Antiochus. This notwithstanding, the Aegyptian had the courage to meet his Enemy in the field. The battaile was fought at Raphia: where it was not to be decided, whether the Aegyptians or Antiochians were the better fouldiors (for that the strength of both Armies consisted in Mercenaries, cheifly of the Greekes, Thracians, and Gauls) but whether of the Kings was the more fortunate. Ptolemie, with Arfinoe his sister 10 and Wife, rode vp and downe encouraging his men; the like did Antiochus on the other side: each of them rehearsing the braue deedes of their Ancestors; as not hauing of their owne, whereby to valew themselves. Antiochus had the more Elephants: as also his, being of Asia, had they beene fewer would haue beaten those of Africke. Wherefore by the advantage of these beasts, He draue the enemies before him, in that part of the battaile wherein hee fought himselfe. But Ptolemie had the better men: by whose valour he brake the Grolle of his Enemies battaile, and wan the victory; whilest Antiochus was heedlesly following vpon those, whom he had compelled to retire. Antiochus had brought into the feild aboue seuentie thousand foot, and six thousand Horse: whereof though he lost scarce ten thousand foote, and not 20 foure hundred horse; yet the same of his ouerthrow, tooke from him all those places which he had lately wonne. When therefore he was returned home to Antioch: He began to stand in feare, lest Ptolemie and Achæus, sitting vpon him both at once, should put him in danger of his whole Estate. This caused him to send Embassadors vnto the Aegyptian to treat of peace: which was readily granted; it being much against the nature of Ptolemie, to vex himselfe thus with the tedious busines of warre. So Ptolemie, hauing staied three moneths in Syria, returned home into Egypt clad with the reputation of a Conqueror; to the great admiration of his subiects, and of all those that were acquainted with his voluptuous and slothfull condition.

Achæus was not comprised in the League betweene these two Kings: or if hee had beene included therein; yet would not the Aegyptian haue taken the paines, of making a second Expedition for his sake. The best was, that he thought himselfe strong enough, if fortune were not too much against him, to deale with Antiochus. Neither was he confident without great reason. For besides his many victories, whereby he had gotten all that belonged vnto Antiochus on this side of Taurus, Hee had also good successe against Attalus King of Pergamus; that was an able man of warre, and commanded a strong Armie. Neither was he, as Atole the Rebelle had beene, one of meane regard otherwise, and carried beyond himselfe by apprehending the vantage of some opportunitie: but Cozen german to the King, as hath beene shewed before; and now lately the Kings brother-in-law, by taking to wife a younger daughter of the same Mithridates King of Pontus, which was also called Laudice, as was her sister the Queene, Antiochus his wife. These things had added maiestie vnto him; and had made his followers greatly to respect him, euen as one to whome a Kingdome was belonging. Neither made it a litle for him, That King Ptolemie of Egypt held him in the nature of a freind: and that King Antiochus was now lately vanquished in the battaile at Raphia; and had thereby lost all his gettings in Syria. But all these hopes and likelihoods came to nothing. For the King of Pontus, if he would meddle in that quarrell betweene his sonnes-in-law, had no reason to take part against the more honourable. As for the Aegyptian: Hee was not onely slothfull; but hindered by a rebellion of his owne subiects, from helping his friends abroad. For the people of Egypt, of whom Ptolemie, contrarie to the manner of his Progenitors, had armed a great number to frue in the late Expedition; began to entertaine a good opinion of their owne valour, thinking it not inferior 10 to the Macedonian. Hereupon they refused to suffer as much as formerly they had done: since they lesse esteemed, than they had done, the force of the Kings Mercenary Greekes; which had hitherto kept them in streight subiection. Thus brake out a warre, betweene that King and his subiects: wherein though the ill-guided force of the Multitude was finally broken; yet King Ptolemie thereby wasted much of his strength, and much of his time, that might haue bene spent, as he thought, much better in recuelling; or, as others thought, in succouring Achæus. As for Antiochus: He had no sooner made his peace with the Aegyptian, than he turned all his care to the preparation of warre against Achæus. To this purpose he entered into 10 League with Attalus; that so he might distract the forces of his Rebelle, and finde him worke on all sides. Finally, his diligence and fortune were such, that within a while he had pent vp Achæus into the Citie of Sardes where he held him about two yeeres beleiged. The Citie was verie strong, and well victualled: so as there appeared not, when the second yeere came, any greater likelihood of taking it, than in the first yeeres seige. In the end, one Lagoras a Cretan found meanes how to enter the Towne. The Citie it selfe was vpon a verie high Rocky, and in a manner impregnable: as also the Towne-wall adioyning to the Citie, in that part which was called the Sars, was in like manner situated vpon steepe Rockes, and hardly accessible; that hung ouer a deepe bottom, whereinto the dead carcases of Horses and other beasts, yea and sometimes of men, vied to be throwne. Now it was obserued 20 by Lagoras, That the Rauens and other birds of prey, which hanted that place by reason of their food which was there neuer wanting, vied to fie vp vnto the top of the Rockes, and to pitch vpon the wals; where they rested without any disturbance. Obseruing this often, he reasoned with himselfe, and concluded, that those partes of the Wall were left vnguarded, as being thought vnapproachable. Heereof hee informed the King: who approoued his iudgement, and gave vnto him the leading of such men, as hee desired for the accomplishing of the enterprize. The successe was agreeable to that which Lagoras had afore conceiued: and, though with much labour, yet without resistance, he scaled those Rockes, and 30 (whilest a generall assault was made) entred the Towne in that part; which was, at other times vngarded, then vnthought vpon. In the same place had the Persians, vnder Cyrus, gotten into Sardes; when Craesus thought himselfe secure on that tide. But the Citizens tooke not warning, by the example of a losse many ages past; and therefore out of memorie, Achæus held still the Citie: which not onely seemed by nature impregnable, but was verie wel stored with all necessaries; and manned with a sufficient number, of such as were to him well assured. Antiochus therefore was constrained to wast much time about it; hauing none other hope to preuaile, than by famishing the inclosed. Besides the vsual tediousnesse of expectation; his businesse called him thence away into the higher Asia, where the Bactrians, and Partians with the Hyracians, had erected Kingdomes taken out of his Dominions, vpon which they still encroched. But he thought it not safe to let Achæus breake loose againe. On the other side, there were some Agents of Ptolemie the Aegyptian, and good friends vnto Achæus; that made it their whole studie, how to deliuer this beleiged Prince. If they could rescue his person, they cared for no more: but presumed, that when he should appeare in the Countreies vnder Taurus, he would soone haue an Armie at command; and be strong enough to hold Antiochus as hardy to worke, as at any time before. Wherefore they dealt with one Bolis a Cretan, that was acquainted well with all the waies in the Countrie; and particularly with the by-paths and exceeding difficult passages among those Rockes, whereon the Citie 50 of Sardes stood. Him they tempted with great rewards, which he should recieue at the hands of Ptolemie, as well as of Achæus; to doe his best for performance of their desire. He undertooke the busines: and gaue such like reasons of bringing all to good effect, that they wrote vnto Achæus by one Arianus a trustie messenger; whom Bolis found meanes to conueigh into the Citie. The faith of these Nego-

tritors Achæus held most assured. They also wrote vnto him in priuie characters, or Ciphers, wherewith none faue he and they were acquainted: whereby hee knew, that it was no fained deuice of his Enemies, in the name of his friends. As for the messenger, he was a true friend, and one whom Achæus found, by examination, heartily affected vnto the fide. But the Contents of the Epistle, which were, That he should be confident in the faith of Bolus, and of one Cambylus whom Bolus had wonne vnto the businesse, did somewhat trouble him. They were ment to him vnknewne: and Cambylus was a follower of Antiochus; vnder whom he had the command of those Cretans, which held one of the Forts that blocked vp the Castle of Sarjen. Neuerthelesse other way to escape he saw none, than by putting himselfe to some aduerture. When the messenger had therefore passed often to and fro: it was at length concluded, that Bolus himselfe should come to speake with Achæus, and conduct him forth. There was none other than good faith meant by any of the rest, saue only by Bolus and Cambylus, which were Cretans, and (as all their Countymen, some few excepted, haue bene, and still are) false knaues. These two held a consultation together, that was, as Polybius obserues it, rightly Cretus: neither concerning the latitude of him whose deliuerance they undertooke, nor touching the discharge of their owne faith; but only how to get molt, with least adoe and danger to themselves. Briefly they concluded, That first of all they would equally labe between them ten Talents, which they had already receiued in hand: and then, That they would reueale the matter to Antiochus, offering to deliuer Achæus vnto him, if they might be well rewarded both with present monie, and with promise of consideration answerable to the greatnesse of such a seruice, when it should be dispatched. Antiochus hearing this promise of Cambylus, was no lesse glad; than were the friends of Achæus well pleased with the comfortable promises of Bolus. At length when all things were in readinesse on both sides, and that Bolus with Arianus was to get vp into the Castle, and conueigh Achæus thence: Hee first went with Cambylus to speake with the King, who gaue him verie priuate audience; and confirmed vnto him by word of mouth the assurance of his liberrall promises. And after that, putting on the countenance of an honest man, and of one that was faithfull vnto Ptoleme whom he long had serued, Hee accompanied Arianus vp into the Castle. At this coming thither, Hee was louingly entertained; yet questioned at large by Achæus, touching all the weight of the businesse in hand. But hee discouered so well, and with such grauitie, that there appeared no reason of distrustfull cyther his faith or judgment. Hee was an old Souldier, had long bene a Captain vnder Ptoleme, and did not thrust himselfe into this businesse; but was invited by honorable and faithfull men. He had also taken a safe course, in winning (as it seemed) that other Countymen of his: who kept a Fort that stood in their way; and thereby had already sundrie times, giuen safe passage and repassage vnto Arianus. But against all these comfortable hopes, the importance of so great an aduerture stirred vp some diffidence. Achæus therefore dealt wisely, and said, That hee would yet stay in the Castle a little longer; but that he meant to send away Bolus three or foure of his friends, from whom when hee receiued better aduertisement, concerning the likelihood of the enterprise, then would hee issue forth himselfe. Hereby hee tooke order, not to commit himselfe wholly vnto the faith of a man vnknewne. But, as Polybius well notes, Hee did not consider that hee paid the Cretian with a man of Crete: which isto say, That hee had to doe with one, whose knaueerie could not be avoided by circumspection. Bolus and Cambylus had laid their plot thus, That if Achæus came forth alone, then should hee easily be taken by the ambush prepared for him: if he were accompanied with many of his friends, then should Arianus be appointed to lead the way, as one that of late had trodden it oft; and Bolus following behind, should haue an eye vpon Achæus, to prevent him not onely from escaping in the tumult, but from breaking his owne necke, or otherwise killing himselfe: to the end that being taken aliue, Hee might bee to Antiochus the more welcome Present.

* Among these few I doe not except one, calling himselfe Euthanes Iohn Arianus, a Cretian: who in one of his late humilitie-like, when hee vnderthrew our King, Religion, and Countrey, with all the good & worthy men of whom hee could learne the names, haue by inferring my name, twice belied me; in calling mee a Puritan, & one that haue bene dangerous vnto my Soueraigne. Let vs in honour to bee fillogen of by dissimulation support of Treasons, and Archbishops of Lies in regard whereof I may not denie him the commendation of Cretianisme no lesse voluminous, than hee in multiplicitie of name is beyond any the Cretian in consideration of times, that were slouies Lyes, could hee, and slay belies, & Polybius.

sent. And in such order came they now forth: Arianus going before as Guide; the rest following, as the way serued, and Bolus in the Rear. Achæus was none acquainted with his purpose, till the verie instant of his departure. Then signified he the matter to his wife Ladias; and comforting her with hope as well as hee could, appointed foure of his especiall freinds to beare him companie. They were all disguised: and one of them alone tooke vpon him to haue knowledge of the Greeke tongue; speaking and answering, as need should require, for all, as if the rest had bene Barbarians. Bolus followed them, craftily deuiling vpon his businesse, and much perplexed. For (saith Polybius) Though hee were of Crete, and prone to surmise any thing to the mischeife of another: yet could hee not see in the darke, nor know which of them was Achæus, or whether Achæus himselfe were there. The way was verie vnecase, and in some places dangerous; especially to those that knew it not. Wherefore they were faine to staie in diuers places, and helpe one another vp or downe. But vpon every occasion, they were all of them verie officious toward Achæus, lending him their hands, and taking such care of him, as easily gaue Bolus to vnderstand, that he was the man: and so by their vnseasonable dutie, they vndid their Lord. When they came to the place where Cambylus laie in wait; Bolus whittled, and presently claped Achæus about the middle, holding him fast that hee should not stirre. So they were all taken by the ambush, and carried forthwith to Antiochus: who sat vp watching in his Paviilion, expecting the euent. The sight of Achæus, brought in bound vnto him, did so astonish the King; that he was vnable to speake a word, and anon brake out into weeping. Yet was hee before informed of the plot, which might haue kept him from admiration: as also the next morning betimes assembling his friends together, Hee condemned Achæus to a cruell death; which argues, that hee was not moued with pittie towards this vnhappie man. Wherefore it was the generall regard of calamities, incident vnto great fortunes, that wrung from him these teares: as also the raritie of the accident, that made both him and his friends to wonder: though it bee so, that such a course as this of his, in employing two mischeiuous knaues against one Traitor, doth not rarely succeed well; according to that Spanish Prouerbe, Aun traydor delo alusofo. The death of Achæus brought such astonishment vpon those which held the Castle, that afterwards they gaue vp the place and themselves vnto the King; whereby hee got entire possession of all to him belonging in the lesser Asia.

Some yeres passed after this, ere Antiochus was redie for his Expedition against the Parthians, and Hyrcanians. The Parthians were a little Nation of obscure beginnings, and commonly subiect vnto those that ruled in Media. In the great shuffling for Provinces after the death of Alexander, the Government ouer them was committed by Antipater to one Philip, a man of small regard: shortly they fell to Eumenes: then to Antigonus; and from him, together with the Medes, to Selucus: vnder whose posteritie they continued vntill the Reigne of Selucus Callinicus, being ruled by Lieutenants of the Syrian Kings. The lustfull insolence of one of these Lieutenants, together with the misfortune of Callinicus, that was vanquished and thought to bee slaine by the Gauls; did stirre vp Asiæ, a Noble man of the Countrey, to seeke reuenge of injuries done, and animate him to rebell. So he slew the Kings Lieutenant; made himselfe King of the Parthians, and Lord of Hyrcania; fought prosperously with those that disturbed him in his beginnings; andooke Selucus Callinicus prisoner in battaile, whom he royally entertained, and dismissed. Hereby hee wanne reputation as a lawfull King: and by good government of this Countrey, procured vnto himselfe such loue of his subiects, that his name was continued vnto his Successors; like as that of the Ptolemies in Egypt, and that of the Cæsars afterwards in Rome. Much about the same time the Bactrians rebelled: though these at length, and all belonging vnto the Selucida beyond Euphrates, encreased the Parthians Dominion. Now Antiochus went against them with so strong an Army, that they durst not meet him in plaine field; but kept themselves in Woods, or places of strength, and de-tended the Streights and passages of Mountaines. The resistances they made auilled them not. For Antiochus had with him so great a multitude, and so well fortified, as hee needed not to turne out of the way, from those that lay fortified against him, in Woods and Streights betwene their Mountaines; it being ealie to spare out of to great a number, as many as itching a compass about, might cyther get about the Enemies hands; or come behind, and charge them on the backe. This did hee often employ against them his light ar mature: wherewith hee caused them to dislodge, and gae way vnto his Phalanz; vpon which they durst not adventure themselves in open ground. Asiaces, the second of the name, (for his father was dead before this) was then King of Parthia: who though hee was confident in the fideltie of his owne subiects, yet feared to encounter with so mightie an Inuader. His hope was, that the bad wayes, and deserts, would haue caused Antiochus, when he was at Ecbatane in Media, to giue ouer the iourne without proceeding much further. This not so falling out, He caused the Wels and Springs in the Wildernesse, through which his Enemie must passe, to bee dammed vp and spoiled. By which meanes, and the resistance before spoken of, when he could not preuaile, He withdrew himselfe out of the way: suiting the Enemie to take his pleasure for a time, in wasting the Countrey; wherein, without some victorie obtained, hee could make no long abode. Antiochus hereby found, That Asiaces was nothing strongly provided for the warre. Wherefore hee marched through the heart of Parthia: and then forward into Hyrcania; where he wanne Tambrace the chiefe Citie of that Province. This indignitie and many other losses, caused Asiaces at length, when hee had gathered an Armie that seemed strong enough, to adventure a battaile. The issue thereof was such, as gaue to neither of the Kings hope of accomplishing his desires, without exceeding difficultie. Wherefore Asiaces craued peace, and at length obtained it: Antiochus thinking it not amisse, to make him a friend, whom Hee could not make a subiect.

The next Expedition of Antiochus, was against Euthydemus King of the Bactrians; one that indeed had not rebelled against him or his Ancestors, but hauing gotten the Kingdome from those that had rebelled, kept it to himselfe. With Euthy-demus hee fought a battaile by the Riuer Arins, where hee had the victorie. But the victorie was not so greatly to his honour; as was the testimonie which hee gaue of his owne priuate valour, in obtaining it. He was thought that day to haue demeaned him more courageously, than did any one man in all his Armie. His Horse was slaine vnder him; and hee himselfe receiued a wound in his mouth, whereby hee lost some of his teeth. As for Euthydemus; He withdrew himselfe back into the further parts of his Kingdome, and afterwards protracted the Warre, seeking how to end it by composition. So Embassadors passed betwene the Kings: Antiochus complaining, That a Countrey of his was vniuilly vsurped from him; Euthydemus answering, That he had wonne it from the children of the Vsurers; and further,
That the Bactrians, a wild Nation, could hardly be retained in order, saue by a King of their owne; for that they bordered vpon the Scythians, with whom if they should ioyne, it would be greatly to the danger of all the Provinces that lay behind them.
These allegations, together with his owne wearinesse, pacified Antiochus; and made him willing to grant peace vpon reasonable Conditions. Demetrius, the sonne of Euthy-demus, being a goodly Gentleman, and employed by his father as Embassador in this Treatie of peace; was not a little auaileable vnto a good conclusion. For Antiochus liked him so well, that hee promised to giue him in marriage one of his owne daughters; and therewithall permitted Euthydemus to retaine the kingdome; causing him neuertheless to deliuer vp all his Elephants; as also to binde himselfe by oath, to such Countenances as he thought requisite.

So Antiochus leauing the Bactrian in quiet, made a iourne ouer Caucasus, and came to the borders of India: where he renewed with Sophagisenus, King of the Indians, the Societie that had bene betwene their Ancestors. The Indians had remained

mained subiect vnto the Macedonians, for a little while, after Alexanders death. Eumenes in his Warre against Antigonus, rayled part of his forces out of their Coun-trie. But when Antigonus after his victorie turned Westward, and was ouer-busied in a great ciuill Warre: then did one Sandrocottus, an Indian, stirre vp his Countrimen to Rebellion; and taking himselfe their Captaine, and taking vpon him as Protector of their libertie. This Office and Title hee soone changed, though not without some contention, into the Name and Maieutie of a King. Finally hee got vnto himselfe, (hauing an Armie of fixe hundred thousand men) if not all India, yet as much of it as had bene Alexanders. In this Estate hee had well confirmed himselfe, ere Seleneus Nicator could find leisure to call him to account. Neyther did He faint, or humble himselfe, at the coming of Seleneus: but met him in field, as readie to defend his owne; so strongly and well appointed, that the Macedonian was contented, to make both peace and affinitie with him, taking onely a reward of fiftie Elephants. This League, made by the Founders of the Indian and Syrian kingdomes, was continued by some Offices of loue betwene their children, and now renewed by Antiochus: whose number of Elephants were increased thereupon, by the Indian King, to an hundred and fiftie: as also he was promised, to haue some treasure sent after him; which hee left one to receiue. This parted these two great Kings.
Neyther had the Indians, from this time forwards, in many generations, any businesse worthe of remembrance with the Westerne Countreies. The polkitrie of Sandrocottus, is thought to haue retained that kingdome vnto the daies of Augustus Cesar: to whom Porus, then reigning in India, sent Embassadors with Presents, and an Epistle written in Greece: wherein, among other things, Hee said, That Hee had command ouer fix hundred Kings. There is also found, scattered in sundrie Authors, the mention of some which held that kingdome, in diuers Ages, euen vnto the time of Constantine the great: being all peradventure of the same race. But Antiochus, who in this Treatie with Sophagisenus carried himselfe as the worthier person, receiuing Presents; and after marched home through Drangiana and Carmania, with such reputation, that all the Potentates not onely in the higher Asia, but on the hither side of Taurus, humbled themselves vnto him, and called him The Great: saw an end of his owne Greatnesse within few yeares ensuing, by presuming to stand vpon points with the Romans; whose Greatnesse was the same in deed, that his was onely in seeming.

§. III.

The last reigne of PTOLEME PHILOPATOR in Egypt: with the tragick end of his successors, when he was dead. ANTIOCHUS prepares warre on the young child PTOLEME EPIPHANES, the sonne of PHILOPATOR. His resolution in preparing for diuers warres at once. His Voyage toward the Hellespont. Hee seeks to be amitie with the Romans, who make friendly liues to him: intending nevertheless to haue warre with him. His doings about the Hellespont; which the Romans made the first ground of their quarrell to him.

His Expedition being finished; Antiochus had leisure to repose himselfe awhile, and studie which way to conuert the terror of his pusillance, for the enlargement of his Empire. Within two or three yeares Ptoleme Philopator died: leaving his sonne Ptoleme Epiphane, a young Boy, his successor in the kingdome; wnikely by him to bee well defended, against a neighbour so mightie and ambitious. This Ptoleme surnamed Philopator, that is to say, louer of his Father, is thought to haue had that surname giuen him in meere derision; as hauing made away both his Father and Mother. His young yeares, being newly past his childhood when hee beganne to reigne; may

may seeme to discharge him of so horrible a crime, as his Fathers death: yet the beallinesse of all his following life, makes him not vnlike to haue done any mischiefe, whereof he could be accused. Hauing wonne the battaile at Maphia, He gaue himselfe ouer to sensualitye; & was wholly gouerned by a Strumpet called Agathoeles. At her instigation Hee murdered his owne wife and siller, which had aduentured herselfe with him, in that only dangerous Action by him vnderaken and performed with honor. The Lieutenant-ships of his Prouinces, with all Commands in his Armie, and Offices whatsoeuer, were wholly referred vnto the disposition of this Agathoeles, and her brother Agathoeles, and of Oenanthe a filthie flaued that was mother vnto them both. So these three gouerned the Realme at their pleasure, to 10 the great greife of all the Countrey, till Philopator died: who hauing reigned seuen-teene yeares, left none other sonne than Ptolemie Epiphanes a childe of fye yeares old, begotten on Arinoe that was his siller and wife. After the Kings death; Agathoeles beganne to take vpon him, as Protector of young Epiphanes, and Gouernour of the Land. He assembled the Macedons (which were the Kings ordinarie forces in pay, not all borne in Macedonia, but the race of those that abode in Egypt with Ptolemie the first, and would not be accounted Egyptians; as neyther would the Kings themselves) and bringing forth vnto them his siller Agathoeles, with the yong King in her armes; beganne a solemne Oration. He told them, That the deceased father of this their King, had committed the child into the armes of his siller, but vnto the 20 faith of them: on whose valliant right hands, the whole state of the Kingdome did now relie. He besought them therefore that they would bee faithfull, and, as great need was, defend their King against the treason of one Tropelemus, an ambitious man, who traiterously went about to fet the Diademe vpon his owne head, being a meere stranger to the Royall blood. Herewithall hee produced before them a witnesse, that should iustifie his accusation against Tropelemus. Now though it were so, that he deliuered all this with a fained passion of sorrow, and counterfeiting of teares: yet the Macedons that heard him, regarded not any word that hee spake; but stood laughing, and talking one to another, what a shamelesse dissembler he was, to take so much vpon him, as he knew not how greatly he was hated. And so brake vp the 30 Assembly: Hee that had called it, being scarce aware how. Agathoeles therefore, whom the old Kings fauour had made mightie, but neyther wile nor wel qualified; thought to goe to worke, as had formerly bene his manner, by vying his authoritie, to the suppression of those that he distrusted. Hee hailed out of a Temple the mother-in-law of Tropelemus; & callt her into prison. This filled Alexandria with rumors, and made the people (though accustomed to suffer greater things, whilst they were committed in the old Kings name) to meet in knots together, and vtter one to another their mindes; wherein they had conceived extreme hate, against these three pernicious misgouernours of the old King. Besides their consideration of the present iniurie done to Tropelemus, they were somewhat also moued with feare of 40 harme, which, in way of requitall, Tropelemus was likely to doe vnto the Citie. For He was, though a man most vnapt for Gouernment, as afterwards hee proued; yet no bad Souldier, and well beloued of the Armie. It was alio then in his power, to stop the prouision of vituals which was to come into Alexandria. As these motives wrought with the people: so by the remedie which Agathoeles vied, were the Macedons more halilly, and more violently thrust vnto vproue. Here secretly apprehended one of their number, whom he suspected of conspiracie against him; and deliuered him vnto a follower of his owne, to be examined by torture. This poore souldior was carried into an inner roome of the Palace and there stripped out of all his apparel to be tormented. But whilst the whippes were brought forth, and all things euen in a readinesse for that purpose: there was brought vnto the Minister of Agathoeles, a sad report of Tropelemus his being at hand. Hereupon the Examiner, and his Torturers, one after another, went out of the roome; leauing Moerogenes the Souldior alone by himselfe, and the doores open. Hee perceiving this, naked as he

he was, conuighed himselfe out of the Palace, and got vnto the Macedonians, of whom he found some in a Temple thereby at dinner. The Macedonians were as fierce in maintenance of their Priuiledges, as are the Turkes Janizars. Being assured therefore that one of their fellows had thus bene vied; they fell to Armes in a great rage, and beganne to force the Palace: crying out, That they would fee the King, and not leaue him in possession of such a dangerous man. The whole multitude in the Citie, with lowd clamours, made no lesse adoe than the Souldiors, though to lesse effect. So the old Bawd Geanthe fled into a Temple: her Sonne and Daughter staid in the Court, vntill the King was taken from them; and they, 10 by his permission which hee easily gaue, and by appointment of those that now had him in their hands, deliuered vp to the furie of the people. Agathoeles himselfe was stabbed to death, by some which therein did the office of friends; though in manner of enemies. His siller was dragged naked vp and downe the strectes; as was alio his mother, with all to them belonging: the enraged multitude committed vpon them a barbarous execution of iustice; biting them, pulling out their eyes, and tearing them in peeces.

These troubles in Egypt, scrued well to stirre vp King Antiochus; who had verie good leisure though he wanted all pretence, to make warre vpon yong Ptolemie. Philip of Macedon had the same desire, to get what part he could of the childes estate. But it happened well, that Ptolemie Philopator in the Punick Warre, which 20 was now newly ended, had done many good offices vnto the Romans. Vnto them therefore the Egyptians addrested themselves, and craued helpe against these two Kings: who though they secretly maligned one the other, yet had entred into covenant, to diuide betwene them, all that belonged vnto this Orphan; whose Father had bene Confederate with them both. So M. Lepidus was sent from Rome, to protect from all violence the King of Egypt; especially against Antiochus. As for the Macedonians; Hee was verie soone found bulied, with warre at his owne doores. Alfo Scopas the Etolian, being a Penioner to the Egyptians, was sent into Greece to rayse an Armie of Mercenaries. What Lepidus did in Egypt, I doe not find; and therefore thinke it not improbable, that Hee was sent thither onely one of the 30 three Embassadors,* in the beginning of the Warre with Philip, as hath bene shewed before. As for Scopas; He shortly after went vp into Syria with his Armie: where winning many places, among the rest of his Aets, He subdued the Iewes; who seeme to haue yielded themselves a little before vnto Antiochus, at such time as they saw him prepare for his Warre, and despaired of recceiuing helpe from Egypt. But it was not long, ere all these Victories of Scopas came to nothing. For the verie next year following, which was (according to Eusebius) the same yeare that Philip was beaten at Cyncephala, Antiochus vanquished Scopas in battaile, and recovered all that had bene lost. Among the rest, the Iewes with great willingness returned 40 vnder his obedience, and were therefore by him verie gently entreated.

The Land of Egypt this great King did forbear to invade; and gaue it out, that he meant to bestow a daughter of his owne in marriage vpon Ptolemie: either hoping, as may seeme, that the Countrey would willingly submit it selfe vnto him, if this yong child should happen to miscarrie; or else that greater purchase might be made in the Westerne parts of Asia, which Philip was held ouer-laboured by the Romans. It appears that he was verie much distrusted; hunting (as we say) two Hares at once with one Hound. The quarrels betwene Antiochus, Philip, and the Greekes, promised to alford him great advantage, if he should bring his Armie to the Hellespont. On the other side, the state of Egypt being such as hath bene declared, seemed easie to be swallowed vpon once. One while therefore hee tooke 50 what hee could get in Syria: where all were willing (and the Iewes among the rest, though hitherto they had kept faith with the Egyptians) to yeeld him obedience. Another while, letting Egypt alone, He was about to make inuasion vpon Attalus his Kingdome; yet suffered himselfe easily to be perswaded by the Roman Embassadors, sadors, and desired from that enterprise. Having thus farre gratified the Romans; He sends Embassadors to the Senate, to conclude a perfect amitie betwene him and them. It is not lightly to be overpassed, That these his Embassadors were lovingly entertained at Rome; and dismissed, with a Decree and answer of the Senate, altogether to the honour of King Antiochus. But this answer of the Romans was not sincere; being rather framed according to regard of the Kings good liking, than of their owne intent. They had not as yet made an end with Philip: neither would they gladly be troubled with two great warres at once. Wherefore, not standing much vpon the nice examination of what belonged vnto their honour; they were content to giue good words for the present. In the meane time Antiochus fights with Scopas in Syria: and shortly prepares to win some Townes elsewhere, belonging vnto Ptolemie; yet withall hee sends an Armie Westward, intending to make what profit hee can of the distractions in Greece. Likewise it is considerable, as an argument of his much irresolution, How notwithstanding his attempts vpon both of their Kingdomes, he offered one of his daughters to Ptolemie, and another to Eumenes the sonne of Attalus, newly King of Pergamus: seeking each of their friendships, at one and the same time, when hee sought to make each of them a spoile. Thus was heacting and deliberating at once: being carried with an inexplicable desire of repugnancies; which is a disease of great, and euer-swelling fortunes. Howsoever it was, He sent an Armie to Sardis by Land, vnder two of his owne sonnes: willing them there to slay for him; whilst he himselfe with a Flecte of an hundred Gallies, and two hundred other vessels, intended to passe along by the Coasts of Cilicia and Caria, taking in such places as held for the Aegyptian. It was a notable Act of the *Rhodian*s, that, whilst the war of Philip lay yet vpon their hands, they aduentured vpon this great Antiochus. They sent vnto him a proud Embassage: whereby they gaue him to vnderstand, That if he passed forward beyond a certaine Promontorie in Cilicia, they would meete him and fight with him; not for any quarrell of theirs vnto him; but because hee should not ioine with Philip their enemy, and helpe him against the Romans. It was insolently done of them, neither seemed it otherwise, to prescribe such limits vnto the King. yet he tempered himselfe, and without any shew of indignation gaue a gentle answer; partly himselfe to their Embassadors, partly vnto their whole Citie, by Embassadors which he thither sent. He shewed his desire, to renew the ancient Confederacies betwene his Ancestors and them: and willed them not to be afraid, lest his coming should tend vnto any hurt, either of them, or of their Confederates. As touching the Romans whom they thought that he would molest: they were (he said) his verie good friends; whereof, he thought, there needed no better prooffe, than the entertainment and answer by them newly giuen to his Embassadors.

The *Rhodian*s appeare to haue bene a cunning people, and such as could foresee what weather was like to happen. His answer of the King, and the relation of what had passed betwene his Embassadors and the Senate, moued them not a whit; when they were informed shortly after, that the Macedonian war was ended at the battaile of Cynoscephala. They knew that Antiochus his turne would be next; and prepared to be forward on the stronger side. Wherefore they would not be contented to sit still, vnlesse the Townes on the South Coast of Asia, belonging to Ptolemie their friend and Confederate, were suffered to be at quiet. Herein also they did well; for that they had euer bene greatly beholding, to all the race of the Ptolemies. They therefore, in this time of necessity, gaue what aid they could vnto all the subjects of the Aegyptian in those parts. In like manner did King Eumenes, the sonne of Attalus, prognosticate as concerning the war that followed, betwene Antiochus and the Romans. For when King Antiochus made a freindly offer, to bestow one of his daughters vpon him in marriage: He excused himselfe, and would not haue her. Attalus and Philetarus, his brethren, wondered at this. But he told them, that the Romans would surely make war vpon Antiochus; and therein finally preuaile.

uaile. Wherefore he said, That by abstayning from this affinitie, it should be in his power to ioine with the Romans, and strengthen himselfe greatly with their friendship. Contrariwise, if he leaned to Antiochus: as hee must be partaker in his overthrow; so was he sure to be oppressed by him, as by an ouer-mightie neighbour, if he happened to win the victorie.

Antiochus himselfe wintered about Ephesus: where hee tooke such order as hee thought conuenient, for the reducing of Smyrna and Lampsaes to obedience; that had vsurped their libertie, and oblatinly stroue to maintaine it, in hope that the Romans would protect them. In the beginning of the Spring hee sailed vnto the Hellepont: where hauing won some Townes that Philip had gotten not long before this, hee passed ouer into Europe side; and in short space mastered the Chersonesus. Thence went hee to Lyfimachus: which the Thracians had gotten and destroyed, when Philip withdrew his Garrison thence, to employ it in the Roman warre. The Aetolians convicted as a crime vnto Philip, in the Conference before T. Quintus, that hee had oppressed Lyfimachus, by thrusting therinto a Garrison. Hereunto Philip made answer, that his Garrison did not oppress the Towne, but saue it from the Barbarians: who tooke and sackt it, as soone as the Macedonians were gone. That this answer was good and substantiall, though it were not accepted as such; might appeare by the miserable case, in which Antiochus found Lyfimachus at his coming thither. For the Towne was vtterly razed by the Barbarians; and the people, carried away into slaerie. Wherefore the King tooke order to haue it redified: as also to redeeme those that were in bondage; and to recollect as many of the Citizens, as were dispersed in the Countie thereabout. Likewise hee was careful to allure thither, by hopefull promises, new inhabitants; and to replenish the Citie with the wonted frequency. Now to the end that men should not be terrified from coming thither to dwell, by any feare of the neighbour Thracians: hee tooke a iourne in hand against those barbarous people, with the one halfe of his Armie; leaving the other halfe, to repaire the Citie. These paines hee tooke; partly in regard of the conuenient situation, and former glorie of Lyfimachus; partly for that he thought it highly redounding vnto his owne honour, to recover and establish the dominion in those parts, which his fore-father Seleucus Dictator had won from Lyfimachus, and thereby made his Kingdome of greater extent, than it occupied in any following time. But for this ambition he shall dearly pay: and as after that victorie against Lyfimachus, the death of King Seleucus followed shortly; so shall a deadly wound of the Kingdome founded by Seleucus ensee verie speedily, after the re conquest of the same Countie, which was the last of Seleucus his purchases.

§. IIII.

The Romans hold friendly correspondence with ANTIOCHUS, during their warre with PHILIP: after which they quarrell with him. The doings of HANNIBAL at Carthage: whence he is chased by his enemies, and by the Romans: His flight vnto the King ANTIOCHUS. The Aetolians murmure against the Romans in Greece. The war of the Romans and Achaens, with NABIS the Tyrant of Lacedaemon. The departure of the Romans out of Greece. T. QUINTIVS his Triumphe. Peace denied to ANTIOCHUS by the Romans.

Or the Romans, though they were vnable to smother their desire of war with Antiochus, whereof notice was already taken both by their friends and by their enemies; yet was it much against their will to keepe the rumour on foot, which they meant shortly to make good, of this intended warre, so long as they wanted matter of quarrell; whereof they were furnished, by this enterprise of the Kings about Lyfimachus. It was not long, since King Attalus, a friend and helper of the Romans in their war with Philip, could obtain of them none other help against Antiochus, than Embassadors to speake for him; because the one of those Kings was held no lesse a friend than the other. Neither did there afterwards passe between them any other offices, than verie friendly. Antiochus, at the request of their Embassadors, withdrew his Inuasion from the Kingdom of Pergamus; also verie shortly after he sent Embassadors to them, to make a perfect League of amitie betweene them. This was whilist as yet they were builed with Philip; and therefore had reason to answer his good will with good acceptation: as they did in outward shew. But when the Macedonian war was at an end, and all, or moit of all the States in Greece, were become little better than Clients vnto the Romans: then was all this good correspondence changed, into termes of worke, but more plaine, meaning. For T. Quintus, with his ten Counsaillors sent from Rome, requited (as hath bene shewed before) with a commination of war, this Kings gratulation of their victorie; as also his long-proffered amities, and desire to continue in the same.

These ten Counsaillors were able to informe T. Quintus, and acquaint him with the purpose of the Senate: whereof yet it seemes that he was not ignorant before; since, in regard of Antiochus, he was the more inclinable vnto peace with Philip. It was therefore agreed, when they diuided themselves to make progresse through diuers quarters of Greece for the execution of their late Decree, That two of them should visite King Antiochus; and therest, where occasion serued, vse diligence to make a partie strong against him. Neither was the Senate at Rome vnanimfull of the busines; wherein left T. Quintus, with his ten Assaillants, should happen to forget any thing to their parts belonging; L. Cornelius was sent from Rome of purpose, to deale with the King about those controuersies, that were betweene him and Ptolemie. What other priuate instructions Cornelius had; wee may coniecture by the manning of this his Embassage. For comming to Selymbria: and there vnderstanding that P. Villius and L. Terentius, hauing bene sent by Titus, were at Lysimachia, He halsted thither; whither also came P. Lentulus (another of the ten Counsaillors) from Bargilla, to be present at the Conference. Hegelianax and Lysius were also there; the same, who had lately brought from Titus those peremptorie Conditions, which the Embassadors present shall expound vnto their Master. After a few daies Antiochus returned from his Thracian Expedition. The meeting and entertainment betweene Him and these Romans, was in appearance full of loue. But when they came to treat of the busines in hand; this good mood was quite altered. L. Cornelius, in two or three words, briefly deliuered his errand from Rome: which was, That Antiochus had reason to deliuer backe vnto Ptolemie those Townes of his, whereof he had lately gotten possession. Hereunto he added, and that verie earnestly, That he must also giue vp the Townes of late belonging vnto Philip; and by him newly occupied. For what could be more absurd, than such folly in the Romans; as to let Antiochus enioy the profit of that war, wherein they had laboured so much, and He done nothing? Further He warned the King, that hee should not molest those Cities that were free: and finally He demanded of him, vpon what reason he was come over with so great an Armie into Europe; for that other cause of his iourne there was none probable, than a purpose to make war vpon the Romans. To this the King made answer, That hee wondered why the Romans should trouble themselves, with thinking vpon the matters of Asia: wherewith He praised them to let him alone; euen as He, without such curiositie, suffered them to doe in Italie what they thought good. As for his comming over into Europe: they saw well enough what busines had drawne him thither; namely, the warre against the barbarous Thracians: the rebuilding of Lysimachia, and the recouerie of Townes to him belonging in Thrace and Chersonesus. Now concerning his title vnto that Countrey, He deriued it from Selenus: who made conquest thereof, by his victorie against Lysimachus. Neither was it so, that any of the places in controuersie

betweene him and the other Kings, had bene till of old belonging to the Macedonians or Egyptians; but had bene seized on by them, or by others from whom they receiued them, at such time as his Ancestors, being Lords of those Countiees, were hindred by multiplieitie of busines, from looking vnto al that was their owne. Finally he willed them, neither to stand in feare of him, as if hee intended ought against them from Lysimachia; since it was his purpose to bestow this Citie vpon one of his sonnes, that should reigne therein: nor yet to be grieued with his proceedings in Asia; either against the free Cities, or against the King of Egypt; since it was his meaning to make the free Cities beholding vnto himselfe, and to ioynce ere long with Ptolemie, not only in freindship, but in a bond of neare affinitie. Cornelius hauing heard this, and being perhaps vnable to refute it; would needes heare further, what the Embassadors of Smyrna and of Lampascus, whom he had there with him, could say for themselves. The Embassadors of Lampascus being called in, began a tale; wherein they seemed to accuse the King before the Romans, as it were before competent Iudges. Antiochus therefore interrupted them, and bade them hold their peace; forasmuch as he had not chosen the Romans, but would rather take the Citizens of Libados, to be Arbitrators betweene Him and them.

Thus the Treatie held some few daies, without any likelihood of effect. The Romans, hauing not had their complaints in such sort, as they might be a conuenient foundation of the war by them intended: nor yet hauing purpose to depart well satisfied, and thereby to corroborate the present peace; were doubtfull how to order the matter in such wise as they might neither too rudely, like boisterous Gallio-Greekes, pretend onely the goodnes of their swordes; nor yet ouer-modestly, to retaine among the Greekes an opinion of their iustice, forbore the occasion of making themselves great. The King on the other side was wearie of these tedious guelts; that would take none answer, and yet scarce knew what to say. At length came newes, without any certaine author, That Ptolemie was dead. Hereof neither the King, nor the Romans, would take notice, though each of them were desirous to haue fallen into Egypt: Antiochus, to take possession of the Kingdom; and L. Cornelius, to preuent him thereof, and set the Countrey in good order. Cornelius was sent from Rome Embassador, both to Antiochus and to Ptolemie: which gaue him occasion to take leave, and prepare for his Egyptian voyage. Both He, and his fellow Embassadors, had good leaue to depart all together: and the King forthwith made readie, to be in Egypt with the first. To his sonne Selenus he committed his Armie; and left him to ouer-see the building of Lysimachia: but all his Sea-forces He tooke along with him, and sailed vnto Ephesus. Thence he sent Embassadors to T. Quintus: whom he requested to deale with him in this matter of Peace, after such sort, as might stand with honestie and good faith. But as he was further proceeding on his voyage; He was perfectly informed that Ptolemie was alive. This made him beare another way from Egypt: and afterwards a tempest, with a greiuous shipwracke, made him, without any further attempt on the way, glad to haue safely recovered his Port of Selenus. Thence went he to Antiochia, where he wintered: secure, as might appeare, of the Roman war.

But the Romans had not so done with him. During the Treatie at Lysimachia, (at leastwise not long before or after it) one of their Embassadors that had bene sent vnto the Macedonian gaue him counsaile, as in a point highly tending to his good; Not to rest contented with the Peace which was granted vnto him by the Romans, but to desire societie with them, whereby they should bee bound to haue the same friends and enemies. And this he aduised him to doe quickly before the Warre brake out with Antiochus; lest otherwise he might seeme, to haue awaited some fit occasion of taking Armes againe. They who deale thus plainly, did not meane to be satisfied with weake excuses. In like manner some of the Greekes were solicited; and particularly the Asians, That constantly and faithfully they should abide in the freindship of the People of Rome. It was needefull to say plain-ly ly whereto this entreatie tended: the froward answer made by the Aetolians, declares them to haue well vnderstood the purpose. They complained, that they were not alike honoured by the Romans after the Victorie, as they had bene during the Warre. They that so complained were the most moderate of them. Others cryed out, that they had bene wronged, and defrauded of what was promised vnto them: vpbaying withall the Romans, as men to them beholding; not only for their Victorie ouer Philip; but euen for helping them to set foot in Greece, which else they neuer could haue done. Hereto the Roman gaue gentle answers: telling them that there was no more to doe, than to send Embassadors to the Senate, and vtter their griefes; and then should all be well.

Such care tooke the Romans in Greece, for their Warre intended against Antiochus. The same hereof arriving at Carthage, gaue matter vnto the enemies of Hannibal, wherewith both to pick a thanke of the Roman Senate; and to chace out of their Citie this honourable man, whom they so greatly hated. He had of late exercised his vertue against them in the Ciuill administration; and giuen them an overthrow, or two, in the long Robe. The Iudges at that time bore all the sway in Carthage: holding their places during life; and hauing subiect vnto them, the liues, goods, and fame of all the rest. Neyther did they vse this their power with moderation; but conspired in such wise together, that who so offended any one of them, should haue them all to be his enemies; which being once knowne, He was sure to be soone accused and condemned. In this their impotent rule of the Citie, Hannibal was chosen Prator. By vertue of which Office, though hee was superiour vnto them during that year: yet had it not bene their manner to beare much regard vnto such an annual Magistrate, as at the yeares end must be accomptable to them, if ought were laid vnto his charge. Hannibal therefore sending for one of the Questors, or officers of the Treasurie, to come and speake with him: the proud Questor set lightly thereby, and would not come. For he was of the diuerse Faction to Hannibal; and men of his place, were to bee chosen into the Order of Iudges: in contemplation wherof, he was filled already with the spirit of his future Greatness. But he had not to doe with such a tame Prator, as were they that had occupied the place before. Hannibal sent for him by a Puruiant; and hauing thus apprehended him, brought him into judgement before a publique assemblie of the people. There he not only shewed, what the vndutifull stubbornesse of this Questor had bene; but how vsufferable the insolencie of all the Iudges at the present was: whose vnbrield power, made them to regard neyther Lawes nor Magistrates. To this Oration when he perceiued that all the Citizens were attentive and fauourable; He forthwith propounded a Law, which passed with the generall good liking; That the Iudges should be chosen from yeare to yeare, & no one man be continued in that Office two yeares together. It this Law had bene passed, before he passed ouer Iberus: it would not perhaps haue bene in the power of Hannibal to haue brought him vnto necessitie of reforming another grievance, concerning the Roman Tribute. This Tribute the Carthaginians were faine to leuie by Taxation laied vpon the whole Commonaltie; as wanting monie in their publique Treasurie, wherewith to defray eyther that, or diuers other needfull charges. Hannibal considering this, beganne to examine the publique Reuenues; and to take a perfect note, both how much came into the Treasurie, by wayes and means whatsoeuer; and in what sort it was thence laied out. So he found, That the ordinarie charges of the Common-wealth did not exhaust the Treasurie: but that wicked Magistrates, and corrupt Officers, turning the greatest part of the monies to their owne vse, were thereby faine to load the people with needlesse burdens. Hereof he made such plaine demonstration, that these Robbers of the common Treasurie were compelled to restore, with shame, what they had gotten by knauerie; and so the Carthaginians were freed from the necessitie of making such poore shifts; as formerly they had vsed, when they knew not the valew of their owne Estate. But as the vertue of Hannibal, was highly commended by all that were good Citizens: so they of the Roman Faction, which had, since the making of the peace vntill now, little regarded him, beganne to rage extremely; as being by him tript of their ingotten goods, and il-employed authoritie, both at once, euen when they thought themselves to haue bene in full possession of the vanquished Carthage. Wherefore they sent letters to their friends at Rome: wherein they complained, as if the Barchine Faction grew strong againe, and Hannibal would shortly be in armes. Questionlesse, if oppressing the Citie by iniustice, and robbing the Treasurie, were the only way to hold Carthage in peace with Rome: these enemies to the Barchines might well crye out, That hauing done their best already to keepe all in quiet, they saw none other likelihood than of Warre. But hauing none other matter to alledge, than their owne inuentions: they said, That Hannibal was like vnto a wild beaust, which would neuer be tamed: That secret messages past betwene him, and King Antiochus: and that hee was wont to complaine of idleness, as if it were harmefull to Carthage, with what else to like effect they could imagine. These accusations they directed not vnto the Senate: but addressing their letters craftily, euer vnto the beil of his owne friends at Rome, and such as were Senators; they wrought so well, that neyther publique notice of their Conspiracie was taken at Carthage; nor the authoritie of the Roman Senate, waiting to the furtherance of their malicious purpose. Only P. Scipio is said to haue admonished the Falkers, that they should not thus dishonourably subscribe, and become Seconds to the accusers of Hannibal: as if they would oppress, by suborning or countenancing false witnesses against him, the Man, against whom in warre they had not of long time preuailed, nor vsed their Victorie in such base manner, when they obtained it. But the Romans were not all so great-minded as Scipio: they wished for some such advantage against Hannibal; and were glad to haue found it. Three Embassadors they sent ouer to Carthage, C. Serullus, Q. Terentius, and M. Claudius Marcellus, whose verie names import sufficient caule of bad affection to Hannibal. These hauing past the Sea, were entertained by those that had procured their commings, and being by them instructed how to carrie themselves, gaue out, That they were sent to end some controuersies, betwene the Carthaginians and Masini. But Hannibal had kept such good espiall vpon the Romans, that hee knew their meaning well enough: against which he was neuer vnprepared. It were enough to say, That hee escaped them by flight: but in the actions of so famous a man, I hold it not impertinent to rehearse the particularities. Hauiing openly shewed himselfe, as was his manner, in the place of Assembly, He went forth of the Towne when it beganne to waxe darke, accompanied with two which were ignorant of his determination; though such as hee might well trust. Hee had appointed Horstes to be in readinesse at a certaine place: whence riding all night, Hee came to a Tower of his owne by the Sea-side. There hee had a Ship furnished with all things needfull, as hauing long expected the misfortune of his Countrey, more than his owne. Passing ouer to the Ile of Ceyana, he found there in the Haven some Marchants ships of Carthage. They saluted him respectfully: and the chiefe among them beganne to enquire, whether he was bound. He said, Hee went Embassador to Tyre; and that he intended there in the lland to make a sacrifice; whereto Hee invited all the Merchants, and Masters of the Shippes. It was hote weather: and therefore Hee would needs hold his Feast vpon the shore; where, because there wanted court, Hee made them bring thither all their failes and yards to be vsed in stead of Tents. They did so, and feasted with him till it was late at night: at which time hee left them there allepe, and putting to Sea, held on his course to Tyre. All that night, and the day following, Hee was sure not to be pursued. For the Merchants did neither make halt to send any newes of him to Carthage, as thinking him to be gone Embassador: neyther could they, without some losse of time, such of them as made most speed homeward, get away from Cercina, being busied awhile in fitting their tackle. At Carthage, the misse of so great a person was diuersly confuted. Some ghesled aright, that he was fled. But the more common opinion was, that the Romans had made him away. At length came newes where hee had bin seene: and then the Roman Embassadors, hauing none other errand thither accused him (with an euill grace) as a trouble of the Peace, whereby they onely discovered the mischief by them intended against him, and the malice of their Senate, mistaking the while their purpose, and causing men to vnderstand, that Hee fled not thus without great reason.

Hannibal, coming to Tyre the Mother-Citie of Carthage, was there entertained Royally: as one, in whole great worth and honour the Tyrians, by reason of affinity betweene their Cities, thought themselves to haue intercell. Thence went he to Antioch, and finding the King departed, visited his sonne in Daphne: who friendly welcommed him, and sent him vnto his Father at Ephesus, that exceedingly rejoiced at his coming.

As Antiochus had cause to be glad, in that he had gotten Hannibal: so had the Romans no great cause to be therefore sorrie; otherwise than as they had much disgraced themselves, by discovery of their impotent malice, in chasing him thus out of his Countrey. For it would not proue alke easie vnto this great Commander, to make stout fouldiers of base Asiatiques; as it had bene by his trayning and discipline, to make very seruiciable and skilfull men of Warre of the Spaniards, Africans, Gauls, and other Nations, that were hardie though vnexperienced. Or were it supposed, that one mans worth, especially being so extraordinarie, could alter the nature of a cowardly people: yet was it therewithall considerable, that the vanities of Antiochus, the pride of his Court, the basenesse of his Flatterers, and a thousand other such vexations, would be farre more powerfull in making vnprofitable the vertue of Hannibal, now a desolate and banished man, than had bene the villanie of Hanno and his Complices, hindring him in those Actions wherein he had the high Command, and was seconded by his warlike brethren. Wherefore the name of this Great Carthaginian, would onely helpe to ennoble the Roman Victorie: or if it further serued to hearten Antiochus, and make him lesse carefull to avoid the warre; then should it further serue, to iustifie the Romans in their quarrell. And it seemes indeed, that it was no little part of their care, to get a faire pretence of making warre. For Antiochus, as is said before, hauing newly sent Embassadors to T. Quintius, requiring that the Peace might faithfully be kept: it was not probable, that Hee had any meaning to take armes; vnlesse by meere violence hee were thereto enforced. Onely the Asiatians were greatly suspected, as a turbulent people, desirous of inuasion, and therefore praising with this Great King; whom they wished to see among them in Greece. In this regard, and to appease them; they had of late bene answered with gentle words by one of the tenne Counsaillours, that the Senate would grant them whatsoever with reason they should aske. But this promise was too large, and vndisuiued. For when their Embassadors came to Rome, the Senate would grant them nothings; but wholly referred them to T. Quintius, who fauoured them least. Hereat they murmured, but knew not how to right themselves: otherwise than by speaking such words, as might hasten the Romans out of Greece for very shame; who had no desire to be thence gone.

The daily talk at Rome was of warre with Antiochus, but in Greece, when the Romans would leaue the Countrey. For the Asiatians were wont to vpbraid the rest of the Greekes, with the vaine libertie which the Romans had proclaimed: saying, that these their Deliuerers had laid heauier fetters vpon them, than formerly they did weare; but yet brighter and fairer, than those of the Macedonian: likewise, that it was a gracious act of Titus, to take from the legs of the Greekes their chaine. & tie it about their necks. There was indeed no cause of tarrying longer in Greece, if the Romans had no other meaning than what they pretended For Philip had made no de-

laie, in accomplishment of that which was laid vpon him: all the Townes of Greece were at libertie; and the whole Countrey at peace, both with the Romans, and within it selfe. As for Antiochus: He made it his daily suit, that the Peace betweene him and Rome, such as it was, might be confirmed, and strengthened by a League of more assurance. Neuerthelesse T. Quintius would needs feare that Antiochus meant forthwith to seize vpon Greece, as soone as he and his Armie were thence departed. And in this regard, He retained still in his own hands Chalcis, Demetrias, and the A. exorcisthus: by benefit of which Townes, he might the better withstand the dangerous Inuasion like to be made by Antiochus. Sutable vnto the doings of Quintius were the reports of the tenne Embassadors, that had bene sent out to assist him; when they returned backe into the Citie. Antiochus, they said, would questionlie fall vpon Greece: wherein he should find not onely the Asiatians, but Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedamon, readie to giue him entertainment. Wherefore there was none other way, than to doe somewhat against these their suspected enemies: especially against Nabis, who could worst make resistance; whilst Antiochus was farre away in Syria, and not intencue to his businesse. These reports went not onely current through the Citie, among the vulgar: but found such credit with the chiefe of the Senate, that in the following year, against which time it was expected that Antiochus should be readie to take his great enterprize in hand; P. Cornelius Scipio the African desired, and obtained, a second Consulship, with intention to be General in the Warre, against the King and his Hannibal. For the present, the businesse with Nabis was referred vnto Titus, to deale with him as hee thought good. This would be a faire colour of his longer tarrance in Greece. Therefore he was glad of the employment: whereof also hee knew that many of the Greekes would not be sorrie; though for his owne part, he wanted all good pretence of taking it in hand. For Nabis had entred into friendship with him, two or three years before this, as is already shewed, whilst hee had warre with Philip; and had further bene contented for the Romans sake to bee at peace with the Asiatians, neyther since that time had hee done any thing, whereby hee should draw vpon himselfe this Warre. Hee was indeed a detestable Tyrant, and hated of the Achaians as one, that besides his owne wicked Conditions had formerly done to them great mischief. Titus therefore had a plausible Theme, whereon to discourse before the Embassadors of all the Confederate Cities; which hee caused to meet for that purpose at Corinth. He told them, that in the warre with Philip, not onely the Greekes, but the Romans themselves, had each their motives apart (which hee there briefly rehearsed) that should stirre them vp, and cause them to be earnest. But in this which hee now propounded to them concerning Nabis, the Romans had none other intercell, than onely the making perfect of their honour, in setting all Greece at libertie: which noble Action was in some sort maimed, or incomplete, whilst the noble Citie of Argos was left in subjection to a Tyrant, that had lately occupied it. It therefore belonged vnto them, the Greekes, duly to consider, whether they thought the deliuerance of Argos a matter worthe to be vndertaken; or whether otherwise to avoid all further trouble, they could bee well contented to leaue it as it was. This concerned them, and not the Romans: who in taking this worke in hand, or letting it alone, would wholly be ruled by the Greekes themselves. The Athenian Embassador made answere hereunto verie eloquently, and as pleasing as he could deuiſe. He gaue thanks to the Romans for what was past; exalted their vertues at large; and magnified them highly in regard of this their Proposition: wherein vnrequited they freely made offer to continue that bourse, which at the vehement request of their poore Associates, they had already late extended vnto the Greekes. To this Hee added, That great pittie it was, neare, such notable vertue and high deserts ill spoken of by some: which rose vpon them, out of their owne imaginations to foretell, what harme these their Benefactors meant to doe hereafter: when as Thankfulness rather would haue required an acknowledgment, of the benefits and pleasures already received. Everie one found the meaning of this last clause; which was directly against the Aetolians. Wherefore Alexander the Aetolian wrote vp, and told the Athenians their owne; putting them in minde of their ancient glorie, in those times when their Citie had bene the Leader of all Greece, for defence and recouerie of the libertie generally: from which honour they were now so farre fallen, that they became Parasites vnto those whom they thought most mightie; and by their base assention, would lead all the rest into seruitude. Then spake He against the Achaens, Clients that had bene a long time vnto the Macedonians and fouldiors of Philip, vntill they ranne away from his aduersitie. These Hee said had gotten Corinth, and must now haue warre be made for their fakes, to the end that they might also bee Lords of Argos: whereas the Aetolians, that had first made warre with Philip, and alwayes bene friends vnto the Romans, were now defrauded of some places, anciently to them belonging. Neither did he thus containe himselfe, but objected vnto the Romans fraudulent dealing: forasmuch as they kept their Garrisons in Demetrias, Chaleis, and the Aroecarints, hauing bene alwayes wont to professe, that Greece could neuer be at libertie, whilst those places were not free. Also now at last, what else did they seeke by this discourse of warre with Nabis, than businesse wherewith to find themselves occupied, that so they might haue some seeming cause of abiding longer in the Countrey? But they should doe well, if they meant as they spake, to carrie their Legions home out of Greece: which could not indeed be free, till their departure. As for Nabis, the Aetolians themselves did promise, and would undertake, that they would eyther cause him to yeild to reason, and relinquish Argos freely, withdrawing thence his Garrison; or else compell him by force of Armes, to submit himselfe to the good pleasure of all Greece, that was now at vnitie. These words had bene reasonable, if they had proceeded from better men. But it was apparent, that no regard of the common libertie wrought so much with these Aetolians; as did their owne rancorous desire of oppressing others, and getting vnto themselves, that worse would vie it, the whole Dominion in Greece, which Philip had lost. Neither could they well dissemble this; making it no small part of their greivance, that the old League was forgotten: wherein it had bene covenanted, that the Romans should enjoy the spoile of all, but lesue the Townes and Lands in possession of the Aetolians. This, and the remembrance of a thousand mischiefs by them done in former times, made the whole Assembly, especially the Achaens, cry out vpon them: entreating the Romans to take such order before they went, that not onely Nabis might be compelled to doe right; but the Aetolian theues be enforced to keepe home, and leaue their neighbours in quiet. All this was highly to the pleasure of Titus: who saw, that by discountenancing the Aetolians, He was become the more gracious with all the rest. But whether it pleased him so well, that Antiochus his Embassadors did presently after lie hard vpon him, to draw the peace to some good conclusion, it may be greatly doubted. Hee cast them off with a slight answer: telling them, that the ten Embassadors or Counsaillers which had bene sent vnto him from Rome to be his assistants in these matters of weight, were now returned home; and that, without them, it was not in his power to conclude vpon any thing.

Now concerning the Lacedemonian warre; it was verie soone ended. For Titus vied the hope of all his Confederates; and made as great preparation against Nabis, both by Land and Sea, as if he should haue had to doe with Philip. Besides the Roman forces, King Eumenes with a Naue, and the Rhodian Fleet, were invited to the seruice: as also Philo, of Macedon sent aid by Land; doing therein poorly, whether it were for fauour, or the Roman; or whether to make one among the number, in seeking reuenge vpon Nabis, that had done him iniurie. But the most forward in this Expedition were the Achaens, who set out ten thousand Foot, and a thousand Horse. As for the Aetolians, rather to hold good filiation, and found their dispositions, than in hope to speed, their helpe was required; wherof they excused themselves as well as they thought best. Thus are the Achaens now become the prime friends of the Romans in Greece; hauing remoued the Aetolians from that degree of fauour: like as they themselves hereafter (though not in all haile) shal bee supplanted by the same Lacedemonians, against whom they are now marching.

Some of the Argines more bold than wise, began a conspiracie against the Lacedemonians that held their Towne; meaning to open their gates vnto the Roman. But ere Titus drew neare, they were all detected and slaine: excepting a verie few, that escaped out of the Towne. The fame of this Coniuration, caused the Arme to march apace toward Argos; with hope to bethere, before things were at quiet. But there was no stirre within the Walles: the execution done vpon the first mouers, hauing terrified all the rest of the Citizens. Titus then thought it better, to assault Nabis in the head of his strength at Lacedemon, than to consume time about other places; especially at Argos: for the freedome whereof since the war was made pittie it were, that the calamities of the war should thereon fall most heauily.

Nabis had in readines an Arme of fifteene thousand, wherewith to defend himselfe against these Inuaders. Five thousand of them were Mercenaries: the rest, of his owne Countrey, but such as were of all others the worst, as manumifed slaues, malefactors, and base peasants, vnto whom his Tyrannie was beneficiall. The good and worthy Citizens he stood in doubt: and since he could not hope to win their loue, his meaning was to hold them quiet by feare. He called them all to an Assemblies: and compassing them round in with his Arme, told them of the danger that was toward him and them. If they could agree within themselves; they might, he said, hope the better to withstand the common Enemy. But forasmuch as turbulent heads were incited by light occasions, to raise tumults, and work dangerous treason: it seemed vnto him the safest, and (withall) the mildest course, to assault before hand and put in ward, all those whom he found most reason to suspect. So should he keepe them innocent perforce; and thereby preserve not onely the

Citie and his owne person from danger, but them also from the punishment, which else they might haue incurred. Heereupon he cites and apprehends about fourescore of them; whom he leads away to prison, and the next night puts them all to death. Thus was he sure that they neither should offend, nor yet break loose. As for the death of them, if it should happen to be noised abroad: what could it else doe than terrifie the peoples who must thereby vnderstand, that it was a mortall crime to be suspected? And to the same purpose, his crueltye extended it selfe vnto some poore wretches: whom he accused of a meaning to flie to the Enemy. These were openly whipt through all the streets and slaine. Haueing thus affrighted the Citizens; Hee turned the more freely all his thoughts toward the Enemy, that came on apace. He welcomed them with a sallie: wherein, as commonly happens, the fouldiours of the Towne had the better at first; but were at length repelled with losse. Titus abode not many daies before Sparta: but ouer-ran the Countrey; hoping belike to prouoke the Tyrant forth to battaile. The Roman Fleet at the same time, with King Eumenes and the Rhodians, laid siege vnto Gythium, the onely or principall Hauen-towne that Nabis had. Likely they were to haue taken it by force; when there appeared hope of getting it by treason. There were two Gouernours within the Towne, equal in authoritie: whereof the one, either for feare, or desire of reward, had a purpose to let in the Romans. But the other finding what was in hand, and being somewhat more faithfull, slue the Traitor; after whose death, he himselfe alone made the better defence. Yet when T. Quintius with part of his Arme came thither to Gythium: this Captaine of the Towne had not the heart to abide the vttermost, and await what either Time or his Master might doe for him, but was contented to giue vp the place; yet vpon Condition, to depart in safetie to Sparta with his Garrison. Pythagoras, the sonne-in-law of Nabis, and brother vnto his wife, was come from Argos, whereof he had the Gouernment

with a thousand fouldiors Mercenaries, and two thousand Argives: it being (as may seeme) the Tyrants purpose, to relieue Gythium: which hee thought would haue held longer out. But when they heard that it was lost: then began they to thinke vpon finishing the war, by some reasonable Composition. Pythagoras therefore was sent Embassador to Titus: requesting only, that he would appoint a time and place for Nabis to meet and speake with him. This was granted. In that Parlee the Tyrant spake verie reasonably for himselfe: prouing, that hee suffered wrong, and had done none; and that by many good arguments; whereof the summe was, That whatsoeuer they now did, or could, obiect vnto him, was of elder date than the League which they had made with him. Whereupon he inferred, That neither for his keeping the Towne of Argos, nor for any other cause by them alleged, they ought to make warre vpon him; since Argos, and all other their allegations whatsoeuer, had not hindred them, in time of their more need of him, from entering into that League with him; which was neuer broken on his part, nor ought to be on theirs. But Quintius was not herewith satisfied. Hee charged him with Tyrannie; and gaue instance, as easily he might, of diuers barbarous cruelties by him committed. In all which points, forasmuch as they knew this Nabis to be guiltie, before they made Peace and Confederacie with him; it was expedient, that some other cause of this Inualion should be alleged. Wherefore hee said further, That this Tyrant had occupied Messene, a Towne Confederate with the Romans: That he had bargained to ioyne with Philip, when he was their enemy, not only in League, but also in affinitie: and That his Fleet had robbed many of their ships, about the Cape of Malea. Now touching this Piracie, since in the Articles by Titus propounded vnto Nabis there was no restitution mentioned, other than of ships by him taken from the Greekes his neighbours, with whom hee had long held warre: it may seeme to haue bene obiected, only by way of Complement, and to enlarge the volume of those complaints, that were otherwise verie triuolous. As for Messene, and the bargain of Alliance made with Philip: they were matters foregoing the League, that was made betwene the Romans and this Tyrant; and therefore notto haue bene mentioned. All this it seemes that Aristonius, the Prætor of the Acheans, verie well perceived: who therefore doubting lest the Romans, (that were wont to talke so much of their owne iustice, honour, and faithfull dealing) should now relent, and forbear to molest him, who, though a wicked man, was yet their Confederate, and had neuer done them wrong; framed his discourse to an other end. He entreated Nabis to consider well of his owne estate; and to settle his fortunes, whilset he might doe it without hazard: alleading the examples of many Tyrants that had ruled in the neighbour-cities, & therein committed great outrages; yet were afterwards contented to surrender their Estates, and liued in great security, honour, and happines, as priuate men. Thus they discursed vntill night. The next day Nabis was contented to relinquish Argos; and requested them, to deliver vnto him in writing their other demands, that hee might take counsaile with his friends. The issue of all was, That, in regard of the charges, whereat the Confederates must be, for maintenance of the Tyrant, vpon such Conditions as Titus should thinke meete. Besides the restitution of Argos, and all the places thereon depending; Titus propounded many other Conditions to Nabis, and some of them verie greivous. He would not suffer the Lacedæmonian to haue ought to doe in the Ile of Crete, no, nor to make any Confederacies, nor war, either in that Iland or elfewhere; not to build any Towne or Castle vpon his owne lands; not to keepe any other shipping, than two small Barkes; besides many other troublesome iniunctions; with imposition of an hundred talents in siluer to be paid out of hand, and sicke talents yearly, for eight yeares next ensuing. For obseruance of these Couenants he demanded siue hostages, such as he himselfe should name; and one of them to be the Tyrants owne sonne. If it had bene the meaning of Titus, to withdraw the war from Nabis, because it was not grounded vpon iustice: then had it been enough, if not more than enough, to take Argos from him; which hee himselfe did other, though it were for feare, to deliuer vp. But if it were thought reasonable, to dispense a little with the Roman faith, in regard of the great benefit which thereby might redound vnto the state of their best freinds in Greece, by the extinction of this Tyrannie: then should this enterprize, when once it was taken in hand, haue bene prosecuted vnto the verie vtmost. As for this middle course which the Romans held: as it was not honourable vnto them, to enrich themselves by the spoile of one that had not offended them: nor pleasing to the Acheans, who iudged it cucr after a great blemish to the noble acts of Titus: so did it minister vnto the Ætolians, and to such as curiously pried into the faults of those which tooke vpon them to be Patrons of Greece, no barren Subiect of malicious discourse. For since Philip, a King, and defendend of many famous Kings, might not be suffered by these Malteries Romans, to hold any one of those Countries or Townes in Greece, that had belonged vnto his Ancestors: it was thought verie strange, that Lacedæmon, once the most famous Citie among all the Greekes, was by the same Romans left in possession of a Tyrant, that had vltured it but yesterday: and Hetheret in rooted by their authority, as their freind and Confederate. Nabis on the other side thought himselfe vnder mercifully dealt withall, by the selfe-same Romans: whose amitie hee had preferred in time of a doubtfull warre, before the loue and affinitie of the Macedonian King, that had committed the Citie of Argos into his hands. But fallily had hee dealt with the Macedonian: and fallily was hee dealt with by those to whom hee did betake himselfe. Among these Articles propounded, there was nothing that pleased him, saue only that for the banished Lacedæmonians, (of whom a great number were in the Roman Campe; hauing among them Agelipolis the naturall King of Sparta, that being a yongchild was driuen out by Lycurgus, the first of the Tyrants) there was made no provision, to haue them restored vnto their Citie and Estates; but only leaue required for as many of their wiues, as would be so contented, to liue abroad with them in banishment. Wherefore he forbore to giue consent vnto these demands: and sustained an assault or two, hoping belike that the enemies would soone be wearie. But his fearefull nature shortly ouercame the resolution, which the sense of these iniuries had put into him. So yielding vnto all that had bene propounded, hee deliuered the hostages; and thereupon obtained peace, that was confirmed afterwards at Rome by the Senate and People. From this time forward, hee thought the Romans more wicked than himselfe; and was readie vpon the first advantage, to doe them all mischief that he could.

The Argives had heard newes that Lacedæmon was euen at point of being taken. This erected them, and gaue them heart to thinke vpon their owne good. So they aduentured to set vpon the Garrison, which was much weakened, by the remoue of the three thousand carried thence by Pythagoras, to helpe the Tyrant at Sparta. There needed vnto their libertie no more, than that all of them ioyntly should set their hands to the getting of it, which no sooner they did than they obtained it. Presently after this came T. Quintius to Argos, where he was joyfully welcomed. He was deferuently acknowledged as author of that benefit, whereon the Citizens had laied hold without staying for him: and that he might the better entitle himselfe thereto, hee caused the libertie of the Argives to be proclaimed at the Nemean games; as ratifying it by his authority. The Citie was annexed againe to the Council of Achaia; whereby the Acheans were not more strengthened, than the Argives themselves were secured from danger of relapse, into the same extremities out of which they had newly escaped.

After this, Titus found little busines or none wherewith to set on worke his Armie in Greece. Antiochus was about to send another Embassage to Rome, desiring peace and friendship of the Senate. Things being therefore in appearance who

ly disposed vnto quiet, Scipio the African, that was chosen Consul at Rome, could not haue his desire, of being sent Commander into Greece. The vniuersall meaning of Aniochus, and the tumultuous disposition of the Asiatians, were held as considerations worthe of regard: yet not sufficient causes of making Warre. Neither appeared there any more honest way, of confuting the Asiatians, and of thoroughly perswading all the Greekes (which was not to be neglected, by those that meant to assure vnto themselves the Patronage of Greece) that the good of the Countrey, was their soiet intent: than by withdrawing thence their Legions, and leaving the Nation vnto it selfe, till occasion should be ripe, and call them ouer again. Wherefore after Titus had spent a Winter there, without any matter of employment, eyther found, or at anie neare distance appearing, he called an Assembly of Delegates, from all parts of Greece to Corinth: where hee meant to bid them farewell. There he recounted vnto them all that had passed since his coming into those parts; and willed them to value the Roman friendship, according to the difference of estate, wherein the Romans found and left them. Hereto he added some wholesome counsaile; touching the moderate vse of their libertie, and the care which they ought to haue of liuing peaceably, and without faction. Lastly hee gaue vp Acrocorinthus to the Achaians; withdrawing thence the Roman Garrison, and promising to doe the like (which verie soone hee did) at Chalcis and Demetrias; that so it might bee knowne, what liers the Asiatians were, who had accused the Romans, of a purpose to retaine those places. With joyfull acclamations did the Greekes testifie their good liking of that which Titus had said and done: as also (at his request) they agreed, to ranforme and enlarge all Romans, that had bin sold into their Countrey by Hannibal.

Thus Titus crowned his actions in Greece with an happie end: and by leaving the Countrey before his departure was vrged, left therein behind him the memorie of his vertue and benefites, vntrainted by jealousie and suspition of any euill meaning. At his coming to the Citie, He had the honour of a Triumph; which was the goodliest of all that Rome had vntill that day beheld. Three dayes together the shew of his pompe continued: as being set out with the spoiles of a Countrey, more abundant in things worthe of such a spectacle, than any wherein the Romans had before made Warre. All sorts of Armes, with Statues and curious peeces of Brasse or Marble, taken from the Enemie, were carried in the first dayes Pageant. The second day, was brought in, all the treasure of Gold and Siluer: some in the rind: Masse vnwrought; some, in diuerse sorts of Coine; and some, in Vessels of fundrie kinds, that were the more highly prized by the workmanship. Among these were tenne shields, all of Siluer; and one of pure Gold. The third day Titus himselfe entered the Citie in his Triumphant Chariot. Before him were carried an hundred and foure Crownes of Gold, bestowed vpon him by diuerse Cities. There were also led the beards for Sacrifices the Prisoners, and the hostages: among which, Demetrius the sonne of King Philip, and Armenes the sonne of Nabis, were principall. After him followed his Armie; and (which added much grace, and good hearing, to the shew) the Roman Captiues, by his procurement redeemed from slaue in Greece.

Not long after his Triumph, He procured audience of the Senate for many Embassages, that were come out of Greece and Asia. They had all verie fauourable answers, excepting those of King Antiochus: whom the Senate would not heare, but referred ouer to T. Quintius, and the tenne that had bene his Counsaillers; because their businesse was said to be somewhat intricate. Hereat the Kings Embassadors wondered. They said vnto Titus and his Associates, That they could not discern wherein consisted any perplexitie of their message. For all Treaties of peace and friendship, were either betwene the Victor and the vanquished; betwene those, that hauing warred together were vpon equal termes of aduantage; or betwene those that had liued alwaies in good agreement, without any quarrell. Vnto the Victor, they said, that the vanquished must yeeld; and patiently endure the

the imposition of some Coucnants, that else might seeme vnreasonable. Where Warre had bene made, and no aduantage gotten: there was it vsuall to demand and make restitution, of things and places claimed, gotten, or lost; accordingly as both parts could agree. But betwene those which had neuer fallen out, there ought no Conditions of establishing friendship to bee propoed: since it was reasonable, that each part should hold their owne; and neyther carrie it selfe as superiour vnto the other, in prescribing ought that might be troublesome. Now of this last kind, was the League and friendship that had bene so long in conclusion, betwix Antiochus and the Romans. Which being so: they held it strange that the Romans should thus insult on points no way concerning them, and take vpon them to prescribe vnto the King, what Cities of Asia he should set at libertie; from what Cities they would giue him leaue to exact his wonted Tributes; eyther putting, or not putting, his Garrisons into them, as the Senate should thinke fit. Hereto Quintius answered, That since they went so distinctly to worke, He would also doe the like. Wherefore he propounded vnto them two Conditions, and gaue them their choice whether to accept: Eyther that it should be lawfull for the Romans, to take part in Asia with any that would seeke their friendship; Or, if King Antiochus misliked this, and would haue them forbear to meddle in Asia, that then Hee should abandon whatsoeuer he had gotten in Europe. This was plaine dealing; but no reasonable nor pertinent answer, to that which the Kings Embassadors had propounded. For if the Romans might be hired to abstaine from Asia, by the gift of all that Antiochus had lately wonne in Europe: then did not the affaires of Smyrna, Compsanus, or any other Asiatique, whome they were pleased to reckon as their Confederates, bind them in honour to make warre with a King that sought their loue, and had neuer done them iniurie. But they knew very well, that Antiochus could not without great shame be so base, as to deliuer vp vnto them the Citie of Ephesus, whereon of late hee had bin at so much cost; in building it vp even from the foundations, and repossessing it with inhabitants, that had all bene dispersed, or captiue to the Barbarians. And so much the Embassadors with great indignation alleged: saying, that Antiochus desired friendship of the Romans; but so, as it might stand with his honour. Now in point of honour, the Romans tooke vpon them as if their cause were farre the superiour. For it was, they said, their purpose, to set at libertie those Townes, which the King would oppresse and hold in subiection: especially since those Townes were of Greeke blood and language; and fell in that regard vnder the patronage, which Rome had afforded vnto all Greece besides. By this colour they might soone haue left Antiochus King of not many subiects on the hither side of Euphrates. Neyerther did they forbear to say, That, vnlesse he would quit what he held in Europe, it was their meaning not onely to protect those which relied vpon them in Asia, but therein to make new Alliances: namely (as might be vnderstood) with such as were his subiects. Wherefore they vrged his Embassadors to come to a point, and tel them plainly which of these two Conditions their King would accept. For lacke of a pleasing answer, which the Embassadors could not hereto make, little wanted of giuing presently defiance to the King. But they suffered themselves to bee entreated, and were contented once againe to send ouer P. Vilius, and others that had bene already with the King at Ephesus; by whom they might receiue a small answer, whether these demands made by Quintius and his Associates would be accepted, yea, or no. By this respect of time, and the fruitlesse Treaties ensuing, Antiochus got the leisure of two yeares, or thereabouts to prepare for warre; finding in the Romans, all that while, no disposition to let him liue in peace.

Of the long Warres which the Romans had with the Gaules, Ligurians, and Spaniards. Of M. PORCIVS CATO. Injuries done by MASSANISSA to the Carthaginians: that sue to the Romans for iustice.

He Insulbrians, Boijans, and other of the Cisalpine, Gaules, together with the Ligurians, made often, and (in a manner) continuall warre vpon the Romans in Italie, euen from such time as Hannibal and his brother Mago departed thence, vntill such time as they themselves were vtterly subdued: which was not, before the Romans were almost at the height of their Empire. These Nations, hauing serued vnder Mago for wages, and afterwards hauing gotten Amilcar a Carthaginian, to be Leader vnto them all, as hath bene already shewed; by this their fellowship in Armes, grew to be such willing partakers each of others fortune, that seldom afterwards cyther the Gaules or Ligurians did stirre alone, but that their companions, hearing it, were readie to second them. How the Romans first preuailed, and got large possessions in Gallia Cisalpine now called Lumbar die; it hath bene long since rehearsed, betwene the first and second Punic Warres. As also it hath since appeared, how they lost the greatest part of their hold in that Countrey, by means of Hannibal his passage there-through. Neyther is it likely that the reconquest would haue bene more difficult or tedious vnto the Romans, than was the first purchase: if besides the greater employments which they had of their Armies abroad, their forces appointed vnto this warre had not bene distracted by the Ligurians; that alwayes made them to proceed warily, hauing an eye to the danger at their backs. The Ligurians were a stout Nation, light and swift of bodie; well practised in laying ambushes, and not discouraged with any ouerthrow, but forthwith readie to fight againe. Their Countrey was mountainous, rough, woodie, and full of streight and dangerous passages. Few good Townes they had; but many Castles, exceedingly well fortified by nature: so as without much labour, they could neyther bee taken nor besieged. They were also verie poore, and had litle or nothing that might giue contentment, vnto a victorious Armie that should spoile their Land. In these respects they serued excellently well, to traine vp the Roman Souldiours to hardnesse and militarie patience: reaching them (besides other exercises of warre) to endure much, and liue contented with a litle. Their quarrell to Rome, grew partly from their loue vnto the Gaules, their neighbours and companions; partly from their delight in robbing and spoiling the Territorie of their borderers, that were subiect vnto Rome. But their obstinate continuance in the Warre which they had begunne, seemes to haue bene grounded vpon the Condition of all Saluages, To be friends or foes, by custome, rather than by Iudgment: and to acknowledge no such vertue in Leagues, or formall conclusions of Peace, as ought to hinder them from vying their advantage, or taking reuenge of injuries when they returne to minde. This qualitie is found in all, or most of the West-Indians: who, if they be demanded a reason of the Warres betwene them and any of their neighbours, vse commonly this answer, it hath still bene the custome for vs and them, to fight one against the other.

Diuers ouerthrowes, though none that were great, these Ligurians gaue vnto the Romans: but many more, and greater, they receiued. Often they fought peace, when they found themselves in distresse; and brake it againe as often, when they thought profitable so to doe. The best was, that as their Countrey was a good place of exercise vnto the Romans, so out of their own Countrey they did litle harme

The Countrey of Spaine, as it was the first part of the Continent out of Italie that became subiect vnto the Romans: so was it the last of all their Provinces, which was wholly and thoroughly by them subdued. It is likened in figure by some Geographers vnto an Oxe hide; and the Romans found in it the propriete of that Oxe hide, which Calanus the Indian shewed vnto the Great Alexander, as an Embleme of his large Dominions. For, treading vpon any side of it, the further parts would rise from the ground. And thus was it with Spaine. Seldome did it happen, that those parts, from which the Roman Armies lay furthest, were not vp in rebellion. The Spaniards were a verie hardie Nation, and easily stirred vp to armes; but had not much knowledge in the Art of warre, nor any good Captaines. They wanted also (which was their principall hinderance) good intelligence among themselves: and being diuided into many small Signories, that had litle other communion than of language, they seldome or neuer prouided in generall for the common good of their Countrey; but made it their chiefe care, each of them to looke vnto their owne Territorie. Such private respects made them often to fall asunder; when many had vnited themselves together, for chasing out of the Romans. And these were the causes of their often ouerthrowes: as desire of libertie, rather than contempt of any wrong done to them, was the cause of their often taking armes.

The Carthaginians had bene accustomed, to make euacuation of this Cholericke Spanish humour, by employing, as Mercenaries in their warres abroad, those that were most likely to be vnquiet at home. They had also taken souldiours from one part of the Countrey, and vled them in another: finding meanes to pay them all, out of the profits which they rayfed vpon the whole Countrey; as being farre better husbandes, and of more dexteritie than were the Romans, in that kind. But contrariwise the Romans, vying the seruice of their owne Legions, and of their sure friends the Latines, had litle businesse for the Spaniards; and therefore were faine to haue much businesse with them. Spaine was too farre distant, and withall too great, for them to send ouer Colonies thither, whereby to hold it in good order, according to the course that they tooke in Italie. Wherefore it remained, that they should alwayes maintaine such Armies in the Countrey, as might leaue to hold it in obedience perforce; and such heedfull Captaines, as might be still readie to oppose the Barbarians in their first Commotion. This they did: and thereby held the Countrey; though seldome in peace.

Verie soone after the departure of Scipio, there was raised warre in Spaine against the Romans, euen vpon the same generall ground, that was the foundation of all the Spanish warres following. It was thought vnreasonable, that the Spaniards should one while helpe the Carthaginians against the Romans, and another while the Romans against the Carthaginians; busily forgetting to helpe themselves against those that were strangers, yet vsurped the Dominion ouer them. But the forces which Scipio had left behind him in that Countrey, being well acquainted with the manner of warre in those parts, suppressed this Rebellion by many victories: and, together with subiection, brought peace vpon the Countrey; which lasted five yeares. This Victorie of the Romans, though it happily ended the warre: yet left it still remaining the cause of the warres, which after five yeares brake out againe. The Spaniards fought a battaile with the Roman Proconsul, whom they slew, and had a great Victorie, that filled them with greater hopes. Yet the happy successe of their Warres in Greece, made the Romans thinke it enough to send thither two Pretors, and with each of them some two Legions. These did somewhat: yet not so much, but that M. Porcius Cato, who was Consul the yeare following, and sent into that Prouince, found at his coming litle left to doe, than the reconquering of all Spaine. But it fell out happily, that all the Spaniards were not of one minde: some were faithfull to Rome, and some were idle beholders of the paines that that others tooke. Yet when Cato had wonne a great Victorie vpon the chiefe of them they rose against him in many parts of the Countrey, and put him to much new trouble. Whilſt he was about to make a iourne againſt thoſe that were as yet vnſubdued: ſome of the lately vanquiſhed, were euen readie to rebell. Hee therefore diſarmed them: which they tooke ſo heauily, that many of them ſlew themſelves for grieue. Hearing of this, and well vnderſtanding, that ſuch deſperation might worke dangerous effects; Hee called vnto him the principall among them, and commending vnto them peace and quietneſſe, which they neuer had diſturbed but vnto their own great loſſe, Hee praied them to deuiſe what courſe might be take, for holding them aſſured vnto Rome, without further trouble. None of them could, or would giue counſaile in a matter of this nature. Having therefore talked with them once or twice, and finding their inuention barren in this kind of Subiect; He gaue expreſſe charge, That vpon a day appointed they ſhould throw downe the wals of all their Townes. Afterwards hee carried the Warre about from place to place; and with ſingular induſtrie finiſhed it in ſhort time. Neyther thought he it any diſgrace to him or to Rome, in this time of danger, to imitate the Carthaginians, and dire an Armie of the Celiberians, againſt other of their Countreymen: excuſing the indignitie, ſuch as it ſeemed, with a ſelf, That if he were vanquiſhed and ſlaine, then ſhould hee need to pay them nothing; whereas if he had the Victorie, hee could pay them with the Enemies monie. Finally Hee brought the Warre to ſo good end, that in long time after, though Spaine were often trouble ſome, yet was it in no danger of being loſt. Hee increaſed alſo the publike Reuenues in that Province, by cauſing ſome Mines of Iron and Silver to bee wrought, that had before laine vnregarded. Herein hee did benefit the Common-wealth, by a vertue much agreeable to his owne peculiar diſpoſition.

For this M. Cato was not onely verie notable in the Art of War, which might well be termed The Occupation of the Romans; but ſo well furniſhed with all other vſeful qualities, that verie lite was waſting in him, which might ſeem requiſite to the accompliſhment of a perfect man. He was verie ſkilful in the Roman Lawes, a man of great Eloquence, and not vnprofitable in any buſines eyther priuate or publike. Many Books he wrote: whereof the principal were of the Roman antiquities, and of huſbandrie. In matter of huſbandrie he was notable, and thereby molt increaſed his ſubſtance, being of meane birth, and the firſt of his Houſe. Strong of bodie he was, and exceeding temperate: ſo as hee liued in perfect health to verie old age. But that which molt commended him vnto the better ſort of the Romans, was his great ſinceritie of life, abſtinance from bribes, and faſhioning himſelfe to the ancient laudable Cuſtomes of the Citie. Herein hee had merited ſingular commendations; if the vehemencie of his nature had not cauſed him to maligne the vertue of that Noble Scipio the African, and ſome other wortheie men; that were no leſſe honeſt than himſelfe, though farre leſſe rigid, and more gallant in behaviour. Otherwiſe, Hee was a verie good Citizen, and one of ſuch temper, that hee could faſhion himſelfe to all occaſions; as if he neuer were out of his Element. He loved buſineſſe ſo well, or rather hated vice ſo earneſtly, that euen vnto the end of his life, Hee was exerciſed in defending himſelfe, or accuſing others. For at the age of foureſcore and fix yeares, Hee pleaded in his owne defence: and foure yeares after, hee accuſed Sergius Gallus vnto the People. So beganne the Nobilitie of Cato his family, which ended in his great grandchild M. Cato the Pſeicon: one, that being of like vertue and frugencie, had all his good purpoſes daſt, and was finally wearied out of his life, by men of ſuch Nobilitie and greatneſſe as this his Anceſtor had continually vexed.

The Spaniſh Warres, after Cato his departure out of the Countrey, though they were not verie dangerous, yet were they many; and the Countrey ſeldome free from inſurrection, in one part or other. The Roman Pretors therefore, of which two euerie yeare were ſent ouer Commanders into Spaine (that was diuided into two euerie yeare were ſent ouer Commanders into Spaine (that was diuided into two Governements) did rarely faile of ſuch worke, as might afford the honour of Triumph. One ſlew thirtene thouſand Spaniards in a battaile: another tooke ſix Townes; and a third enforced many States of the Countrey to ſue for peace. Thus euerie one of them, or moſt of them, did ſome laudable ſervice; yet ſo, that commonly there were of men, townes, and people, new that rebelled, in ſtead of the old that were ſlaine, taken, or reclaimed. At the cauſes hereof I haue already pointed: and therefore thinke it enough to ſay, That the buſineſſe in Spaine required not the employment of a Roman Conſul, from ſuch time as Cato thence departed, vntill the Numidian Warre brake out; which was verie long after.

In all other Countreies to the Weſt of the Ionian Seas, the Romans had peace: but ſo had not the Carthaginians. For when Hannibal was gone from them, and that the enemies of the Barthine Houſe promiſed al felicitie which Rome could grant, vnto themſelves and their obedient Citie: Masaniſſa ſet to diſputing with the ſword, about the title to the beſt part of their Lands. Hee beganne with Emporia, a fruitfull Region about the leſſer Syrtis: wherein among other Cities was that of Leptis, which daily paid a Talent vnto Carthage for Tribute. This Countrey the Numidian challenged; and by winning ſome part of it, ſeemed to better his claime vnto the whole. Hee had a great aduantage: for that the Carthaginians might not make any Warre, without leaue obtained from their Maſters the Romans. They had none other way of redreſſe, than by ſending to Rome their Complaint of his doings. And ſurely they wanted not good matter to alledge, if the Iudges had bene vnpartiall. For beſides that Scipio, in limiting cut vnto them their bounds, had left them the poſſeſſion of this Countrey, Masaniſſa himſelfe; now verie lately, purſuing a Rebelle that fled out of his Kingdome, deſired leaue of the Carthaginians, for himſelfe to paſſe through it in his way to Cyrene: thereby acknowledging (had it otherwiſe bene queſtionable) that the Countrey was theirs. This notwithstanding, Masaniſſa had wherewith to juſtifie his proceedings; eſpecially vnto the Roman Senate. Hee gaue the Fulbers to vnderſtand by his Embaſſadors, what faithleſſe people the Carthaginians were, and how it affected to the State of Rome.
<sup>37</sup> There had lately bene ſent vnto them from Hannibal one, that ſhould perſwade them to take part with Antiochus. This man they had examined, vpon ſome ſuſpition of his errand; yet neyther aſſailing him nor his ſhipps, had thereby afforded him meanes to eſcape. Hence the Numidian concluded, That certainly it was their purpoſe to rebell; and therefore good policie to keepe them downe. As for the Countrey of Emporia; it had alwaies, hee ſaid, bene theirs, that were able to hold it by ſtrong hand: and ſo belonged ſometimes vnto the Numidian Kings; though now of late it was in poſſeſſion of the Carthaginians. Put if truth were knowne: the Citizens of Carthage had no verie warrantable title, vnto any more ground, than that whereon their Citie ſtood; or ſcarcely to ſo much. For they were no better than ſtrangers in Aſiack, that had gotten leaue there to build vpon ſo much ground, as they could accompaſſe with an Oxe-hide cut into ſmal thongs. Whatſoeuer they held without ſuch a compaſſe, was purchaſed by fraud, and wrongfull encheatments. This conſidered, Masaniſſa requereſt of the Senate, That they would not adjudge vnto ſuch vſurpers; the Countrey ſometimes appertaining to the Anceſtors of him their aſſured friend. The Romans hauing heard theſe allegations on both ſides, found the matter ſo doubtfull, that they could not on the ſudden tell what to determine. Wherefore becauſe they would doe nothing raiſhly, they ſent ouer three Embaſſadors; of whom P. Scipio the African was one and the chiefe, to decide the controuerſie: yet ſecretly giuing them
<sup>40</sup> inſtructions, to leaue all as they found it, without making any end one way or other. The Embaſſadors followed their directions, and left all doubtfull. So was it likely, that Masaniſſa with a ſtrong Armie ſhould quickly proue, againſt thoſe that could no more than talke of their right, and exclaime againſt the wrong. By ſuch arts were the Carthaginians held, not onely from ſtirring in fauour of King

Antiochus,

Antiochus, if they had thereto any disposition; but were prepared by little and little vnto their finall destruction: that came vpon them, when the Romans had leasure to expresse the vtmost of their hatred.

§. VI.

The Ætoliens labour to prouoke ANTIOCHVS, PHILIP, and NABIS, to warre vpon the Romans; by whom they hold themselves wronged and disgraced. NABIS besiegeth Gytheum, and wasteth some part of Achaia. The exact skill of PHILOPOEMEN, in advantage of ground: whereby hee utterly vanquisheth NABIS. ANTIOCHVS being denied peace by the Romans, ioynes with the Ætoliens. The Ætoliens surprize DEMETRIAS; and by killing NABIS their confederate seize vpon Sparta. But they are driven out by the Citizens: who at PHILOPOEMEN his persuasions annex themselves to the Achæans.

AL Greece being at peace, and the Roman Armies thence departed: it grieved much the Ætoliens to thinke, that they who had promised vnto themselves the whole spoile of Philip, and the highest reputation among the Greekes; were not only disappointed of their couctous hopes, but quite forsaken by their ancient dependants; and of all other the most vnraged. Yet was there made a great access to their Estate; by adding much vnto them, of that which had bene taken from the Macedonians. This might haue well sufficed them, if their desires had not bene immoderate; and their indignation, more vehement, than their desire. But they were not so pleased with that which they had, since they thought it no more than part of their due, as they were vexed with the deniall of that which they claimed, and with finding themselves to be wholly disleeemed, wherein they thought that they had vniuertable wrong. Wherefore they deuided, in a Parliament which they shortly held, by what meanes they best might right themselves; and giue the Romans a sorrowfull knowledge of the difference, betwene their enmitie and friendship. To this purpose they soone agreed, as concurring all in one affliction, That they would not only perswade Antiochus to make warre vpon the Romans, as one to whom the Romans had long refused peace; but that they would deale with the King of Macedon their ancient Enemie, and with Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedemonia, to ioyne all together in a new Confederacie: whose ioynt forces could not in all likelihood but farre surmount those of the Romans, Achæans, Rhodiens, and King Eumenes, with all that were of their Faction. This was a great enterprize, which the Ætoliens tooke in hand; and well becoming them, for they were great darers. They sent Embassadors to all these Kings, with persuasions as they thought most forcible. But Philip was irresolute; and Antiochus willing to trie first all other courses. Nabis the Lacedemonian, who neither (as Philip) had lost much, nor (as Antiochus) was in feare of any warre; yet shewed himselfe of all other the most forward: and not playing so much as to fecke any good pretence, beganne immediately to lay siege to Gytheum, that had bene lately taken from him by the Romans. The Achæans, to whose care chiefly Titus this departure had commended the affaires of Peloponnesus, were not slow to admonish Nabis of his dutie: neither would they haue flained long from repressing his violence by open war, had not some of them thought it wisdom to aske counsaile of the Romans, and particularly of T. Quintus, before they engaged themselves in a businesse of such importance. Whilest thus they spent the time in sending Embassadors, and were aduised by Quintus to let all alone, and to wait for the coming of the Roman forces that would shortly be amongst them: Nabis was bold to giue them iust cause of complaint, by wasting their owne Territories.

Philopomen was then Prætor of the Achæans, who had long bene absent in Cretæ making making war there for his mudes lake and recreation. Vnto him the Achæans referred themselves, giuing him leaue to order the war at his pleasure; either flying vntill the Romans came; or doing other wise, as he should thinke best. He made all hait to relieue Gytheum, by Seas; leaving lesse the Towne, and the Achaian Garrison within it, should be lost, if hee vied any delay. But Philopomen was so bad a Seaman, that he knew not a strong Ship from a rotten. He made a Quadrimere Gallie his Admirall, that had foure score yeares agoe bene counted a gallant vessel, in the Naue of Antigonus Gonatas. Neither was the rest of his Fleet so good, as might encounter with that of the Lacedemonian. Onely it fell out well, that he committed himselfe to a light Pinnace or Brigantine, that fought better with her wings, than with her talions. For his Admirall Gallie was steeamed at the first; and being rotten with age, sprang so many leakes, and tooke in water so fast, that the was faine to yeeld without further resistance. When the rest of the Fleet saw what was become of their Admirall; all were presently discouraged, and saved themselves with what speed they could. But Philopomen was not likewise daunted. If hee had failed in Sea-furies, which was none of his Occupation; Hee said that hee would make amends by Land. The Tyrant withdrew part of his Armie from the siege of Gytheum, to stop the Achæans; if they should invade his Countre. But vpon these which were placed in guard of Laonia, Philopomen came unexpected, fired their Campe; and put all, save a verie few of them, to the sword. Then marched he with all his Armie towards Lacedemonia: within ten mile whereof he was, when the Tyrant met him, that had already taken Gytheum. It was not expected that Nabis would haue bene ready for them so soone. Or if hee shoud come from Gytheum, with any part of his forces: yet was it thought that hee wuld overtake them, and charge them in Rere. They marched therefore almost securely, in a long Troupe reaching some fiew miles; hauing their Horse and the greatest part of their Auxiliaries at their backs to beare off any sudden impression. But Nabis, who formerly understood, or at least suspected, what course they would take: appeared in the front of them with all his Armie, encamped there where they meant to haue lodged. It was the custom of Philopomen, when hee walked or trauelled abroad with his friends, to make the situation of the Countre about him, and to discourse, what might befall an Armie marching the same way. Hee would suppose, That hauing with him there such a number of souldiours, ordered and forced in such manner, and marching towards such a place; he were vpon that ground encountered by a greater Armie, or better prepared to the fight. Then would hee put the question, whether it were fit for him to hold on his way, retire, or make a stand? what peece of ground it were meete for him to seize vpon? and in what manner he might best doe it in what fort he should order his men? where bestow his Carriages, and vnder what Gard? in what fort encampe himselfe? and which way march the day following? By such continuall meditation Hee was growne so perfect, that hee neuer met with any difficultie, whence hee could not explicate himselfe and his followers. At this time he made a stand: and hauing drawne vp his Reare, Hee encamped neare vnto the place where hee was; within halfe a mile of the Enemie. His baggage, with all thereto belonging, he bestowed on a Roke, encompassing them round with his souldiours. The ground was rough, the waies bad, and the day almost quite spent, so as Nabis could not at the present greatly molest him. Both Armies were to water at one Brooke, whereto the Achæans lay the nearer. This watering therefore was like to minister the first occasion of skirmish. Philopomen understood this; and layd an ambush in place convenient; wherinto the Mercinaries of Nabis fell, and were slaughtered in great numbers. Presently after this, because one of his owne Auxiliaries to goe to the Tyrant, as a fugitive, and tell him, that the Achæans had a purpose to get betwene him and Lacedemonia, whereby they would both debarre his returne into the Citie, and withall encourage the people, to take armes for the recouerie of their freedome. The Tyrant hearing this, marched hastily away; and left his Campe, which hardly otherwise would haue bene forced. Some Companies he made to stay behind, and shew themselves vpon the Rampart, thereby to concale his departure. But Philopemen was not so to be beguiled. He easily won the Campe; and gaue chase to Nabis: whose followers being ouertaken, had no courage to turne about and make head. The Enemies being thus disperfed, and fled into Woods, where they lay in couert all that day; Philopemen conceiued aright, that their feare and needefull would teach them to creepe homewards, and saue themselves, when it grew darke. Wherefore in the Euening, when he had gathered together all those of his Light-armature, which had followed the chase whilst it was day; He led forth the rest that had well refreshed themselves, and occupied the two most ordinarie passages vnto Lacedamon. So Nabis his men, when it was darke night, perceiving in Philopemen Campe great fiore of lights; thought that all had bene at rest: and therefore aduentured to make an escape home. But they were so way-laid, that hardly one quarter of them got into Sparta. Thirtie daies together alter this, did Philopemen wait the Countreie round about, whilst Nabis durst not issue forth of his Towne; and then returned home, leauing the Tyrant in a manner without forces.

The Roman Embassadours were then in Greece, and T. Quintius among them; labouring to make their partie strong against Antiochus & Nabis, whom they knew to be solicited by the Aetolians. Verie faire countenance they also made vnto Philip; and with comfortable promises drew him to make shew, whatsoever hee thought, of good correspondence. They promised to restore vnto him his fornie: and were contented to let him hope, that hee should recieue other fauours at their hands; and regaine possession of many places, by them taken from him. Thus did the Romans prepare for war against Antiochus in Greece; whilst their Embassadours that were with him in Asia, denied otherwise to grant him peace, than if he would yeelde vnto one of the Conditions, by them so often propounded. The long absence of this King in Syria, where he had accomplished the marriage betwene Ptolemie and his daughter: together with the death of yong Antiochus the Kings son, which happened during the Treatie, and hindered, or seemed to hinder the King, from giuing audience in person to the Embassadours; caused them to returne home to Rome; as vncertaine of their answer as at their setting forth. One thing that might haue bene, and partly was, beneficial vnto them, they brought to passe during their abode at Ephesus; either by cunning, or (as Luie rather thinks) by chance. Finding Hannibal there, they discoursed often with him, and blamed him for hauing thus fled vnto Antiochus, vpon a causelesse suspicion wherein hee held the Romans: that honoured his vertue, and intended him no harme. Many haue affirmed that P. Scipio was one of these Embassadours; and that he, among other discourses with Hannibal, demanded once, Which of all the famous Captaines that had liued, Hannibal iudged the most worthie? So Hannibal gaue to Alexander of Maceden the first place: to Pyrrius the second: and the third he challenged vnto himselfe. But Scipio who thought his owne title better, than that it ought to be so forgotten: asked yet further, What wouldst thou haue said then Hannibal, if thou hadst vanquished mee? To whom the Carthaginian replied, Then would not I haue giuen the first place to Alexander, but haue claimed it as due vnto my selfe. Now whether this were so, or otherwise: the often and freindly conference of Hannibal with the Roman Embassadours, made him suspected of Antiochus: who therefore did so beare awaile to vse his counsell. Yet afterwards, when Hannibal perceiued this change in the King: and plainly desiring him to tell the cause thereof, heard what it was; He easily recovered his former grace, and credit. For he told how his Father had caused him to sweare at the Altars, when hee was a little boy, That hee neuer should be freind vnto the Romans. Wherefore he willed the King not to regard any vaine surmises:

mises: but to know thus much, That as long as hee thought vpon war with Rome, so long would Hannibal doe him all good seruice: whereas contrariwise if he intended to make peace, then should it behoue him to vse the counsaile of some other man.

The Aetolians, and their freinds, were no lesse busie all this while, in making their partie strong against the Romans: than were the Romans, in multering vp their freinds in Greece. They had so often dealt with Antiochus, vinting much of their owne forces, and arrogating to themselves the honour of the victorie against Philip; that finally they preuailed with him: especially when the Roman Embassadours had left him, without hope of peace, vniuerselle he would buy it at too deare a rate. They dealt in like sort with the Macedonians. But in vaine. Hee vnderstood the Romans, and himselfe, too well. Wherefore it concerned them to improoue their owne forces to the vtmost: as knowing, that all the burthen must lie vpon Antiochus and themselves, without helpe from any; saue only from some few that were discontented in Greece. Whilst they were about this, and had with them an Embassadour of the King, Antiochus that animated them to resolution: the Athenian Embassadours, whom Titus had requested to be at their meeting, stayed their vehemencie a little; by exhorting them, not to conclude rashly, without first hearing the Romans, that lay neere at hand. For want of a readie answer hereto they were contented to approve the motion. Titus hearing this, thought the busines worthe of his presence. For since Antiochus had now declared himselfe against the Romans: it would be no small peece of seruice, to with-draw from his freindship, those by whose encouragement he had made the aduerture. Wherefore he came to their Panathenium, or Great Assemblies of the Nations; where he forgot nothing that might serue to appease them. Hee willed them to consider the weight of the enterprize which they tooke in hand, whereby Greece was like to become a Champaigne-field, on which, to the ruine of the Countreie, the Romans, and King Antiochus, that commanded no small part of the World, should fight for the Maisterie: the Aetolians, as Matters in that kind of Fence, setting them on, and becoming the Steklers. As for those grieuances which did thus exasperate them, and vrge them to such violent courses, He willed them to consider how light they were, and how much better they might doe to send Embassadours to Rome, that should either plead their right in the Senate, or (if their right vnto the places which they claimed, were not good) make request to haue what they desired: than thus to let the world in an vprore, and be afterwards the first that should repent it. But what hee said or could say, it skilled not much. They had already done ill, to make the Embassadour of the King, whose helpe they had sought, wait so long for an answer, and say doubting what good end they should make with the Romans. Neither was it newes vnto them to heare those comfortable words, That, by sending to Rome, they might happen to obtaine what they desired; either at their right, or else by way of fauour. For with such termes had they bene fastid once already: and were by the Senate reiecte vnto Titus: who, hauing it in his owne power, gaue them no satisfaction; yet would now againe referre them to the Senate. This was onely losse of time, and might abate their credit with Antiochus. Wherefore without more ado they made a Decree, That King Antiochus the great should be entreated to come oute to Greece, as well to set the Countreie at libertie, as also to decide the contencencies depending betwene the Romans and Aetolians. Such a Decree they would not haue made, had they not vnderstood the Kings minde before. Hauing made it, they forgot no point of brauerie, whereby to vnt themselves to the Kings Embassadours, and against the Romans. Titus desired of their Prator, to let him see a Copie of this new Decree. The Prator answered, That then he had other things to doe: but that this Decree, & their further answer, they would shortly let him know, if he came to their camp in Italie vpon the riuer of Tiberis. Gentler words would haue done done better as the Ætolians are like to vnderstand herafter. But hauing thus begun, they meant henceforth to goe roundly to worke. The care of the war they referred vnto the more priuate Council of their Nation; that no occasion might slip, in waiting for the authoritie of a generall Assemblie. The Apelates (so were the Priuie Council of Ætolia called) went as hotly to worke, as any of the yongell heads could haue done. They laid a plot, how to get into their lands: at one time the Townes of Chalcis, Demetrias, and Sparta: to each of which they sent men for their purpose. Demetrias they tooke vpon the sudden: entering, some of them as friends to conduct home a principall man of the Citie: who for speaking words against T. Quintus, had bene driuen to flee thence, but was, by intercession of those that loved him, againe recalled. His Ætolian companions that were not many, seized vpon a Gate: wherat they let in a Troup which they had left not far behind them; and so fell to murdering the chiefe of the Roman faction. At Chalcis they sped not so well. Thither also they had a banished man to bring home: but they came too strong, that their purpose was discovered, and the Towne prepared to defend it selfe against them. Being therefore demanded the cause of this hostilitie, they gaue a gentle answer: saying, That they came not thither as enemies, but onely to deliver the Towne from the Romans: who more insolently dominated ouer it, than neuer the Macedonians had done. By such Rhetorike they prevailed no more, than they could doe by plaine force. For the Towne's men replied, That they neither found any abridgement of their libertie, nor needed any Garrison to keepe them from the Romans; from whom they neither feared any danger, nor received iniurie. So this busines was dashed. The attempt vpon Sparta was more strange and desperate. Nabis their good friend, was Lord of the Towne: styling himselfe King; but, more truly, by all men called Tyrant. He had well-near lost all, by meanes of the ouerthrow which Philopoemen had lately given him: since, he durst not stirre abroad; and daily expected the mischance, that on all sides threatned him. Wherefore he sent messengers, one after other, to the Ætolians: requesting them, That as He had not bene slow to stirre in their behalfe, but aduertured himselfe vpon the vermouth of danger, when all others were backward; so they would be pleased to send him what helpe they might, since his bad fortune had caused him presently to need it. It hath bene often said, That the rauenous Ætolians were onely true to themselves, & regarded neither faith nor friendship otherwise than as it might conduce to their owne ends. And so dealt they now. For since Nabis his mercinarie forces, which vpheld his Tyrannie, to put him out of the way; and, by so doing, to disfigure Lacedæmon vnto themselves. To this purpose, they sent thither Alexamenus, one whom they thought a man fit for such a worke. To him they gaue a thousand Foot, and thirtie Horse, chosen for the purpose. The thirtie were by Danaocrates the Prætor brought into the Council of the Apelates, where they were commanded to be no wiser than they should be, nor to thinke that they were sent to make war with the Acheans, or to doe ought else, save onely what Alexamenus should command them: which were it neuer so desperate, and in seeming against all reason; yet must they vnderstand, that vntill they performed it, they should haue no good welcome home. So Alexamenus came to the Tyrant, whom he encouraged with brave wordes: telling him, that Antiochus was already in Europe, and would be anon in Greece, meaning to cover all the Land and Sea with his mightie Armies; and that the Romans were like to finde other manner of work, than of late with Philip: since the Elephants of this great King, without other helpe, would suffice to tread them downe. As for the Ætolians, He said, that it need should so require, they would presently send away to Lacedæmon all the forces that they could raise: But that they were verie desirous at the present, to make as goodlie a muster as they could before the great King; which caused them to send him thither afore with no greater companie. Hereupon he willed Nabis to take hearty birth forth his men, that had bene long pent vp in the Citie; and traine them without the wals: as if shortly he should employ them in work of conquest, rather than defence. Nabis was glad of this: and daily exercised his men in the field; riding vp and downe with his Alexamenus, and no more than three or foure horse about him, from one point to another, to order and behold them. During this time of exercise, Alexamenus made it his fashion to step aside alone to his Ætolians, and say somewhat as he thought fit: which done, he still returned againe to Nabis. But when he saw time for this great worke that he had in hand: Hee then went aside to his thirtie Horsemen, and bad them remember the taske enioyned them at their setting forth; telling them that they were all in case of banished men, vntill they would anon come vp to him, and helpe him to finish that which they should see him take in hand. Herewithall the Tyrant beganne to draw neare them: and Alexamenus making towards him, charged him on the sudden, and struck him down. The thirtie Ætolians neuer stood to deliberate vpon the matter: but all flew in; and, before any succour could arriue, had made an end of this wretched Nabis. Presently vpon the fact committed, the Tyrant his Mercinaries ranne vnto the dead bodie: where in stead of seeking reuenge they stood foolishly gazing as beholders. Alexamenus with his Ætolians halted into the Citie, and seized on the Palace: where hee fell to ransacking the Treasurie; and troubled himselfe with none other care, as though all were already done. Such of his followers as were dispersed in the Towne, did also the like; with the greater indignation of the Citizens: who seeing themselves free by the death of the Tyrant, could not endure to see those that had slaine him, beginne to tyrannize anew. Wherefore all the Towne was shortly in Armes: and for lacke of another Captaine, they tooke a little Boy of the Royall stocke, that had bene brought vp with Nabis his children; whom they mounted vpon a Good Horse, and made him their chiefe: So they fell vpon the Ætolians that were idly stragling about; and put them all to the sword. Alexamenus with not many of his Companie, were slaine in keeping the Citadell: and those few that escaped thence into Arcadia, were taken by the Magistrats; who sold them all as bond-slaves. In this doubtfull Estate of things at Lacedæmon, Philopoemen came thither: who calling out the chiefe of the Citie, and speaking such words vnto them, as Alexamenus should haue done after hee had slaine the Tyrant; easily perswaded them for their owne good and safetie, to incorporate themselves with the Acheans, Thus by the enterprise, no lesse dishonourable than difficult, of the Ætolians, and the small but effectuell, traualle of Philopoemen; the Acheans made a notable purchase: and Lacedæmon, that had hitherto bin gouerned eyther by Kings, or by Tyrants that called themselves Kings, became the member of a Common-wealth; wherof the name had scarce any reputation, when Sparta ruled ouer all Greece.

§. VII.

ANTIOCHVS, perswaded by THOAS the Ætolian, comes ouer into Greece, ill attended. Sandrie passages betweene him, the Ætolians, Chalcidians and others. Hee winnes Chalcis and thereby the whole Ile of Euboea. The vanitie of the Kings Embassadors and the Ætolians, with the Ciuil answer of TITVS to their discourse, before the Achaens. That it concerned the Greekes to haue desired peace, betwene the Romans and ANTIOCHVS, as the best assurance of their owne libertie. Of many petite Epistates that fell to the King. Of AMINANDER, and an idle vanitie, by which King PHILIP was lost. HANNIBAL giues good counsaile in vaine. Some Townes wonne in Thessalie. The King retires to Chalcis; Where hee marieth a young Wife, and reuels away the rell of Winter. Vpon the coming of the Roman Consul all forsake ANTIOCHVS. Hee with two thousand Ætolians keeps the Streights of Thermopylae. Hee is beaten, and flies into Asia: leaving all in Greece vnto the Victors.

ANTIOCHVS was troubled much in Asia with Smyrna and Lampsaen, that would not hearken to any Composition. He thought it neither safe nor honourable, to leaue them Enemies behind him; and to winne them by force, was more than hitherto he was able. Yet was hee desirous with all speed conuenient to shew himselfe in Greece; where he had bin told, that his presence would effect wonders. It was said, That in all the Countrie there was a verie small number, which bore heartie affection vnto the Romans: That Nabis was alreadie vp in Armes: That Philip was like a Bandog in a chaine, desiring nothing more than to breake loose; and that the Ætolians, without whom the Romans had done nothing, nor nothing could haue done, were readieto conferre vpon him the greatnesse, which they had vnworthily bestowed vpon insolent Barbarians. Of all this the least part was true. Yet that which was true made such a noise, as added credit vnto all the rest. Whilest therefore the King was thinking to send Hannibal into Africa, there to molest the Romans, and to giue him the better leisure of vising his owne opportunities in Greece: THOAS the Ætolian came ouer to him, and bad him lay all other care aside; for that his Countymen had alreadie taken Demetrias a Towne of maine importance, that should giue him entertainment, whence he might proceed as became the greatnesse of his vertue and fortune. This did serue to cut off all deliberation. As for Hannibal: THOAS was bold to tell the King, first, That it was not expedient for him to diuide his forces at such a time, when the verie reputation of his numbers, brought into Greece, might serue to lay open vnto him all places, without need of vising violence: and secondly, That in any such great enterprise there could not be chosen a more vnfit man to be employed in the Kings seruice, than was that famous Hannibal the Carthaginian. For he said, That the King should as greatly feele the losse of a Fleet or Arme, persuing vnder such a notable Commander if his fortune were bad, as if the same had miscarried vnder one of meaner qualitie: whereas neuertheless if Hannibal preuailed; Hannibal alone should haue all the honour, and not Antiochus. In this regard he was of opinion, That such a renowned Warriour should becalwayes neare vnto the Kings person, to giue aduice: which being followed as often as it was found commodious, the good successe would wholly redound vnto the honour of him that had the soveraigne Command; euen of the King himselfe. Antiochus gladly hearkned vnto this admonition; being zealous of the vertue, that shined brighter than the Misticke of his owne fortune. And thereupon hee laid aside the determination, which tended more to the aduancement of his desires, than did any thing else by him then or after thought vpon.

lous pomp of ceremony, he went vp from the Sea-side to Ilium; thereto do sacrifice to Minerva of Troy. Thence passing ouer the Ægean Sea, Hee came to Demetrias. Eurylochus the Magnetian, the same whom the Ætolians had lately waited on home, when by that pretext they wanne Demetrias; was now the chiefe man and Ruler of his Nation. Hee therefore with his Countymen, in great frequency, came to doe their duties to the King Antiochus, and bid him welcome. The King was glad of this: and tooke it as a signe of good lucke, to bee so entertained at the beginning. But it may be suspected, that the Magnetians found not the like cause of joy. For whereas they had expected a Fleet and Arme somewhat like to that of Xerxes: they saw three hundred ships, of which no more than fortie were seruicible for the Warres; with an Arme of tenne thousand Foot, fuch hundred Horse, and lixe Elephants. The Ætolians no sooner heard of his coming, than they called a Parliament; and made a Decree, whereby they invited him into their Countrie. He knew before that they would so doe; and was therefore wel onward on his way towards them, when they met him that brought the Decree. At his coming to Lamia, the Ætolians gaue him asioyfull entertainment as they could deuise. Being brought into their Councell, He made an Oration: wherein hee desired them to hold him excused, that he came not followed with a greater Arme. This was, he said, in true estimation a signe of his good will: in that hee staid not to make all things readie, but halted vnto their aid, euen whilest the season was vnfit for nauigation. Yet it should not bee long, ere the hope of all those which had expected him, would be satisfiued vnto the full. For it was his meaning to fill all Greece with Armes, and all the Sea-coast with his Fleets. Neyther would hee spare for any charge, traualle, or danger, to follow the builnesse which hee had vndertaken: euen to driue the Romans and their authoritie out of Greece, leaving the Countrie free indeed, and the Ætolians therein the chiefe. Now as the Armes that were following him, should be verie great: so was it his meaning, that all prouisions to them belonging should be correspondent; because he would not bee any way burdenesome vnto his Confederates. But at the present hee must needs entreat them, hauing thus hastily come ouer vnto their aid, vnprovided of manie necessaries; that they would helpe him with Corne and other victuals, whereof hee stood in need. So he left them to their consultation: the conclusion whereof was, after a little dispute, (for a vain motion was made by some, that the differences between the Romans and them, should be put by Compromise to the decision of Antiochus) That they would yield vnto the Kings desire, and assist him with all their forces. Here we may obserue, how vaine a thing it is for an absolute Prince to engage himselfe, as did Antiochus, in a builnesse of dangerous importance, vpon the promised assurance of a State that is merely popular. For if the vehemencie of Thoas, and some other of that Faction, had not preuailed in this Councell: the Ætolians, for gaine of two or three Townes, yea for hope of such gaine that might haue deceiued them, were like to haue abandoned this King their friend, vnto the discretion of the Romans. And what remedie had there beene, if this had so fallen out? He could haue bemoaned himselfe to Thoas, and complained of the wrong: but he must haue bin contented with this answer, That the fault was in those of the opposite side; whom Thoas would therefore haue pronounced to bee verie wicked men. It happened much better for the present; though in the future it proved much worse, both for him, and for the Ætolians. He was chosen Generall of all their forces; and thirtie Commissioners were appointed to bee about him, as a Councell of Warre for the Nation. These armed such as readily they could, whilest it was in dispute where they should beginne the Warre. Chalcis was thought the meetest place to be first vndertaken: whether if they came suddenly, they should not peradventure need to vse much force. The King had brought with him into Ætolia but a thousand Foot, leaving the rest behind him at Demetrias. With these hee halted away directly toward Chalcis; being overtaken by no great number of the Ætolians, which

which accompanied him thither. At his coming, the Magistrates, and some of the chiefe Citizens, issued forth to parle with him. There the Aetolians beganne, as they had lately done before, to tell, how the Romans had only in words and false semblance, let Greece at libertie. But such libertie, as might be true and vifull, they said would neuer be obtained; vntill by remouing the necessitie of obeying their pleasure that were most mightie, euerie feuerall Estate had where to find redresse of any preiure. And to this end was the great Antiochus come thither; a King wel able to counterpoise, yea to ouerweigh the Romans; who neuertheless desired them only, so to ioyne with him in League, as that if eyther the Romans or Hee should offer them wrong, they might keepe it in their power, to seeke redresse at the other hands. The Chalcidians made hereto the same answer, which, to the like allegations, they had made not long before: That their freedome was not imaginarie, but absolute; in which they were to thanke the Romans; without whose good liking, they would enter into no new confederacie. That which they spake of themselves, they could likewise affirme of all the Greekes: forasmuch as none of them payed any Tribute, was kept vnder, by any Garrison; or liued otherwise than by their owne Lanes; and without being tied vnto condition which displeased them. Wherefore they wondered, why the King should thus trouble himselfe, to deuour Cities that were already free. But since he, and the Aetolians, requested their friendship: they besought both him, and the Aetolians, to doe a friendly Office, in departing from them quietly, and leaving them in such good case as they were. With this answer the King departed: for he was not, as then, strong enough to force them. But verie soone after, hee brought thither a greater power, which terrified them, and made them yeeld: before all the succours could arriue, which Titus had sent for their defence.

The chiefe Citie of Euboea being thus gorten; all the rest of the Iland shortly yeelded to Antiochus. Four or five hundred Roman Souldiers, that came ouer late to haue defended Chalceus, reposed themselves at Delium, a little Towne of Boeotia, lying ouer against the Iland; where was a Temple and Groue, consecrated vnto Apollo, that had the privilege of an inuolable Sanctuarie. In this place were some of them wal king, and beholding the things there to becene, whilst others were busied as they found cause: without feare of any danger; as being in such a place, and no warre thither proclaimed. But Demetrius, one of Antiochus his Captaines, that had wearied himselfe in manie vaine Treaties of peace; tooke advantage of their carelesnesse, and led them all with all extremitie of warre. Verie few of them escaped: hisse were tak. n, and the rest slaine. Hereat Quintus was grieved: yet so, as it pleased him wel to consider, that his Romans had now more iust cause than before, to make warre vpon the King.

Antiochus liked wel these beginnings, and sent Embassadours into all quarters of Greece; in hope, that his reputation should perwade very many to take his part. The wisest fort returned such answer, as the Chalcidians had done. Some referred themselves vntill hee should come among them: knowing that eyther, if hee came not, Hee must holde them excused for not daring to stirre; or, if hee came, the Romans must pardon their just feare, in yeelding to the stronger. None of those that lay farre off, joynd with him in true meaning; save the Eleans, that alwayes fauoured the Aetolians; and now feared the Achaens. Little reason there was, that he should thinke to draw the Achaens to his partie. Neuertheless hee assayed them, vpon a vaine hope that the entie, which Titus was said to beare vnto Philopemen vertue, had bred a secret dislike betwene that Nation and the Romans. Wherefore both Hee and the Aetolians sent Embassadours to the Councell at Aegium, that spured not brasse words, if the Achaens would haue lo bene taken. The Kings Embassadour told of great Armies and Fleets that were coming; reckoning vp the Dahans, Aethians, Elimeans; and Cadusians; names that were not euery day heard of, and therefore as hee thought, the more terrible. Then told he them what notable men at Sea, the Sydenians, Tyrrians, Aradians, and Pamphylians were; such indeed as could not be refuted. Now concerning monie, and all warlike furniture: it was, he said, well knowne, that the Kingdomes of Asia had alwaies thereof great plentie. So as they were much deceived: who considering the late war made against Philip, did thinke that this with Antiochus would proue the like: the case was too farre different. Yet this most powerfull King, that for the libertie of Greece was come from the vtmost parts of the East; requested no more of the Achaens, than that they would hold themselves as neutral, and quietly looke on, whilst He tooke order with the Romans. To the same effect spake the Aetolian Embassadour: and further added, That in the battell at Cynosephala, neither Titus had done the part of a General, nor the Romans of good souldiours: but that both He and his Armie had bene there destroyed, had they not bene protected by vertue of the Aetolians, which carried the day. Titus was present at the Councell, and heard all this: to which hee made as lit answer, as could haue bene desired. He told the Achaens, That neither the Kings Embassadour, nor the Aetolians, did so greatly labour to perswade those vnto whom they addressed their Orations; as to vnt themselves the one vnto the other. So as a man might well discern, what good correspondence in vanitie it was, that had thus linked the King and the Aetolians together. For euen such bragges as here they made, before the Achaens who knew them to be liars, had the Aetolians also made vnto King Antiochus: proclaiming the victorie ouer Philip to be merely their Act: and the whole Countrie of Greece to be dependant on them. Interchangeably had they bene feasted by the King, with such tales as his Embassadour told euen now; of Dahans, and Aradians, and Elimeans, and a many others: that were all but a companie of Syrians, such as were wont to be sold about for bondslaves, and good for little else. These diuerse names of scallie people were, he said, like to the diuinitie of Venison, wherewith a freind of his at Chalceus (no such vnter as were these Embassadours) had sometime feasted him. For all that varietie, wherewith hee wondered, was none other, as his Host then merily told him; than so many peeces of one tame swine, dressed after seuerall fashions with varietie of sawces. Setting therefore aside this vntie of idle pompe: it were good to make iudgment of the great King, by his present doings. Hee had, notwithstanding all this great noyse, no more than ten thousand men about him: for which little Armie hee was faime, in a manner, to beg vittualles of the Aetolians; and take vp monie at vsurie, to discharge his charges. And thus he ran vp and downe the Countrie; from Demetrias to Lamia; thence backe to Chalceus; and being there shut out, to Demetrias againe. These were the fruits of his: wherewith since both Antiochus and the Aetolians had each deluded other; meet it was that they should, as perhaps already they did, repent, whilst 40 wiser men tooke heed by their example. To a fauourable Auditorie much persuasion is needlesse. The Achaens did not loue lo well the Aetolians, as to desire that they should become Princes of Greece: but rather wished to see them, of all other, made the veriest abjects. Wherefore they stood not to barken after newes, what Antiochus did, how he sped in Euboea, or what other Cities were like to take his part: but readily proclaimed war against him, and against the Aetolians.

How the hatred betwene these two Nations grew inueterate; sufficiently appears in the storie foregoing. Now haue they gotten each their Patrons; the one, the Romans; the other, King Antiochus. Herein did each of them vnwisely: though far the greater blame ought to be laid, on the turbulent spirits of the Aetolians. For when the Romans departed out of Greece and left the Countrie at rest: there was no

50 thing more greatly to haue bene desired, than that they might neuer finde occasion to retaine with an Armie thither againe. And in this respect ought the Greekes to haue fought not how Smyrna and Lampsa might recouer their libertie (which had neuer bene held a matter worth regarding, vntill now of late) but how the powers of the East and West, diuided and kept asunder by their Countrie, as two

Seas by an Isthmus or necke of land, might be kept from ouerflowing the barre that parted them. Neither had the Romans any better pretence for their seeking to make free those base Asiatiques, which originally were Greeks ; than the generall applainc, wherewith all the Nation entertained this their iouing offer. Yet were Lysimachus, and the Townes in Thrace, lately gotten by Antiochus, pretended as a verie great cause of feare, that should moue them to take armes euen in their owne defence. But if all Greece would haue made intercession, & requested that things might continue as they were, promising ioyntly to assill the Romans, with their whole forces both by Land and Sea, whensoever King Antiochus should make the least offer to stirre against them: then had not only this quarrell bene at an end; but the Roman Patronage ouer the Countrey, had been far from growing, as soone after it did, into a Lordly rule.

The Achaens were at this time, in a manner, the only Nation of Greece, that freely and generously declared themselves altogether for the Romans, their friends and benefactors. All the rest gaue doubtfull answers of hope vnto both sides: or if some few, as did the Thessalians, were firme against Antiochus; yet helped they not one another in the quarrell, nor shewed themselves his enemies, till he pressed them with open force. The Boeotians willingly receiued him, as soone as he entered vpon their borders, not so much for feare of his power, as in hatred of Titus and the Romans, by whom they had bene somewhat hardly vied. Aminander the Albanian,<sup>20</sup> besides his old freindship with the Aetolians, was caught with a bait; which it may be doubted, whether he did more foolishly swallow, or Antiochus cast out. He had married the daughter of an Arcadian, that was an idle-headed man, and wanted himselfe to be defended from Alexander the Great: naming his two sonnes, in that regard, Philip and Alexander. Philip, the elder of these brethren, accompanied his siltter to the poore Court of Albania: where hauing made his follie knowne, by talking of his Pedigree; He was iudged by Antiochus and the Aetolians, a man fit for their turnes. They made him beleue, that in regard of his high parentage, and the famous memorie of Alexander his forefather; it was their purpose, to doe their best for the conquest of Macedon to his behoofe: since no man had thereto so good title<sup>30</sup> as he. But for the enabling of them hereunto; it behoued him to draw Aminander to their partie, that so they might the sooner haue done with the Romans. Philip was highly pleased herewith; and by perswasions of himselfe, or of his siltter, effected as much as they desired. But the first peece of seruice done by this imaginative King (whether it proceeded from his owne phrenzie, in hope to get loue of the Macedonians; that should be his subjects; or whether from some vanitie in King Antiochus that employed him) wrought more harme to his freinds, than he and Aminander were able to doe good. There were two thousand men committed to his leading: with which he marched vnto Cyncephala, there to gather vp the bones of the slaughtered Macedonians; whom their King had suffered all this while to lie vnburied.<sup>40</sup> The Macedons troubled not themselves to thinke on this charitable act, as it were to them any benefit at all: but King Philip took it in high indignation; as intended merely vnto his despight. Wherefore he presently sent vnto the Romans; and gaue them to vnderstand, that hee was ready with all his power to aid them whereinsoever they should be pleased to vse him.

The Aetolians, Macedonians, Eubarians, Boeotians, and Albanians, hauing now all ioynted with him; Antiochus tooke counsaile of them about the prosecution of the warre in hand. The chiefe question was, Whether it were meet for him to inuade Thessalie, that would not hearken to his perswasions; or whether to let all alone vntill the Spring: because it was now mid-winter. Some thought one thing,<sup>50</sup> and some another: confirming each his owne sentence, with the weightiest reasons which he could alledge; as in a matter of great importance. Hannibal was at this meeting: who had long bene cast aside, as a vessell of no vse; but was now requir-

ter, was euen the same which he would haue spoken, had his counsaile at any time before bene asked since their coming into Greece. For the Macedonians, Boeotians, and other their good freinds, which now lo willingly took their parts: what were they else than so many poore Estates, that, wanting force of their owne, did adioyne themselves for feare vnto him, that was strongest at the present; and would afterwards, when they saw it expedient, be as ready to fall to the contrarie side, alledging the same feare for their excuse? wherefore he thought it most behouefull, to win King Philip of Macedon vnto their partie: who (besides that being once engaged, he should not afterwards haue power to recoyle and forsake them at his pleasure) was a mightie Prince, and one that had meane to sustaine the Roman warre with his proper forces. Now that Philip might be easily perswaded to ioyne with them; the benefit likely to redound vnto himselfe, by their societie, was a verie strong Argument: though indeed what need was there, of prouing by inference the likelihood of this hope? For, said hee, These Aetolians here present; and namely this THOMAS, being lately Embassador from them into Asia, among other Motiues which he then vsed to excite the King vnto this Expedition, insisted mainly on the same point. He told vs that PHILIP was moued beyond all patience, with the Lordly influence of the Romans: likening that King to some wild beast, that was chained, or locked up within some grate and was: if I saue breake loose. If this be so: let vs breake his chaine, and pull downe the grate:<sup>20</sup> that he may regaine his libertie, and satisfie his angry flames, vpon those that are common Enemies to vs and him. But if it prouoe otherwise, and that his feare be greater than his indignation: then shall it behoue vs to looke vnto him, that he may not seeke to please his good master the Romans, by offending vs. Your sonne SELEVCVS is now at Ephesus; with part of your Armie: if PHILIP will not hearken to your Embassage; let SELEVCVS be in readines, to fall vpon Macedon, and finde him worke to defend his owne on the other side, without putting vs here to trouble. Thus much concerning PHILIP; and the present war in Greece. But more generally for the manning of this great enterprize, wherein you are now embarked against the Romans; I told you my opinion at the beginning. Whereto had you then giuen eare, the Romans by this time should haue heard other newes; than that Cabalus in Euboea was become ours. Italie and Gaul should haue bene on fire with warre: and little to their comfort, they should haue vnderstood, that HANNIBAL was againe come into Italie. Neither doe I see what should hinder vs euen now from taking the same course. Send for all your Fleet and Armie hither (but in any case let Ships of burden come a long with them, laden with store of victualles: For as the case now stands, we haue here too few hands, and too many mouths.) If these let the one halfe be employed against Italie, whilst you in person with the other halfe, tarrying on this side the Ionian Sea, may both take order for the affaires of Greece, and then euill will make countenance, as if you were euen ready to follow vs into Italie: yea and be ready to follow vs indeed, if it shall be requisite. This is my aduice: who though perhaps I am not verie skillfull in all sorts of warre: yet how to war with the Romans, I haue bene instructed by long experience, both to their cost and mine owne. Of this counsaile which I giue, I promise you my faithfull and diligent seruice for the execution: but what counsaile soeuer you shall please to follow; I will it may be profitable.<sup>30</sup> Many were pleased with the great spirit of the man, and said he had spoken brauely: but of all this was nothing done; saue onely that one was sent into Asia, to make all things ready there. In the meane while they went in hand with Thessalie; about which they had before disputed. There when they had won one Towne by force, many other places, doubting their owne strength, were glad to make submission. But Larissa that was chiefe of the Countrey, stood out: not regarding any terrible threats of the King, that lay before the walls with his whole Armie. This their faith and courage was rewarded by good fortune. For At. Babian, a Roman Proprietor did send hither. Likewise Philip of Macedon professed himselfe I nemie vnto Antiochus: whereby the fame of the succour comming to Larissa grew such, as wrought more than the succour could haue done, had it arriued. For Antiochus perceiving many fires on the Mountaines tops stare off; thought that a great Armie of Romans and Macedonians had bene comming vpon him. There- fore exculing him selfe by the time of the year; Hee brake vp his seige, and marched away to Chalcis. At Chalcis he fell in loue with a yong Maiden, daughter vnto a Citizen of the Towne: whom, without regard of the much disproportion that was betwene them, both in yeares and fortune, He shortly married; and so spent the Winter following, as delightfully as he could, without thinking vpon the war in hand. His great men and Captaines followed his example; and the souldiers as readily imitated their Captaines: in such wise that when he took the feild, he might evidently perceiue in what loose manner of discipline his Armie had passed the Winter. But M. Atilius Glabrie, the Roman Consul, shall meet him verie shortly, and helpe him to reclaim them from this loosenesse of nuptial Reuels; by setting them to harder exercise.

M. Atilius was chosen Consul with P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica. The warre against Antiochus fell to him by lot; whereas otherwise He was no way so honourable, as Nasica his Colleague: vnto whom fell a charge, of farre lesse credit and importance. Nasica, besides the great Nobilitie of his Familie, had bene long since, in time of the Punicke Warre, crowned with the title of The best man in Rome: when the Senate, for verie feare and superstition, durst not haue so pronounced him, had they not so thought him; as being commanded by Oracle, That none other man than the verie best, should entertaine an old stone, which the Diuell then taught them to call The Mother of the gods. But no prerogative of Birth, Vertue, or good Opinion, gaue such aduantage to the better man, as to make choice of his owne Prouince; or arrogate more vnto himselfe, than his lot should afford him. This vnpartial distribution of employments, helped well to maintaine peace and concord. P. Scipio therefore was appointed to make war against the Boians: wherein he purchased the honour of a Triumphe, nothing so glorious as was that of his Colleague; though purchased with harder seruice, requiring the more abilitie in matter of war. But M. Atilius went our into Greece, with ten thousand Foot, two thousand Horse, and fiftene Elephants. Ptolemie King of Aegypt, notwithstanding his late Alliance with King Antiochus: and Philip King of Macedon; had lately sent Embassadors to Rome, making offer to come each of them in person with all his forces into Italia, there to assist the Consul in this warre. Ptolemie sent also gold and siluer, toward the defraying of charges; as one that meant none other than good earnest. But he was too yong, and dwelt too farre off. So his music was returned vnto him with thanks; and his louing offer as louingly refused. Vnto Philip Embassadors answer was made, that this his friendly offer was gratefully accepted: and that the Senate and People of Rome would thinke themselves beholding to him, for the assistance that He should giue to Atilius the Consul. Masaniissa likewise, and the Carthaginians, did strue, which of them should be most forward in gratifying the Romans. Each of them promised a great quantitie of graine; which they would send partly to Rome, partly to the Armie in Greece. And herein Masaniissa far out-went the poore Cite of Carthage: as also, in that he offered to lend the Consul fife hundred Horse, and twentie Elephants. On the other side, the Carthaginians vnderooke to set out a Fleet at their own charges: and to bring in at one payment all the Tribute-monie, which was behinde, and ought to be discharged by many yeerely penions. But the Romans did neither thinke it good, to let them arme a Fleet; nor would they redeem themselves out of Tribute, by paying all at once. As for the Corne; it was accepted with Condition, That they should be contented to receive the price of it.

The baslie and ridiculous issue of this war, that began with such noyse and preparations, were hardly credible: were not the difference exceeding great, betwene the Roman and the Asiatic souldiers. Antiochus had gotten this Spring a few townes of Acermania, after the same manner as hee had preuailed in other parts of Greece; partly by faire words, and treason of the Rulers partly by terror, that was like to proue their excuse, when they should againe for sake him. But King Philip and Babius, hauing recouered many places; and the Roman Consul being garrued, against whom none made resistance; He was glad to withdraw himselfe. Antiochus fled out of his Athamania: which the Macedonians tooke and enioyed; as in recompence of his good seruice to the Romans. Philip, the brother of Antiochus wife, was taken by the Consul, made a mocking stocke: and sent away prisoner to Rome. The Thessalians vsed much more diligence in returning to their old friends, than they had done in yielding to the King. All their Cities, one after other, gaue vp themselves: the Garrisons of Antiochus, compounding onely for their owne liues, and departing vnarmed: yet so, that a thousand of them staid behind, and tooke pay of the Romans. This did wonderfully perplex Antiochus: who hauing withdrawn himself to Chalcis, and hearing how things went, cried out vpon his freinds and said, That they had betrayed him. He had taken a great deale of toyle during one halfe of a Winter, and spent the other halfe in such Nuptials, as were little to his honour: after which, in time of need, He found all the promises of the Asiatics merely verball: and himselfe reduced into termes of great extremitie. Hee therefore admired Iamnichus as a wile man, yea a verie Prophet, that had foreseene all this long before. Neuertheless He sent word to the Asiatics, that they should now make ready all their forces: as considering their owne need to be no less than his. But the Asiatics had cause to thinke, that they themselves were shamefully disappointed by Antiochus: who having promised to doe great wonders, was in all this while seconded by no greater numbers out of Asia, than so many as would fill vp the same ten thousand which he first brought out. Yet came there some of them, though fewer than at any time before, which ioyued with him. Hereat the King was angrie; and could get no better satisfaction, than that Thoa and his fellows had done their best, in vaine, to haue made all the Nation take armes. Since therefore neither his owne men came out to him out of Asia, nor his friends of Greece would appeare in this time of danger: He seized vpon the Streights of Thermopyla: as meaning to defend them against the Romans, vntill more helpe should come. Of the Streights of Thermopyla there hath bene spoken enough before, vpon many occasions: and then chiefly, when they were defended by Leonidas against the huge Armie of Xerxes. Wherefore it may easily be conceived, how the Romans, that landed about Apollonia, and so came onwards into Thessalie, were vnable to passe that Ledge of Mountaines, diuiding the one halfe of Greece: vntill they could win this difficult entrance. But there was great difference betwene Leonidas and Antiochus. The former of these, with an handful of men, defended this passage two or three daies together, against a World of men comming to invade the Countre. The latter, hauing taken vpon him to doe great miracles, and expect what he listed himselfe in Greece: did commit himselfe vnto the lastie of this place, when he was charged by not many more than he had in his owne Armie. There whilst he lay: He sent earnest messages one after other to the Asiatics, entreating them not to forsake him thus: but at least wile now to helpe, and keepe the tops of the Mountaines, lest the Romans finding any by-path should come downe vpon him. By this importunitie, he got of them two thousand, that vnderooke to make good the few passages: by which onely, and not without extreme difficultie, it was possible for the Enemy to ascend. The Roman Consul in like sort, prepared to force the Streights: without faying to expect King Philip: that was hindered by sickness from accompanying him. He had with him M. Porcius Cato, and L. Valerius Flaccus, that had both of them bene Consuls. These he sent forth by night with two thousand men, to trie whether by any means they could get vp to the Asiatics. He himselfe encouraged his Armie: not onely by telling them, with what base-conditioned enemies they had to deale: but what rich Kingdomes Antiochus held, that should bountifullly reward them if they were victors. This was on the day before the battaile. All that night Cato had a fore iourne (for what happened vnto L. Valerius; it is vncertaine, faue onely that hee failed in his intent) and fo much the worfe, for that he had no skillfull guide. Seeing therefore his men exceedingly tired, with climbing vp fleepie Rocks and crooked wayes: Hee commanded them to repose themselves; whilst He, being a verie able man of bodie, tooke in hand the discouerie, accompanied with no more than one of like mettle to himselfe. After a great deale of trouble, He found at length a path: which he tooke to be, as indeed it was, the best way leading vnto the Enemies. So thither he brought his men, and held on the same path till toward breake of day. It was a place not haunted, because in time of peace there was a faire way through the Streights below, that required no such trouble of climbing: neyther had this entrance of the Thermopylae bene so often the Seat of Warre, as might cause any traualers to search out the passages of those desolate Mountaines. Wherefore the way that Cato followed, though it were the best yet did it lead him to a bogge at the end, which would suffer him to passe no further. So he staid there vntill day light: by which he discouered both the Campe of the Greekes vnderneath him; and some of the Aetolians verie neare vnto him, that were keeping watch. Hee therefore sent forth a lustie Crew of his men, whom he thought fitt for that seruice; and willed them by any means to get him some prisoners. This was effected: and he thereby vnderstood, that these Aetolians were no more than six hundred; as also that King Antiochus lay beneath in the Valley. So he presently set vpon the Aetolians; ouer-threw them; slue a great part of them; and chased the rest: that by flying to their Campe, guided him vnto it. The light was already begun between the Armies below; and the Romans, that had easily peeced the Kings men, and driuen them into their Campe, found it in a manner a desperate peece of worke to assault the Campe it selfe; which occupied the whole breadth of the Streights; was notably fortified; and not onely defended by Antiochus his long Pikes, which were best at that kinde of seruice; but by Archers and Slingers that were placed ouer them on the Hill side, and powred downe a shower of weapons on their heads. But Cato his approach determined the matter. It was thought at first, that the Aetolians had bene coming to helpe the Kings men: but when the Roman armes and enignes were discovered, such was the terror, that none made offer of resistance; but all of them forsooke the Campe, and fled. The slaughter was no great: for that the badnes of the way, did hinder the Roman Armie from making pursuit. Yet this daies losse draue Antiochus out of Greece, who directly fled to Chalcis; and from thence, with the first opportunitie, got him backe into Asia.

All the Cities that had embraced the friendship of Antiochus, prepared forthwith to entertaine the Romans, and entreat for pardon: setting open their gates; and presenting themselves vnto the Consul, in manner of suppliants. Briefly, in few dayes all was recovered that Antiochus had gained: the Aetolians onely standing out, because they knew not what else to doe. Neyther did the Consul giue them any respite. At his returne from Chalcis He met with King Philip, that hauing recovered health came to ioyne with him against Antiochus; ouer whom his the victorie was already gotten. He did gratulate vnto the Romans their good success; and offered to take part with them in the Aetolian Warre. So it was agreed, That the Consul should besiege Stratonea; and Philip, Lamia; at the same time. Each of them plied his worke hard; especially Philip, who faue would haue taken Lamia before the Consul should come to helpe him. But it could not be. For his Macedonians that vsed to worke by Myne, were ouermuch hindered by the stonie ground. Yet was Lamia euen readie to be taken, when the Consul, hauing wonne Stratonea, came thither; and told Philip, that the spoile of this Townes was a reward vnto those that had fought at Thermopylae. Herewith Philip must bee contented; and therefore went his way quietly. But Antius, that could fo ill endure to see Philip in likelihood of thriving by the Romans victorie, got not Lamia himselfe: vntill such time as another Consul, was readie to ease him of his charge.

The

The losse of Heraclus did so affright the Aetolians, that they thought no way fasser than to desire peace. Yet had they sent vnto King Antiochus presently after his flight: entreating him not to forsake them vterly, but cyther to returne with all those forces which he had purposed to bring into Greece; or if any thing withheld him from coming in person, at leastwise to helpe them with monie and other aid. They prayed him to consider, that this did not onely concerne him in honour; but appertained vnto his owne safetie: since it would be much to his hurt, if the Aetolians being wholly subdued, the Romans, without any Enemies at their backs, might set vpon him in Asia. He considered well of this; and found their words true.

Therefore He deliuered vnto Nicanor, one of their Embassadors, a summe of monie, that might serue to detray the charges of the Warre: promising that ere long he would send them strong aid, both by Land and Sea. Thosi, another of their Embassadors, He retained with him: who willingly staid, that he might vrge the King to make his word good. But when Heraclus was taken from them: then did the Aetolians lay aside all hope, of amending their fortune by the helpe of Antiochus; and made suit vnto the Consul to obtaine peace, vpon any reasonable Condition. The Consul would scarce vouchsafe to giue them audience, but did Hee had other buisines in hand: onely He granted them tenne dayes of Truce, and sent L. Valerius Flaccus with them to Sypata; willing them to make him acquainted with as much, as they would haue deliuered vnto himselfe. At their coming to Sypata they began, as men fauouring their own cause, to alledge how well they had deserved of the Romans. Where to Flaccus would not hearken. He told them plainly, That the memorie of all such good Offices past, was quite obliterated by the malice which they had shewed of late. Wherefore hee willed them to acknowledge their fault, and to entreat pardon. Better they thought to doe so euen betimes, than to stay till they were reduced into termes of more extremitie. Hereupon they agreed to commit themselves vnto the faith of the Romans; and to that effect sent Embassadors to the Consul. This phrase of committing vnto the faith, signified, in their vse of it, little else, than the acknowledgment of a fault done; and the craving of pardon. But the Romans vsed those words in another sense; and counted them all one, as yielding to discretion. Wherefore when the Consul heard them speake in this manner: Hee asked them whether their meaning were agreeable to their words. They answered that it was: and shewed him the Decree of their Nation, lately made to this purpose. Then sayd Hee, I commend you first of all,

That none of yee presume to goe into Asia, vpon any buisines priuate or publike: then, That yee deliuer vp vnto me Dicaearchus the Aetolian, Xenocratus the Epirot, Antimander the Albanian, and such of his Countreymen as haue followed him in revolting from vs. Whilst hee was yet speaking: Phameas the Embassador interrupted him; and prayed him not to mistake the Custome of the Greekes, who had yielded themselves vnto his faith, not vnto discretion. What? (said the Consul) Doe yee stand to plead Custome with mee, being now at my discretion? Being thus answered, With that, chains were brought; and an iron collar by his appointment fitted vnto euerie one of their necks. This did so affright them, that they stood dumbe and knew not what to say. But Valerius and some others entreated the Consul, not to deale thus hardly with them, since they came as Embassadors; though since, their Condition was altered. Phameas also spake for himselfe: and said, That neither He nor yet the Apodector or ordinarie Councell of the Nation, were able to fulfill these iniunctions; without approbation of the generall Assembly. For which cause He entreated yet further ten dayes respite; and had granted vnto him Truce for so long.

This surceasance of warre, during tenne and other tenne dayes together, began presently after the taking of Heraclus; when Philip had bene commanded away from Lamia, that else he might haue wonne. Now because of the indignitie herein offered vnto that King, and to the end that hee might not returne home with his

Armie, like one that could not bee truitied in employment: especially the Romans being like hereafter to haue further need of him, in the continuance of this Warre: He was deliered to set vpon the Athamanians, and some other pettie Nations their borderers, while the Consul was busie with the Ætolians; taking for his reward, all that He could get. And Hee got in that space all Athamania, Perrebia, Apyrantia, and Dolopia. For the Ætolians, hearing what had befallen their Embassadors, were so enraged, That although they were very ill provided for Warre; yet they could not endure to heare more talke of peace. And it happened, that Nicanor about the same time was come backe from Antiochus, with monie and hopefull promises: the Romans abiding still about Heraclæa; and Philip hauing lately risen from before Lamia, yet not being far gone thence. His monie Nicanor conueighed into Lamia, by verie vnusuall dexteritie. But hee himselfe being to passe further to the Assembly of the Ætolians, thence to make report of his Embassage; was verie much perplexed about this his iourne, which lay betwene the Roman and Macedonian Campes. Yet hee made the aduerture: and keeping as farre as hee could from the Roman side, fell vpon a Station of Macedonians; by whom hee was taken, and led vnto their King. Hee expected no good; but eyther to bee deliuered vnto the Romans, or vnto ill enough by Philip. But it seemed, that the King had not hitherto concocted well the indignitie, of his being sent away from Lamia. For Hee commanded his seruants to entreat Nicanor friendly: and hee himselfe being then at supper, did visite him as soone as he rose vp: giuing him to vnderstand; That the Ætolians did now reape the fruits of their own madnesse, forasmuch as they could neuer hold themselves contented, but would needs bee calling strangers into Greece. They had pleased themselves well, in their acquaintance first with the Romans, and then with King Antiochus: but himselfe, being their neighbour, they could neuer well endure. It was now therefore, He said, high time for them to haue regard vnto his friendship, whereof hitherto they had neuer made any triall: for surely their good affection, one vnto the other, would be much more auailable vnto each of them, than their mutuall catching of aduantages; whereby they had wrought themselves much displeasure. Thus much the King willed Nicanor to signifie vnto his Countreymen; and priuately to hold in mind the courtesie which hee then did him, in sending him safe home. So giuing him a Conuoy to gard him to Hypata, He louingly dismissed him. For this benefit, Nicanor was alwayes after dutifully affected to the Crowne of Macedon: so as in the warre of Perseus hee made himselfe suspected vnto the Romans; and therefore was had away to Rome, where he ended his life.

When the Consul vnderstood, that the Ætolians refused to make their submission, in such wise as he required it; he forthwith meant to prosecute the warre against them, without any longer forbearance. They were preparing to make head against him at Naupactus: whether he therefore directly marched, to trie what they could or durst. The siege of Naupactus was of greater length, than the Romans had preconciued it: for it was a strong Citie, and well manned. But Antiochus stood vpon point of honour; wherein he thought that he should haue bene a looser, by rising from before it without Victorie. So He staid there weelneare all the following time of his Consulship; whilst the Macedonian King and the Acheans, made farre better vse of the Roman Victorie. Philip, as is said before, being allowed to take in such places as had revolted vnto Antiochus, and were not hitherto reclaimed, won the strong Citie of Demetrias; and with an halte course of Victorie, subdued the Athamanians and others. The Acheans called to accompt the Eleans and Messenians: which had long bene added to the Ætolian side; and followed it, in taking part with Antiochus. The Eleans gaue good words; whereby they saued themselves from trouble awhile. The Messenians being more stout, before they were inuaded; had none other helpe when the Achean Prætor waited their Countreie, than to offer themselves vnto the Romans. Titus was then at Corinth: to whome they went word, word, That at his Commandement their gates should be opened, but that vnto the Acheans it was not their meaning to yeeld. A message from Titus to the Achean Prætor, did suffice to call home the Armie, and finish the Warre: as also the peremptorie Command of the same Titus caused the Messenians to annex themselves vnto the Acheans, and become part of their Common-wealth. Such was now the Maiestie of a Roman Embassador. Titus did fauour the Acheans; yet could not like it well, that eyther they or any other should take too much vpon them. He thought it enough, that they had their libertie, and were strong enough to defend it against a nie of their neighbours. That they should make themselves great Lords, and able to dispute with the Romans vpon euen termes; it was no part of his desire. They had lately bought the Ile of Zacynthus which had once been Philips, and was afterward giuen by him to Aminander who sent a Gouernour thither. But when Aminander in this present Warre, was driuen out of his owne Kingdome by Philip: then did the Gouernour of Zacynthus offer to sell the land to the Acheans; whom he found readie Chapmen. Titus liked not of this: but plainly told them, That the Romans would be their owne Caruers, and take what they thought good, of the Lands belonging to their Enemies; as a reward of the victorie which they had obtained. It was bootlesse to dispute. Wherefore the Acheans referred themselves vnto his discretion. So he told them, that their Common-wealth was like a Tortoise, whereof Peloponnesus was the shell: and that holding themselves within that compasse, they were out of danger; but if they would needs bee looking abroad, they should lie open to blowes, which might greatly hurt them. Hauing settled things thus in Peloponnesus, Hee went ouer to Naupactus: where Glabrio the Consul had laine two monethes, that might haue bene farre better spent. There, whether out of compassion which Hee had vpon the Ætolians, or out of dislike of King Philip thriving to fast: Hee perswaded the Consul to grant vnto the besieged, and to the whole Nation, so long Truce, that they might send Embassadors to Rome; and submitting themselves craue pardon of the Senate. Most like it is, that Naupactus was in great danger: else would not the Ætolians haue made such earnest suite as they did vnto Titus, for procuring of this fauour. But if Glabrio had bene sure to carrie it, in any short space: it may well be thought hee would not haue gone away without it; since the winning of that Towne, wherein was then the whole floure of the Nation, would haue made the promised submission much more humble and sincere. When they came to Rome: no entreatie could helpe them to better Conditions, than one of these two; That eyther they should wholly permit themselves to the good pleasure of the Senate; Or else pay a thousand Talents, and make neyther Peace nor Warre with any, further than as the Romans should giue approbation. They had not so much monie: neither could they well hope to be gently dealt withall, if they should giue themselves away vnto discretion; which what it signified, they now vnderstood. Wherefore they desired to haue it set downe, in what points, and how farre forth, they should yeild vnto the good pleasure of the Senate. But hereof they could get no certaine answer: so that they were dismissed as enemies, after long and vaine attendance.

Whilst the Ætolians were pursuing their hopes of peace, the Consul had little to doe in Greece; and therefore took vpon him grauely to set things in order among the detestable Acheans. Hee would haue had them to restore the banished Lacedæmonians home into their Countreie, and to take the Eleans into the fellow shippe of their Common-wealth. This the Acheans liked well enough: but they did not like it, that the Romans should be meddling in all occurrences. Wherefore they deferred the restitution of the banished Lacedæmonians: intending to make it an Act of their owne meere grace. As for the Eleans: they were loth to bee beholding to the Romans, and thereby to disparage the Acheans: into whose Corporation they were desirous to be admitted; and saw that they should haue their desire, without such compulsiue mediation.

The

The Roman Admirall C. Linius, much about the same time, fought a battaile at Sea with Polyxenidas, Admirall to the King Antiochus. King Eumenes brought help to the Romans; though it was not great; and five and twentie saile of Adriaticus came after the battaile, when they were following the Chace. The Kings Fleet was the better of saile; but that of the Romans the better manned. Wherefore Polyxenidas being vanquished in fight, was yet out of danger; as soone as he betooke himselfe to a speedie retreat.

And such end had the first yeares warre, betwene King Antiochus and the Romans. After this, as many of the Greekes as had followed the vaine hopes of the Antiochians, were glad to excuse themselves by fear; thinking themselves happie when by Embassadours they had obtained pardon. On the contrarie side, Philip of Macedon, Arch-enemie of late vnto the Romans, did now lend to gratulate this their Victorie; and, in recompence of his good affection, had restored vnto him Leuctrius his yonger sonne, whom some few yeares they had kept as an hostage. Also King Ptolemeus of Aegypt, gratulating the Roman Victorie, sent word how greatly all Asia and Syria were thereby terrified. In which regard He desired the Senate not to foreflow time; but to send an Armie, as soone as might be, into Asia; promising, that his assistance, wherein soeuer it pleased them to vie it, should not be wanting. This Ptolemeus was the sonne-in-law of King Antiochus; but hee was the friend of Fortune. He vnderstood long before, as did all that were indifferent beholders of the Contention, that the Romans were like to haue the vpper hand. The famed Antiochus now begins to suspect, who had thought himselfe awhile as safe at Ephesus, as if he had beene in another World; but was told by Hannibal, that it was not so farre out of Greece into Asia, as out of Italy into Greece, and that there was no doubt but the Romans would soone be there, and make him trie the chance of a battaile for his Kingdome.

§. VIII.

LUCIUS SCIPIO, hauing with him PUBLIUS the African his elder Brother, for his Lieutenant, is sent into Greece. He grants long Truce to the Antiochians, that so he might at leisure passe into Asia. Much troublesome businesse by Sea; and diuers fights. An insurrection vpon EUMENES his Kingdome; with the siege of Perizonius, raysed by an handfull of the Achaïans. L. SCIPIO the Consul comes into Asia; where ANTIOCHUS most earnestly desireth peace and is denied it. The battaile of MAGNESA; wherein ANTIOCHUS being vanquished, yieldeth to the Romans good pleasure. The Conditions of the peace. In what sort the Romans used their Victorie. L. CORNELIUS SCIPIO after a most sumptuous triumph ouer ANTIOCHUS, is surnamed The Asiaticus; as his brother was styled The African.

LUCIUS CORNELIUS SCIPIO*, the brother of P. Scipio the African was chosen Consul at Rome with C. LELIUS. LELIUS was verie gracious in the Senate; and therefore being desirous (as generally all Consuls were) of the more honourable employment, offered to referre to the arbitrement of the Senate, if L. Cornelius would be so pleased, the disposition of their Prouinces, without putting it to the hazard of a Lotterie. Laelius hauing talked with his brother Publius, approved well of the motion. Such a question had not of long time bene put vnto the Fathers: who therefore were the more desirous, to make an vnblameable Decree. But the matter being otherwise somewhat indifferent; P. Scipio the African said openly thus much, That if the Senate would appoint his brother to the warre against Antiochus, He himselfe would follow his brother in that warre, as his Lieutenant. These words were heard with such approbation, that the controuersie was forthwith at an end. For if Antiochus relied relied vpon Hannibal, and should happen to be directed wholly by that great Captaine: what better man could they oppose, than Scipio; that had bene victorious against the same Great Worthie. But indeed a worser man might haue serued well enough the turne. For Hannibal had no absolute Command, nor scarce any trust of great importance: excepting now and then in consultation, where his wisdom was much approved; but his libertie and high spirit as much disliked. It is worthe of remembrance; as a signe of the freedom that he vied in his censures, euen whilst he liued in such a Court. Antiochus mulstered his Armie in presence of this famous Captaine: thinking, as may seeme, to haue made him with, that hee had bene ferued by such braue men in Italy. For they were gallantly decked, both Men, Horses, and Elephants, with such costly furniture of Gold, Silver, and Purple; as glittered with a terrible brauerie on a Sun-shine day. Whereupon the King, with pleasing himselfe with that goodly spectacle, asked Hannibal what hee thought; and whether all this were not enough for the Romans. Enough (said Hannibal) were the Romans the most courteous men in all the World: meaning, that all this Cost vpon the backs of Cowardly Asiaticus, was no better than a spoile to animate good Souldiers. How little this answer pleased the King; it is ealie to ghesse. The little vfe that hee made of this Carthaginian, relieves that his dislike of the man, caused him to loose the vfe of his seruice, when he stood in greatest need thereof.

The Scipios made all hast away from Rome as soone as they could. They carried with them, besides other Souldiers newly preit to the warre, about five thousand Voluntaries, that had serued vnder P. Africanus. There was also a Fleet of thirtie Quinquereme Gallies, and twentie Tirimies newly built, appointed vnto L. Emilius Regillus, that was chosen Admirall the same yeare for that Voyage. At their comming into Greece, they found the old Consul Glabrio besieging Amphissa a Citie of the Antiochians. The Antiochians after that they were denied peace, had expected him once again at Naupactus. Wherefore they not only fortified that Towne; but kept all the passages thereto leading; which heedlesly, as in a time of confusion, they had left vngarded the last yeare. Glabrio knowing this, decieued their expectation, and fel vpon Lamia; which being not long since much weakened by Philip, and now by him attempted on the sudden; was carried at the second assault. Thence went hee to Amphissa; which he had almost gotten; when L. Scipio, his successor, came with thirtene thousand Foot and five hundred Horse, and tooke charge of the Armie. The Towne of Amphissa was presently forsaken by the inhabitants: but they had a Cattle, or higher Towne, that was impregnable; whereunto they all retired. The Athenian Embassadours had dealt with P. Scipio, in behalle of the Antiochians; entreating him to stand their friend, and helpe them in obtaining some tolerable Condition of peace. He gaue them gentle words: and willed them to perswade the Antiochians, that they should faithfully and with true meaning desire it. This was gladly taken. But many messages passing to and fro: though Publius continued to put them in good hope; yet the Consul made still the same answer, with which they had bene chased from Rome. The conclusion was, That they should sue for a longer time of respite from warre: whereby at more leisure they might attend some better disposition of the Senate, or any helpful commoditie which time should afford. So they obtained halfe a yeares Truce: after which, the Winter was like to afford them another halfe yeares leisure of breathing. Hereof were not they more glad, than was P. Scipio: who thought all time lost, which with-held the Warre from passing ouer into Asia.

The busines of Antiochia being thus laid aside: and the old Consul Glabrio sent home into Italy: the Scipios marched into Thessaly; intending thence to take their way by Land, through Macedon and Thrace vnto the Hellespont. Yet they considered, That hereby they must commit themselves vnto the loyalty of King Philip: who might either doe them some mischeite by the way, if he were disposed to watch a notable advantage: or at the least, would be vnfaithfull, though he were not so courageous; courageous, yet might he take such order with the Thracians, that euen for want of victualles, if by no greater inconuenience, they should be disgraciously forced to returne. He had promised them the vtmost of his furtherance: wherein, whether he meant sincerely, they thought to make some triall; by causing a Gentleman to ride Post vnto him, and obserue his doings as hee should take him on the sudden. This he was merrie at a feast, and drinking, when the Messenger came: whom he louingly bad welcom; and shewed him the next day, not onely what prouision of victualles he had made for the Armie, but how he had made bridges ouer the riuers, and mended the bad waies by which they were to passe. With these good newes Gracchus returned backe in half vnto the Scipio's: who entring into Alacedon, found all things in a readines, that might helpe to aduance their iourne. The King entertaigned them royally; and brought them on their way, euen to the Hellepont: where they staid a good while, vntill their Nauie was in readinesse to transpore them into Asia.

Much was done at Sea in the beginning of this yeere; though, for the most part, little of importance. Polyxenus, the Admirall of Antiochus, was a banished Rhodian: true to the King; and desirous of reuenge vpon his Countreimen that had expelled him. He, hearing that the Rhodian Fleet was at Samos, the Romans and Eumenes hauing not as yet put to Sea; thought to doe somewhat vpon those that were so early in their diligence, before their fellows should arrive to helpe them. Yet went he craftily to worke; and sent word, as in great secrecie, to the Rhodian Admirall, That if the sentence of his banishment might be repealed, He would, in requittall thereof, betray all the Kings Fleet. After many passages to and fro, this was belieued: and the Rhodian Admirall grew so carelesse, expecting til when he should receiue a watchword from Polyxenus; that he himselfe was taken by Polyxenus in his owne Hauens. The Kings Fleet setting forth from Ephesus by night; and, for feare of being discouered, reeling one day in harbour by the way; came the second night to Samos: where, by morning, it was readie to enter the Hauens. Pausistratus the Rhodian Admirall seeing this, thought it his best way of resistance, to bestow his men on the two head-lands or points of the Hauens; so to gard the mouth of it: for that he saw no likelihood of defending himselfe by Sea. But Polyxenus had already landed some companies, in another part of the Island: which falling vpon the backe of Pausistratus, compelled him to alter his directions, and command his men aboard. This could not be without great confusion: so as the enemies tooke him out of all order; and sunke or boarded all his Nauie, siue excepted, that by a sudden deuice made shift to escape. Each of them hung out a burning Cresset vpon two poles, at the Booke-head: and then rowed forwards directly vpon the Enemy: who hauing not bethought himselfe what shift to make against such vnexpected danger of firing, was content to giue way vnto these desperate Gallies; for feare lest they should burne, together with themselves, a part of the Kings Fleet.

Not long after this, the Romans had some losse by tempest: whereof Polyxenus could not take such advantage as he had hoped; because, putting to Sea for that purpose, He was driuen backe againe by the like foule weather. But the Rhodians, to shew that they were not discouraged, let forth twentie other Gallies: the Romans also with King Eumenes repaired their Fleet; and all of them together, in great bravery, presented battaile to Polyxenus before the Hauens of Ephesus. When hee durst not accept it: they went from place to place, attempting many things, as cyther they were entreated by the Rhodians, or perswaded by some appearing hopes of doing good. Yet performed they little or nothing: for that one while they were hindred by stormes at Sea; and another while by strong resistance, made against them at Land.

Eumenes with his Fleet was compelled to forsake them; and returne home to the defence of his owne Kingdome. For Antiochus wasted all the grounds about Elaa and

and Pergamus: and leauing his sonne Seleucus to besiege the royall Citie of Pergamus, did with the rest of his Armie spoile the whole Countrie thereabout. Attalus, the brother of King Eumenes, was then in Pergamus; hauing with him no better men to defend the Citie, than were they that lay against it. Wherefore hee had reason to stand in feare; being too much inferior in number. There came to his aid a thousand Foot, and an hundred Horle of the Acheans: old souldiours all, and trayned vnder Philopamen; whose scholler, in the Art of war, Diophanes their Commander was. This Diophanes, beholding from the walles of Pergamus, which was an high Towne, the demeanour of the Enemy; began to didaine, that such men as they should hold him besieged. For Seleucus his Armie which was encamped at the hill-foot, seeing that none durst fallie forth vpon them, grew so carelesse: as other wise, than by spoyling all behind their backs, they seemed to forget that they were in an Enemies Countrie. Diophanes therefore spake with Attalus: and told him that hee would goe forth to visit them. Attalus had no liking to this aduenture; for he said, that the match was nothing equall. But the Achean would needes haue his will: and issuing forth, encamped not far from the Enemy. They of Pergamus thought him little better than mad. As for the besiegers; they wondered at first what his meaning was: but when they saw that he held himselfe quiet, they made a iett of his boldnes; and laughed to see with what a handfull of men he looked so stoutly. So they returned vnto their former negligence and disorders. Which Diophanes perceiving, hee commanded all his men to follow him, euen as fast as they wel might: and he himselfe, with the hundred Horle, brake out on the sudden vpon the Station that was next at hand. Verie few of the enemies had their Horles readie saddled, but more few, or none, had the hearts to make resistance: so as hee draue them all out of their Campe; and chased them as far as he might fairly aduenture, with great slaughter of them, and no losse of his owne. Hereat all the Citizens of Pergamus (who had couered the wals of the Towne, men and women, to beholde this spectacle) were verie ioyfull; and highly magnified the vertue of these Acheans. Yet would they not therefore issue forth of their gates, to helpe the Acheans in doing what remained to be done. The next day Seleucus encamped halfe a mile further from the Towne, than hee had done before: and against him went forth Diophanes the second time; who quietly rested awhile in his old Station. When they had staid many houres, looking who should begin: Seleucus, in faire order as he came, withdrew himselfe toward his lodging that was further off. Diophanes moued not whilest the Enemy was in sight: but as soone as the ground between them hindred the prospect, he followed them in all hast, & soone ouertaking them with his Horle charged them in Rere; so as he brake them, and with all his forces pursued them at the heeles, to their verie Trenches. This boldnes of the Acheans, and the basenes of his owne men, caused Seleucus to quit the feige, little to his honour. Such being the qualitie of these Asiaticques; Philopamen had cause to tell the Romans, That hee enuied their victorie. For when Antiochus lay fasting at Chalcis after his marriage, and his souldiours berooke themselves to Riot, as it had bene in a time of great securitie: a good man of war might haue cut all their throates, euen as they were tripling in their victualing houles; which Philopamen said that hee would haue done, had he bin General of the Acheans; & not, as he then was, a private man. Antiochus was full of busines: and turning his care from one thing to another, with a great deale of trauaile, brought almost nothing to passe. He had bene at Pergamus: into which Eumenes, leauing the Romans, did put himselfe with a few of his Horle and light armature. Before Pergamus he left his sonne as before hath bene shewed, and went to Elaa: whither hee heard that Amylius the Roman Admirall was come, to bring succour to Eumenes. There hee made an Ouerthrow of peace: about which to consult, Eumenes was sent for by Amylius, and came from Pergamus. But when it was considered, that no conclusion could be made without the Consul; this Treatie brake off. Then followed the Ouerthrow newly mentioned;

oned; which caused Seleucus to give over the seige of Pergamus. Afterwards, foure or fise Townes of scarce any worth or note were taken by the King; and the Syrian Fleet, being of fuen and thurte Saile, was beaten by the Rhodian which was of like number. But of this victorie the Rhodians had no great cause to reioyce: for that Hannibal the Carthaginian, who, together with Apollonius a Courtier of Antiochus, was Admirall of the Syrians, did them in manner as great hurt as they could docto Apollonius; and having the victorie taken out of his hand by Apollonius his flight, yet made such a retreat, that the Rhodians durst not farre adventure vpon him. Now of these Actions which were but as Praefaces vnto the war; the last and greatest was a victorie of the Romans by Sea, against Polyxenidas the Kings Admirall. The battaile was fought by Myonesius a Promontorie in Asia: where Polyxenidas had with him fourescore and nine Gallies; and fise of them greater, than any of the Romans. This being all the strength which he could make by Sea: we may note the vanitie of those bragges, wherewith Antiochus vanted the last yeare, That his Armada should couer all the shores of Greece. The Romans had eight and fiftie Gallies; the Rhodians two and twentie: the Roman being the stronger built, and more stoutly manned; the Rhodian more light-timberd and thin plankt, hauing all aduantage of speed, and good Sea-men. Neither forgot they to helpe themselues by the same deuice; with which, fise of their Gallies had lately cleaped from Samos. For with fire in their prowes they ran vpon the Enemie: who declining them for feare, laid open his side: and was thereby in greater danger of being stemmed. After no long fight, the Kings Naue hoyle away: and hauing a faire wind, bore away toward Ephesus as fast as they could. Yet forie of their Gallies they left behind them: wherof thirteene were taken: all the rest burnt or sunke. The Romans and their fellows lost onely two or three ships: but got hereby the absolute Masterie of the Sea.

The report of this misadventure, may seeme to haue taken from Antiochus all vse of reason. For as if no hope had bene remayning, to defend those places that hee held in Europe: Hee presently with-drew his Garrisons from Lysimachia: which might easily haue bene kept, euen till the end of Winter following, and haue reduced the besiegers (if the siege had bene continued oblatinately) to termes of great extremitie. Hee also gaue ouer the seige of Colephon: and laying aside all thought saue onely of defence, drew together all his Armie; and sent for helpe to his father-in-law, King Ariarathes the Cappadocian.

Thus the Roman Consul, without impediment, not onely came to the Hellespont; but had yielded vnto him all places there, belonging to Antiochus on Europe side. The Fleet was then also in readines, to transport him ouer into Asia: where Eumenes had taken such care before, that He landed quickly at his owne good ease; euen as if the Countrey had bene his already. The first newes that hee heard of the Enemie, was by an Embassadour that came to sue for peace. This Embassadour declared in his Masters name, That the same things which had hindered him from obtaining peace of the Romans heretofore, did now perswade him, that he should easily come to good agreement with them. For in all disputations heretofore, Smyrna, Lampacius, and Lysimachia, had bene the places about which they varied. Seeing therefore the King had now already giuen ouer Lysimachia; and was further purposed, not to strue with the Romans about Lampacius and Smyrna: what reason was there, why they should neede to trouble him with war? It was their desire, that any other Townes vpon the Coast of Asia, not mentioned by them in any former Treaties, should be also set at libertie, or other wise deliuered into their hands: the King would not refuse to gratifie them therein. Briefly, let them take some part of Asia: so as the bounds, diuiding them from the King, might not be vncertaine; and it should be quietly put into their hands. If all this were not enough: the King would likewise beare halfe the Charges, wherewith they had bene in this war. So praying the Romans to hold themselves contented with these good offers, and not to be too insolent vpon confidence of their fortune; Hee expected their their answer. These offers which to the Embassadour seemed so great, were iudged by the Romans to be verie little. For they thought it reasonable, that the King should beare all the charges of the warre, since it began through his only fault: and that He should not onely depart out of those few Townes, which he held in Asia and Ionis; but quite out of Asia the lesse, and keepe himselfe on the other side of Mount Taurus. When the Embassadour therefore saw, that no better bargain could be made, He dealt with P. Scipio in priuate: and to him he promised a great quantitie of gold, together with the free restitution of his sonne, who (it is vncertaine by what mischance) was taken prisoner, and most honourably entertained by the King. Scipio would not hearken to the offer of gold: nor otherwise to the restitution of his sonne, than vpon Condition, That it might be with making such amends for the benefit, as became a priuate man. As for the publicke busines: Hee onely said thus much, That since Antiochus had already forsaken Lysimachia, and suffered the war to take hold on his owne Kingdome; there was now none other way for him, than either to fight, or yeeld to that which was required at his hands. Wherefore, said He, tell your King in my name, that I would aduise him to refuse no Condition whereby he may haue peace.

The King was not any whit moued with this aduice. For seeing that the Consul demanded of him no lesse, than if he had bene already subdued: little reason was there, that he should feare to come to battaile; wherein he could loofe, as hee thought, no more, than by seeking to auoid it he must giue away. He had with him threecore and ten thousand Foot, and twelue thousand Horse; besides two and fiftie Indian Elephants, and many Chariots armed with hookes or sythes, according to the maner of the Eastern Countries. Yet was hee nothing pleased, to heare that the Consul drew neare him apace, as one hastning to fight. But howsoever he was affected; Hee made so little shew of feare, that hearing P. Scipio to lie sick at Eles, He sent thither vnto him his sonne without ranfome: as one both desirous to comfort this noble Warriour in his sicknes, and withall not desirous to retaine the yong Gentleman for a pledge of his owne safetie. Thus ought his bountie to be constant. Otherwise it might be suspected, That herein he dealt craftily. For since he could haue none other ranfome of Scipio, than such as an honourable man, that had no great store of wealth, might pay: better it was to doe such a courtesie before the battell, as would afterwards haue bene little worth; than to slay vntill the Romans, perhaps victorious, should exact it at his hands. P. Scipio was greatly comforted with the recouerie of his sonne: so as the ioy thereof was thought, to haue bene much auailable vnto his health. In recompence of the Kings humanity, He said onely thus much vnto those that brought him this acceptable Present, I am now able to make your King none other amends, than by aduising him not to fight, vntill hee shall heare that I am in the Campe. What he meant by this, it is hard to coniecture. Antiochus resolved to follow his counsaile: and therefore withdrew himselfe from about Thyatira, beyond the Riuer of Phrygius or Hyllus, vnto Magnesia by Sipylus: where encamping, He fortified himselfe as strongly as hee could. Thither followed him L. Scipio the Consul; and late downe within foure miles of him. About a thousand of the Kings Horse, most of them Gallo-Greekes, came to bid the Romans welcome: of whom at first they slue some; and were anon, with some losse driuen backe ouer the Riuer. Two daies were quietly spent, whilst neither the King nor the Romans would passe the water. The third day the Romans made the adventure: wherein they found no disturbance; nor were at all opposed, vntill they came within two miles and an halfe of Antiochus his Campe. There, as they were taking vp their lodging, they were charged by threethousand, Horse and Foote: whom the ordinarie Corps du gard repelled. Foure daies together after this, each of them brought forth their Armies; and set them in order before the Trenches, without aduancing any further. The fift day the Romans came halfe way forward, and presented battaile; which the King would not accept. Thereupon the Consul fulooke aduise what was to be done. For either they must fight vpon whatsoeuer disadvantage, or else resolve to abide by it all Winter, farre from any Countrey of their friends, and therefore subject vnto many difficulties: vnlesse they would staine their honour by returning backe, to winter in a more conuenient place; and so deferre the war vntill the next Spring. The Roman souldiour was thoroughly perswaded of that Enemies base temper. Wherefore it was the generall Crie, that this great Armie should be assailed, euen in the Campe where it lay: as if rather there were so many beasts to be slaughtered, than men to be fought with. Yet a day or two passed, in discouering the fortifications of Antiochus, and the safest way to set vpon him. All this while P. Scipio came not. Wherefore the King, being loath to dilhearten his men, by seeming to stand in feare of the Enemy; resolved to put the matter to triall. So when the Romans tooke the field againe, and ordered their Battailles: He also did the like; and advanced so farre, that they might vnderstand his meaning to fight.

The Roman Armie consisted of foure Legions, two Roman and two Latine: in each of which were five thousand and foure hundred men. The Latines, as usually, were in the points; the Romans, in the maine battell. All of them, according to their wonted forme, were diuided into Maniples. The Latins had the leading: after them followed the Principes; at such distance as was vsual; and last of all, the Triarij. Now beside these, there were about three thousand Auxiliaries; partly Acheans; and partly such as belonged to Eumenes: which were placed in an equal Front beyond the Latines in the right wing. Vnto all (save some five hundred Cretians, and of the Traians were almost three thousand Horse: of which, Eumenes had brought thither eight hundred; the rest being Roman. The left wing was fenced by the bankes of the river: yet foure Troops of horse were placed there; though such helpe seemed in a manner needlesse. Two thousand Voluntaries, Macedonians and Thracians, were left to guard the Campe. The Consul had with him sixteene African Elephants, which hee bestowed in his Rere: forasmuch as had they come to fight with those of Antiochus, they only would haue serued to discourage his men; as being sure to be beaten: the Indian being farre the greater, and more courageous beasts: whereof Antiochus had likewise much aduantage in number.

The Kings Armie being compounded of many Nations, diuersly appointed, and not all accustomed to one manner of fight, was ordered according to the severall kinds, in such wise as each might be of most vse. The maine strength of his Foot consisted in sixteene thousand, armed all Macedonian-like, and called Phalangiers. These hee placed in the midst, and diuided into tenne Battalions: euery one hauing two and thirtie in File, and fiftie in Front. Betwene euery Battalion were two Elephants, goodly beasts, and such as being adorned with Frontals, high Crests, Towers on their backs, and besides him that gouerned the Elephant, foure men in euery Tower, made a gallant and terrible shew. On the right hand of these were fiftene hundred Horse of the Gallo-Greekes: then, three thousand Barbd Horse: and Regiment of almost a thousand Horse, called the Agema, that were all Medians, the choice of the Countrey, and accompanied by some others. All which Troopes of Horse, diuided in their severall kinds, doe seeme to haue followed one another in depth, rather than to haue bene stretched out in Front. Adjoining to these were sixteene Elephants together in one flocke. A little further to the right hand, was the Kings owne Regiment: called the Argyaspides or Silver Shields, by a name borrowed from their furniture, but nothing like so valiant as those of the same name, that had serued vnder Great Alexander: then, twelue hundred Archers on horsebacke, three thousand light-armed Foote, two thousand and five hundred Archers of Assyria; with foure thousand slingers and Archers of the Cirtians, and Elymans. On the left-hand of the Phalangiers, were placed the like numbers of Gallo-Greekes and Barbd Horse: as also two thousand Horse that were sent from Ariarathes, with two thousand and seven hundred of diuers Nations, Nations; and a Regiment of a thousand Horse more lightly armed, that were called the Kings Troupe, being Syrians, Phrygians, and Lydians. In Front of all these Horse were the Chariots armed with Hooks or Sythes, and the Dromedaries, whereon sat Arabians with long Rapiers, that would serue to reach from those high Camels. Beyond these were, as in the right wing, a rabble of many Nations, Carians, Cilicians, Pamphylians, Pisidians, Cyrtians, Elymans, and many others, hauing also with them sixteene Elephants. Antiochus himselfe commanded in the right wing: Seleucus in the left: and three of his principall Captaines commanded ouer the Phalangiers.

The first onset was giuen by the Dromedaries, and armed Chariots: of which the one, being like to terrifie the Horse, the other, to breake the Squadrons of the Foot, Eumenes with a few light-armed Cretians, Archers, Darters, and Slingers, easily made frustrate the danger threatned by them both. For with howtings, and noyses, and some wounds, they were driuen out of the field; and running backe vpon their owne men, did the same harme which they had intended to the Enemies. Wherefore the Roman Horse following this aduantage, charged vpon the left wing: where they found no resistance; some being out of order; others being without courage. It is shamefull to rehearse, and so strange, that it may hardly seeme credible: that the Phalangiers, with such varietie of Auxiliaries, made little or no resistance, but all of them fled, in manner, as soone as they were charged. Onely the King, Antiochus himselfe, being in the left wing of his owne battaille: and seeing the Latines, that stood opposite vnto him, weakly flanked with Horse; gaue vpon them courageously, and forced them to retire. But M. Amylius, that had the Guard of the Roman Campe, issued forth with all his power to helpe his fellowes: and, what by perswasion, what by threats, made them renewe the fight. Succour also came from the right wing, where the Romans were already victorious: whereof when Antiochus discouered the approach, he not onely turned his Horse about, but ranne away vpon the spur without further tarience. The Campe was defended a little while: and with no great valour, though by a great multitude that were fled into it. Antiochus is said to haue lost in this battaille fiftie thousand Foot, and foure thousand Horse; besides those that were taken. Of the Romans, there were not slaine above three hundred Foot, and foure and twentie Horse: of Eumenes his followers five and twentie.

Antiochus fled to Sardis, and from thence to Apamea, the same night; hearing that Seleucus was gone thither before. He left the custodie of Sardis, and the Castle there, to one whom he thought faithful. But the Townesmen and Souldiers were so dismayed with the greatnesse of the Ouerthrow, that one mans faith was worth nothing. All the Townes in those parts, without expecting summons, yielded vpon themselves by Embassadors: whom they sent to the Romans, whilist they were on the way. Neyther were many dayes spent, ere Antiochus his Embassadour was in the Campe: hauing none other errand, than to know what it would please the Romans to impose vpon the King his Master. P. Scipio was now come to his brother: who obtained leaue to make the answer, because it should be gentle. They required no more than they had lately done: which was, That hee should quite abandon his Dominions on this side of Taurus. For their charges in that warre they required fiftene thousand Talents: five hundred in hand; two thousand and five hundred, when the Senate and People of Rome should haue confirmed the peace; and the other twelue thousand, in twelue yeares next ensuing by euen portions. Likewise they demanded foure hundred Talents for Eumenes; and some store of Corne, that was due to him vpon a reckoning. Now besides twentie hostages which they required, verie earnest they were to haue Hannibal the Carthaginian, and Thoon the Atolian, with some others who had stirred vp the King to this warre, deliuered into their hands. But any wise man might so easily haue perceiued, that it would be their purpose to make this one of their principall demands; as no great art was needfull to beguile their malice. The Kings Embassadour had full committion, to refuse nothing that should be enjoyed. Wherefore there was no more to doe, than to send immediately to Rome for the ratification of the Peace.

There were new Consuls chosen in the meane while at Rome, M. Fulvius, and Cn. Manlius Volso. The Ætolians desired peace, but could not obtaine it: because they would accept neyther of the two Conditions to them before propounded. So it was decreed, That one of the Consuls should make Warre vpon the Ætolians, the other, vpon Antiochus in Asia. Now though shortly there came newes, that Antiochus was already vanquished in battaile, and had submitted himselfe vnto all that could be required at his hands: yet since the State of Asia was not like to bee so thoroughly settled by one Victorie, but that many things might fall out wortheie to the Romans care; Cn. Manlius, to whome Asia fell by lot, had not his Province changed.

Soone after this came the Embassadors of King Antiochus to Rome, accompanied with the Rhodians and some others: yea by King Eumenes in person; whose presence added a goodly lustre to the businesse in hand. Concerning the peace to be made with King Antiochus, there was no disputation: it was generally approved. All the trouble was, about the distribution of the purchase. King Eumenes reckoned vp his owne deserts: and comparing himselfe with Masaniissa, hoped that the Romans would be more bountifull to him than they had bene to the Numidian, since they had found him a King indeed, whereas Masaniissa was onely such in title; and since both he and his father had alwayes bene their friends, even in the worit of the Roman fortune. Yet was there much adoe to make him tell what he would haue: He still referring himselfe to their courtesie; and they desiring him to speake plaine. At length he craued that they would bestow vpon him, as much of the Countre by them taken from Antiochus, as they had no purpose to keepe in their owne hands. Neyther thought hee it needfull, that they should trouble themselves with the care of giuing libertie to many of the Greeke Townes, that were on Asia side. For since the most of those Townes had bene partakers with the King in his Warre; it was no reason that they should be gainers by his ouerthrow. The Rhodians did not like of this. They desired the Senate to bee truly Patrons of the Græcian libertie; and to call to minde, that no small part of Greece it selfe had bene subiect vnto Philip, and serued him in his Warre: which was not alleadged against them as a cause why they should not be made free, after that Philip was ouercome. But the maine point whereon they insisted, was this, That the Victorie of the Romans against King Antiochus was so great, as easily might satisfie the desires of all their friends. The Senate was glad to heare of this; and very bountifullly gaue away so much, that euery one had cause to be well pleased.

Such end had the Warre against King Antiochus: after which, L. Cornelius Scipio, returning home, had granted vnto him the honour of a Triumph: the pompe whereof exceeded in riches, not onely that of Titus Quintius Flaminius, but of any ten that Rome had beheld vntill that day. Now forasmuch as the surname of The African had bene giuen vnto P. Scipio, it was thought conuenient by some, to reward L. Scipio with the title of The Asiatick: which the fortune of his Victorie had no lesse deserved, though the vertue, requisite to the purchase thereof, was no way correspondent.

The Ætolians, and the Galgogreekes, vanquished by the Roman Consuls FVLVIVS and MANLIVS. MANLIVS hardly obtains a Triumph: being charged (among other objections) with attempting to haue pisse the bounds appointed as fatal to the Romans by SIBYLLE. Of SIBYLLES Prophecies; the Bookes of HERMES; and that Inscription, SIMONI DEO SANCTO. The ingratitude of Rome to the two SCIPIOES: and the beginning of faction among the Roman Nobilitie.

MARC. FVLVIVS and Cn. Manlius had the same charge diuided betwene them, which L. Cornelius Scipio, now styled Asiaticus, had lately vndergone. It was found more than one in his worke, to looke at once to Greece and to Asia. And for this reason was it apparent, that L. Scipio had granted so long a Truce to the Ætolians. But since, in this long Interim of Truce, that haughty little Nation had not sought to humble it selfe to the Roman Maiestie, it was now to be brought vnto more lowlie termes than any other of the Greekes. The best was, that so great a storme fell not v unexpected vpon the Ætolians. They had foreseen the danger, when their Embassadors were vtterly denied peace at Rome: and they had provided the last remedie; which was, to entreat the Rhodians and Asiaticians to become intercessours for them. Neither were they so dejected, with any terrible apprehensions, that they could not well deuise, vpon helping themselves, euen by repurchase of Countreies lost, where they spied aduantage.

Poore King Aminander liued in exile among them, whilst Philip of Macedon kept, for him, possession of his Lands and Cattles. But the Atthamians (besides that manie of them bore a naturall affection to their owne Prince) hauing bene long accustomed to serue a Mountaine Lord, that conuersed with them after an homelie manner; could not endure the proud and insolent manner of command, ysed by the Captaines of Philip his Garrisons. They sent therefore some few of them to their King, and offered their seruice toward his restitution. At the first there were onely foure of them; neither grew they, at length, to more than two and fiftie, which vnderooke the worke. Yet assurance, that all the rest would follow, made Aminander willing to trie his fortune. He was at the borders with a thousand Ætolians, vpon the day appointed: at what time his two and fiftie aduenturers, hauing diuided themselves into foure parts, occupied, by the readie assistance of the multitude, foure the chiefe Townes in the Countre, to his vse. The fame of this good successe at first; with letters running from place to place, whereby men were exhorted to doe their best in helping forward the Action: made the Lieutenants of Philip vnable to thinke vpon resistance. One of them held the Towne of Theium a few daies; giuing thereby some leasure vnto his King to provide for the rescue. But when he had done his best, he was forced thence; and could onely tell Philip, whom he met on the way, that all was lost. Philip had brought from home six thousand men; of whom, when the greater part could not hold out, in such a running march, he left all saue two thousand behind him, & so came to Athenæum, a little Atthamian Castle, that till was his, as being on the frontier of Macedon. Thence he sent Zeno, who had kept Theium a while, to take a place lying ouer Argitheæ, that was chiefe of the Countre. Zeno did as he was appointed: yet neither he, nor the King, had the boldnesse to descend vpon Argitheæ, for that they might perceiue the Atthamians, all along the hill sides, readie to come downe vpon them, when they should be busie. Wherefore nothing was thought more honourable than a safe retreat: specially when Aminander came in sight with his thousand Ætolians. The Macedonians were called back, from wards Argitheæ, and presently withdrew by their King towards his owne borders. But they were not fullred to depart in quiet, at their pleasure.

The

The Athamanians and Ætolians way-layed them, and pursued them so closely, that their retreat was in manner of a plaine flight, with great losse of men and armes; few of those escaping, that were left behind, as to make a countenance of holding somewhat in the Countrey, vntill Philip his returne.

The Ætolians, hauing found the businesse of Athamania so easie, made attempt, in their owne behalfe, vpon the Amphilochians and Aperantians. These had belonged vnto their Nation, and were lately taken by Philip; from whom they diligently reuolted, and became Ætolian againe. The Dolopians lay next; that had bene cuer belonging to the Macedonian, and so did still purpose to continue. These tooke armes at first: but soone layed them away; seeing their neighbours readie to fight with them in the Ætolian quarrell, and seeing their owne King so hastily gone, as if he meant not to returne.

Of these victories the ioy was the lesse; for that newes came of Antiochus his last ouerthrow, and of M. Fuluius the new Consull his halting with an armie into Greece. Aminander sent his excuses to Rome, praying the Senate, not to take it in despight, that he had recovered his owne from Philip with such helpe as he could get. Neither seemes it that the Romans were much offended to heare of Philip his losses: for of this fault they neither were sharpe correctors, nor earnest reprouers. Fuluius went in hand with the businesse, about which he came, and layed siege to Ambracia, a goodly Citie, that had bene the chiefe seat of Pyrhus his Kingdome. With this he began, for that it was of too great importance to be abandoned by the Ætolians: yet could not to him be relieued, vnlesse they would adventure to fight vpon equall ground. To helpe the Ambracians, it was not in the Ætolians power: for they were, at the same time, vexed by the Ilyrians at sea, and readie to be driuen from their new conquest, by Perseus the sonne of Philip, who invaded the Countreies of the Amphilochians and Dolopians. They were vnable to deale with so many at once; and therefore as earnestly fought peace with the Romans, as they stoutly made head against the rest. In the meane while the Athenian and Rhodian Embassadors came; who besought the Consull to graunt them peace. It helped well that Ambracia made strong resistance, and would not be terrified, by any violence of the assaillants, or danger that might seeme to threaten. The Consull had no desire to spend halfe his time about one Citie, and so he driuen to leaue vnto his succesor the honour of finishing the warre. Wherefore he gladly hearkened vnto the Ætolians, and bad them seeke peace with faithfull intent, without thinking it ouer-deare, at a reasonable price; considering with how great a part of his Kingdome their friend Antiochus had made the same purchase. He also gaue leaue to Aminander, offering his seruice as a mediator, to put himselfe into Ambracia, and trie what good his persuasions might doe with the citizens. So, after many demands and excuses, the conclusion was such, as was grieuous to the weaker, but not vsuflerable. The same Embassadors of the Athenians and Rhodians accompanied those of the Ætolians to Rome, for procuring the confirmation of peace. Their eloquence and credit was the more needfull in this intercession, for that Philip had made verie grieuous complaint about the losse of those Countreies, which they had lately taken from him. Hereof the Senate could not but take notice; though it hindered not the peace, which those good Mediatours of Rhodes and Athens did earnestly sollicite. The Ætolians were bound to vphold the maiestie of the people of Rome, and to observe diuers articles, which made them lesse free, and more obnoxious to the Romans, than any people of Greece; they hauing bene the first that called these their Masters into the Countrey. The Isle of Cephalenia was taken from them by the Romans: who kept it for themselves (as not long since they had gotten Zacynthus from the Achaens, by listely preffing their owne right) that so they might haue possession along the coast of Greece, whilst they seemed to forbeare the Countrey. But concerning those places, whereto Philip, or others, might lay claime, there was set downe an Order so perplexed, as would necessarily require require to haue the Romans Iudges of the controuerries, when they should arise. And hereof good vse will be shortly made: when want of eloimient elswhere, shall cause a more Lordlie Inquisition to be held, vpon the affaires of Macedon and Greece.

Cn. Manlius, the other Consull, had at the same time warre in Asia, with the Gallagrees and others. His Armie was the same that had followed L. Scipio; of whole victorie, his acts were the consummation. Hee visited those Countreies on the higher side of Taurus, that had scarce heard of the Romans: to whom they were abandoned by Antiochus. Among these there were some petty Lords, or Tyrants, some free Cities, and some that were together at warres, without regard of the great alteration hapned in Asia. From euery of these he got somewhat; and by their quarrels found occasion to visit those Prouinces, into which hee should els hee wanted an errand. He was cūen loaden with bootie, when, hauing fetcht a compasse about Asia, he came at length vpon the Gallagrees. These had long dominated ouer the Countrey: though of late times, it was rather the fame and terror of their forepassed acts, than any present vertue of theirs, which held them vp in reputation. Of the Romans they had lately such triall, when they serued vnder King Antiochus, as made them to know themselves farre the worse men. Wherefore they thought it no small part of their fastie, that they dwelt vpon the Riuier Haly, in an Inland Countrey, where those enemies were not like to search them out. But when such hopes failed; and when some Princes of their owne Nation, that had bene friends of Eumenes, exhorted the rest to yield: then was no counsaile thought so good, as to forsake their houses and Countrey, and, with all that they could carrie or drue, to betake themselves vnto the high mountaines of Olympus and Margana. These mountaines were exceeding hard of ascent, though none should vndertake the custodie. Being therefore well manned and vntailed for a long time; as also the naturall strength being helpt, by such fortification as promised greatest assurance: it was thought, that the Consull would either forbeare the attempt of forcing them, or easily be repelled; and that finally, when he had staied there awhile, winter, and much want, should force him to dislodge. Yet all this auailed not. For whereas the Gallagrees had bene carelesse of furnishing themselves with casting weapons, as if the stones would haue serued well enough to that purpose: the Romans, who came farre otherwise appointed, found greater aduantage in the difference of armes, than impediment in disadvantage of ground. Archers and Slingers did easily preuaile against casters of stones; especially being such as were these Gallagrees, neither exercised in that manner of fight, nor hauing prepared their stones before hand, but catching vp what lay next, the too great, and the too little, oftner than those of a fit size. Finally, the Barbarians, wanting defensive armes, could not hold out against the arrowes and weapons of the Roman light armature: but were driuen from a peece of ground, which they had vndertaken to make good, vp into their campe on the top of the mountaine; and being forced out of their Campe, had none other way left, than to cast themselves headlong downe the steepe rocks. Few of the men escaped alive: all their wiues, children, and goods, became a prey vnto the Romans. In the very like manner, were the rest of that Nation overcome soone after, at the other mountaine: onely more of them saved themselves by flight, as hauing fairer way at their backes.

These warres being ended: Fuluius and Manlius were appointed, by the Senate, each of them to retaine as Proconsul his Prouince for another year. Fuluius, in his second year, did little or nothing. Manlius gaue peace to those whom hee had vanquished; as likewise to Ariarathes the Cappadocian, and some others, not by him vanquished, but submitting themselves for feare of the Roman armes. Hee drew from them all what profit he could: and laid vpon them such conditions, as hee thought expedient. He also did finish the league of peace with Antiochus; whereto

he swore, and received the Kings oath by Embassadors, whom hee sent for that purpose. Finally, having set in order the matters of Asia, he tooke his way toward the Hellepont, loaden with spoile, as carrying with him (besides other treasures) all that the Gallioyces had in so many yeares extorted, from the wealthie Prouinces that lay round about them. Neither did this Armie of Manlius returne home, rich in money alone, or cattails, or things of needfull vse, which the Romans could have bene wont to take as the only good purchase; but furnished with sumptuous household-stuffe, and slaves of price, excellent Cookes, and Multicians for banquets, and, in a word, with the feedes of that luxurie, which finally ouer-grew and choked the Roman vertue.

The Countrey of Thrace lay betwene Hellepont and the Kingdome of Macedon, which way Manlius was to take his iourne homeward. L. Scipio had found no impediment among the Thracians: either for that he passed through them, without any such bootie as might prouoke them; or perhaps rather, because Philip of Macedon had taken order, that the Barbarians should not stirre. But when Manlius came along with an huge traine of baggage; the Thracians could not so well containe themselves. Neither was it thought, that Philip tooke it otherwise than verie pleasantly, to haue this Roman Armie robbed, and well beaten on the way. He had cause to be angrie; seeing how little himselfe was regarded, and what great rewards were giuen to Eumenes. For he vnder stood, and afterwards gaue the Romans to vnderstand, that Eumenes could not haue abidden in his owne Kingdome, if the People of Rome had not made warre in Asia: whereas contrariwise, Antiochus had offered vnto himselfe three thousand talents, and fiftie ships of warre, to take part with him and the Ætolians; promising morcouer to restore vnto him all the Greece Cities, that had bene taken from him by the Romans. Such being the difference betwene him and Eumenes, when the warre began: he thought it no euill dealing of the Romans, after their victorie, to giue away not onely the halfe of Asia, but Chersonesus and Lysimachia in Europe, to Eumenes; whereas vpon himselfe they bestowed not any one Towne. It agreed not indeed with his Nobilitie, to goe to Rome and begge Prouinces in the Senate, as Eumenes and the Rhodiens had lately done. He had entertained louingly the two Scipios, whom he thought the most honourable men in Rome; and was growne into neare acquaintance with Publius, holding correspondence with him by letters, whereby hee made himselfe acquainted with the warres in Spain and Africke. This perhaps he deemed sufficient, to breed in the Romans a due respect of him. But Eumenes tooke a surer way. For the Scipio's had not the disposing of that which they wanne from Antiochus: as neither indeed had Manlius, nor the ten Delegates assisting him; but the Senate of Rome, by which those Delegates were chosen, and instructed how to proceed. When Philip therefore saw the vpstart Kings of Pergamus, whom he accounted as base companions, advanced so highly, and made greater than himselfe; yea himselfe vnregarded, contemned, and exposed to many wrongs: then found he great cause to wish, that he had not so hastily declared himselfe against Antiochus, or rather that hee had ioined with Antiochus and the Ætolians, by whom he might haue bene freed from his insolent masters. But what great argument of such discontentednesse the Macedonian had, we shall verie shortly be vrged to discouerie more at large. At the present it was beleued that the Thracians were by him set on, to assaile the Romans passing through their Countrey. They knew all advantages: and they fell, vnexpected, vpon the carriages, that were bestowed in the midst of the Armie; whereof part had alreadye pallid a dangerous wood, through which the baggage followed; part was not yet so farre advanced. There was enough to get, and enough to lesue behind: though both the getting, and the sauing, did cost many liues, as well of the Barbarians as of the Romans. They fought vntill it grew night: and then the Thracians withdrew themselves, not without as much of the bootie as was to their full content. And of such trouble there was more, though lesse dangerous, before the

the Armie could get out of Thrace into Macedon. Through the Kingdome they had a faire march into Epirus; and so to Apollonia, which was their handle of Greece.

To Manlius, and to Fulvius, when each of them returned to the Citie, was granted the honour of Triumph. Yet not without contradiction: especially to Manlius; whom some of the ten Delegates, appointed to assist him, did very bitterly taxe, as an vnworthy Commander. Touching the rest of their accusation; it sufficeth that he made good answere, and was approved by the chiefe of the Senate. One clause is worthe of more particular consideration. Reprehending his desire to haue hindered the peace with Antiochus; they said, That with much adoe he was kept from leading his Armie ouer Taurus, and aduenturing vpon the calamitie threatened by Sybil's verses, vnto those that should passe the fatal bounds. What calamitie or overthrow this was, wherewith Sybil's prophetic threatned the Roman Captaine or Armie, that should passe ouer Taurus, I doe not conceiue. Pompey was the first, that marched with an Armie beyond those limits: though the victories of Lucullus had opened vnto him the way, and had before hand wonne, in a fort, the Countreies on the other side of the Mount; which Lucullus gaue to one of Antiochus his race, though Pompey occupied them for the Romans. But we finde not, that either Lucullus or Pompey suffered any losse, in presuming to neglect the bounds appointed by Sybil. Indeed the accomplishment of this prophetic, fell our neare about one time, with the restitution of Ptolemie King of Egypt; that was forbidden vnto the Romans by the fame Sybil. It may therefore seeme to haue had reference, vnto the same things, that were denounced, as like to happen vpon the reduction of the Egyptian King. Whether the Oracles of Sybil had in them any truth, and were not, as Tullie noteth, forced at randome in the large field of Time, there to take root, and get credit by euent; I will not here dispute. But I hold this more probable, than that the restitution of Ptolemie to his Kingdome by Gabinus the Roman, should haue any way betokened the coming of our Sauiour: as some both ancient and moderne Christian Writers, haue bene well pleased to interpret Sybil in that prophetic. Of the Sybil's predictions I haue sometimes thought reuerendlie: though not knowing what they were (as I thinke, few men know) yet following the common beleefe and good authoritie. But obseruation of the shamefull Idolatrie, that vpon all occasions was advanced in Rome by the bookes of Sybil, had well preuailed vpon my credulitie, and made mee suspect, though not the faith and pious meaning, yet the iudgement of Ensebius: when that learned and excellent worke of smaller Casaubon vpon the Annales of Cardinal Baronius, did altogether free me from mine error, making it apparent, That not only those prophecies of Sybil, wherein Christ so plainly was foretold, but euen the bookes of Hermes, which haue borne such reputation, were no better than counterfeited peeces, and at first entertained (whosoever deuised them) by the vnderiect zeale of such, as delighted in seeing the Christian Religion strengthened with foreine proofs. And in the same ranke, I thinke, we ought to place that notable Historie, reported by Ensebius from no meane Authors, Of the honour which was done to Simon Magus in Rome; namely of an Altar to him erected, with an inscription Simoni Deo Sancto, that is, To Simon the holy God. For what can be more strange, than that a thing so memorable, and so publike, should haue bene quite omitted by Tacitus, by Suetonius, by Dion, and by all which wrote of those times? Philosophers and Poets would not haue suffered the matter to escape in silence, had it bene true; neither can it be thought that Seneca, who then liued and flourished, would haue abstained from speaking any word of an Argument so famous. Wherefore I am persuaded, that this inscription, Simoni Deo Sancto, was, by some bad Criticisme, taken amisse in place of SEMONI SANGO: a title foure hundred yeares older than the time of Simon Magus. For the goods of one Vitruuius a Rebel, had many ages before bene consecrated SEMONI SANGO, that is, To the Spirit or Demi god Sangus, in whose Chapell they were bestowed. So as either by the ill shape of the old Roman letters, letters, or by some spoile that Time had wrought vpon them; it might easily come to passe, that the words should be misse-read, SIMONI SANCTO, and that some Christian who had heard of Simon Magus, but not of Sanguis, thereupon should frame the coniecture, which now passeth for a true Historie. Such coniectures, being entertained without examination, find credit by Tradition, whereby also, many times, their falshood is amended, and made more historically, than was conceived by the Author. But it cannot be safe, to let our faith (which ought to stand firme vpon a sure foundation) lean euer-hardly on a well painted, yet rotten, post.

Now concerning the Triumph of Cn. Manlius, it may be numbered among a few of the richest, which euer the Citie beheld. Out of that which he brought into the Treasurie, was made the last payment of those monies, which the Commonwealth had borrowed from priuate men, in the second Punicke warre. So long was it, that Rome had still some feeling of Hannibal: which being past, there was remaining neither care, nor memorie, of any danger. His Triumph of Manlius was desired by him, euen as long as he well could: for that he thought it not safe, to make his entrance into the Citie, vntill the heat of an Inquisition, then raging therein, should be allayed. The two Scipios were called, one after other, into iudgement, by two Tribunes of the People; men, only by this accusation, knowne to Posteritie. P. Scipio the African, with whom they began, could not endure that such vnworthy men should question him, of purloining from the Common Treasurie, or of being hired with bribes by Antiochus, to make an ill bargain for his Countrey. When therefore his day of answer came; he appeared before the Tribunes, not humbly as one accused, but followed by a great traine of his friends and Clients, with which he passed through the middelt of the Assemblies, and offered himselfe to speake. Having audience, he told the People, That vpon the same day of the year he had fought a great battaile with Hannibal, and finished the Punicke Warre by a signall victorie. In memorie whereof, hee thought it no fit season to bragge at the Law; but intended to visit the Capitoll, and there give thanks to Iupiter and the rest of the gods, by whose grace, both on that day and at other times, he had well and happily discharged the most weightie businesse of the Common wealth. And hereto he invited with him all the Citizens: requesting, that if euer since the seuenteenth year of his life, vntill he now grew old, the honourable places by them conferred vpon him, had preuented the capacitie of his age, and yet his desires had exceeded the greatness of those honourable places; then would they pray, that the Princes and great ones of their Citie might still be like to him. These words were heard with great approbation: so as all the people, euen the Officers of the Court, followed Scipio; leaving the Tribunes alone, with none about them, excepting their owne slaues and a Crier, by whom ridiculously they cited him to iudgement, vntill for verie shame, as not knowing what else to doe, they granted him, vnrequested, a further day. After this, when the African perceived that the Tribunes would not let fall their suit, but enforce him to submit himselfe to a disgracefull triall: he willingly relinquished the Citie, and his vnthankfull Romans, that could suffer him to vndergoe so much indignitie. The rest of his time he spent at Literum: quietly, with a few of his inward friends, and without any desire of seeing Rome againe. How many years he liued, or whether he liued one whole year, in this voluntarie banishment; it is vncertaine. The report of his dying in the same year, with Hannibal and Philopomen, as also of his priuate behaviour at Literum, render it probable, that he outliued the Tribuneship of his accusers; who meant to haue drawne him backe to his answer, if one of their Colleagues (as one of them had power to hinder all the rest from proceeding) had not caused them to desist. Howsoeuer it was; the same Tribunes went more sharply to worke with L. Scipio the Alatike. They propounded a Decree vnto the People, touching monie received of Antiochus, and not brought into the common Treasurie; That the Senate should giue charge vnto one of the Prætors, to inquire, and iudicially determine, thereof. In fauour of this Decree an Oration was made by Cato, the supposed author of these contentions, and instigator of the Tribunes. He was a man of great, but not perfect, vertue: temperate, valiant, and of singular indutrie; frugal also, both of the publike, and of his owne; so as in this kinde he was euen faultie: for though he would not be corrupted with bribes, yet was he vnmercifull and vnconscionable, in seeking to encrease his owne wealth, by such meanes as the Law did warrant. Ambition was his vice; which being poysoned with enue, troubled both himselfe, and the whole Citie, whilst he liued. His meane birth caused him to hate the Nobilitie; especially those that were in chiefe estimation. Neither did he spare to bite at such as were of his owne ranke, men raised by desert, if their advancement were like to hinder his: but lately before this, when Glabrio, whose Lieutenant he had bene at Thermopylae, was his Competitor for the Censorship, and likely to carrie it, he took an Oath against him, which was counted as no better than malicious periturie, That he had not brought into the common Treasurie some vessels of gold and siluer, gotten in the Campe of Antiochus. Now the hatred which he bare vnto the Scipios grew partly (besides his generall spight at the Nobilitie) from his owne first rising, wherein he was countenanced by Fabius Maximus, who brooked not the African; partly from some checke, that was giuen vnto himselfe, in the African voyage, by P. Scipio, whose Treasurer he then was. For when Cato did utter his dislike of the Consuls bad husbandrie (judging Magnificence to be no better) in some peremptorie manner; Scipio plainly told him, That he had no need of such double diligence in his Treasurer. Wherefore, either not caring what lies he published, or for want of iudgement thinking unworthily of the vertue that was farre aboue him, Cato filled Rome with vttrue reports against his Generall; whose noble deeds confuted sufficiently the author of such false tales. And thus began the hatred: which being not regarded nor thought vpon by the Scipios, whilst it was nourished by their enemy, brake out vpon aduantage, especially against L. Scipio, his brother being dead, or out of the way. A euere inquire and iudgement being appointed of purpose against Scipio, matters were so carried, that he was soone condemned in a summe of money, farre exceeding his abilitie to pay. For non payment, his bodie should haue bene layed vp in prison: but from this rigour of the Law he was freed by Tiberius Gracchus, the same Tribune who had caused the suit against the African to be let fall. In his estate, which was confiscated to the vse of the Citie, when there neither appeared any signe of his hauing bene beholding to Antiochus, nor was found so much as what he had bene condemned to pay; then fell his accusers, and all whose hands had bene against him, into the indignation of the People. But for this was L. Scipio no whit the better. His kindred, friends, and clients made such a collection for him, as would haue set him in better estate than before, if he had accepted it. He tooke no more than such of his owne goods, as were of necessitie vse, being redeemed for him by his neere friends.

And thus began the ciuile warre of the Tongue, in the Roman pleadings: which had either not bene, or not bene much regardable, vntill now, since the Punicke Warre. Securitie of danger from abroad, and some want of sufficient employment, were especiall helpes to the kindling of this fire; which first caught hold vpon that great Worthie, to whose vertue Rome was indebted, for changing into so great securitie her extreme danger. But these factious contentions did no long while containe themselves within heat of wordes, and cunning practise. For when the Art of leading the multitude, in such quarrellsome businesse, grew to perfection, on, they that found themselves ouer-matched by their aduersaries, at this kinde of weapon, began to make opposition, first with clubbes and stones, afterward with swords; and finally, proceeded from frays and murders in the streets, vnto battaile in the open field. Cornelia, daughter of Scipio the African, a Ladie of rare vertue, that in honour of her two sonnes was more commonly named Mother of the Gracchus, law those her two sonnes, whilst they were but yong, slaughtered in Rome, together with some of their friends, by those whom they opposed, and their death not reuenged by order of Law, but rather approved by the Senate. At these times the Senatours began to take vpon them authoritie, more than was to them belonging. They conferred vpon the Consuls all the whole power of the Citie, vnder this forme, Let the Consuls provide, that the Commonweale receive no detriment. By this Decree of theirs, and by their proclaiming any Citizen enemie to the State, they thought to haue woon a great aduantage ouer the multitude. But after the death of C. Gracchus, and of Saturninus a popular man, whom by such authoritie they did put out of the way; it was not long ere Marius, a famous Captaine of theirs, was so condemned, who by force of armes returned into the Citie, and murdered all the principall Senatours: wherupon began the ciuile warres; which giuing vnto Sylla, who preuailed therein, meanes to make himselfe absolute Lord of Rome, taught Cæsar, a man of higher spirit, to affect and obaine the like soueraigne power, when by the like Decree of the Senate he was prouoked. It is true, that neuer any Consull had finally cause to reioyce, of his hauing put in execution such authoritie to him committed by the Senate. But as the furie of the multitude, in passing their Lawes, by hurling of stones, and other violence, made the Citie stand in need of a Soueraigne Lord: so the vehemencie of the Senate, in condemning as enemies those that would not submit themselves, when they were ouer-topped by voices in the House, did compell Cæsar, or giue him at least pretence, to right himselfe by armes: wherewith preuailling against his aduersaries, he tooke such order, that neither Senate, nor People, should thenceforth be able to doe him wrong. So by intestine discord, the Romans consuming all or most of their principall Citizens, lost their owne freedom, and became subiects vnto the arbitrarie government of One: suffering this change in three generations, after this beginning of their insolent rule, wherein they tooke vpon them as the highest Lords on Earth, to doe euen what they listed. Yet had not Rome indeed attained hitherto vnto compleat greatnesse, nor beleued of her selfe as if she had, whilst a King sate crowned on the Throne of Alexander, continuing and vpholding the reputation of a former Empire. Wherefore this consummation of her honour was thought vpon betimes. How it was effected, the sequelle will discouer.

CHAP. VI. The second Macedonian Warre.

§. I.

The Condition wherein those Princes and Estates remained, which were associates of the 40 Romans, when the warre with Antiochus was finished. The Romans quarrell with Philip. They deale insensibly with the Achæans. The Macedonian, being overcome for warre, obtaines peace at Rome, by his sonne Demetrius; of whom thenceforth he becomes ietious.

AFTER the ouerthrow of Antiochus, although Philip of Macedon, Eumenes King of Pergamus, the Commonweale of the Achæans, and all other the States of Greece, were gouerned by the same Lawes and Magistrates, as they formerly had bene, before the arriual of the Romans in those parts: yet in verie truth (the publike declaration excepted) they were none other than absolute vassalls to the People of Rome. For of those few Prerogatives belonging to a Monarch, or vnto Soueraigne power, in whome

fouer it rest; namely, To make Lawes, To create Magistrates, To arbitrate Peace and Warre, To beate Monie; and To reserve (as the French call it) le dernier resort, or the last Appeale, the Romans had assumed foure; and the greatest of them fo absolute-ly, that is, The Appeale, or last resort, as euery pettie iniurie offered to each other by the fore-named Kings or States, was heard and determined either by the Romans Embassadors, or Commissioners, in those places whence the Complaint came, or otherwise by the Senatours themselves within Rome: from whose arbitrement, or direction, if either King, or Commonweales, declined, He or they were beaten, and enforced to obedience; or had their Estates and Regalities vter-ly dissolved. Neuertheless it is true, that they had their owne Lawes, and Officers of their owne ordaining: yet so, as neither their Lawes were of force, when the Romans interposed their will to the contrarie; neither was their election of Magistrates so free, as that they had not therein especiall regard vnto the good pleasure of these their Masters.

And to such degree of seruitude the seuerall Estates of Greece did bow verie gently: either as being thankfull for their deliuerance from a yoke more sensibly grievous; or, as being skilfull in the art of flatterie, and therein taking delight, since therein consisted their chiefe hope of thriving; or, as being more fearful of displeasing the strongest, than mindfull of their owne honour. But Eumenes living further off, and being most obsequious vnto the Romans, was not, of long time, questioned about any of his doings: his conformitie vnto them in matter of warre and peace, together with the diuersion of their thoughts another way, giuing him leaue to vse his owne euen as he listed, vntill they should otherwise dispose of him. Neither was it a little auailable to him, that his Kingdome bordered vpon the Nations, by them not thoroughly subdued. For vpon the same reason (as well as vpon his owne high deserts) were they verie louing vnto Masaniassa, and to his Houe, vntill Carthage was ruined, and their Dominion settled in Affrike: as likewise afterwards to the Kings of Mauritania, Cappadocia, and others: holding people in subiection vnto themselves, by the ministerie of Kings; especially of such Kings, as were vsfull and obsequious vnto them.

Now the Macedonian was of a more noble temper; and shewed himselfe not forgetfull of his owne former greatnesse, the honour of his race, or the high reputation of his Kingdome. But such magnanimitie was none otherwise construed by the Romans, than as want of due reuerence to their Estate, and a valuation of himselfe against them: which, in the pride of their fortune, they could not endure. Wherefore, notwithstanding that hee had lately giuen passage to their Armies through his Countie, prepared the wayes for them, and furnished them both with victuals, and other things needfull, to transport them ouer the Hellepont into Asia, against Antiochus: yet vpon the complaint of Eumenes, and the States of Thessalie and Thrace, he was commaunded to abandon the Cities of Enus and Mavonia, with all Peeces and Places demanded by any of his neighbours; whereof manie of them he had lately conquered, by direction, or licence, euen from the Romans themselves.

These Townes of Enus and Mavonia had bene part of Lysimachus his Kingdome: who from Thrace Northwards, and to the North-west, extended his dominion verie farre. He is thought to haue made himselfe Lord of Transylvania: in which Prouince it is said, * That innumerable Medals of gold haue bene found, in the age of our grandfathers, each of them weighing two or three crownes, and stamped with his Image on the one side, on the other side with Victorie. Of all these Lordships, the possession, or rather the title (for he liued not to settle his estate in Europe) fell to Selucus Vicar by right of warre, wherein he vanquished and slue Lysimachus: as also, by the like right, Ptolemeus Ceraunus thought them his owne, when he had murdered Selucus. But the inundation of the Gauls, which the Kingdome of Macedon could not sustaine, did shortly and easily walk away from that Crowne, together with the more part of Thrace, all those heapes of land newly thereto annexed. Somewhat of this was afterwards regained by Antigonus the sonne of Demetrius, and his successours: though not much; for they were otherwise busied. The furie of the Gauls being over-past, those Countries which lately had bene oppressed by them, recovered their libertie; and not only held it, but learned, some of them, especially the Dardanians and wild Thracians, to hinder their aduantages, and make vse of them, euen vpon Macedon. Against the mischiefs commonly done by these, King Philip did provide the most conuenient remedies: by shutting vp the wayes, whereby the Dardanians might enter into his Kingdome, and by occupying Lysimachia, with some other Townes in Thrace, which he fortified, as Bulwarks of his owne Countrey, against the Barbarians. Now, although it behoued him thus to doe, for the defence of his owne citie: yet inasmuch as these Townes were, in a manner, at absolute libertie, his possession of them was thought to partake more of violence than of iustice. And in this respect he was formerly accused by the Atolians, of wrongful vsurpation and oppression, in his hauing occupied Lysimachia. Hereto he made a good answer, That his Garrison did onely saue it from the Thracians: who, as soon as hee thence withdrew his men, did seize vpon the Towne, and ruine it. The like perhaps he might haue said, touching Enus and Marone; That they were Places vnable to defend themselves, and Gates, by which the Barbarians might haue entrance into his Kingdome. But this Plea had not auayled him, in the disputation about Lysimachia: and in the present question, the Romans were not without their owne title; since Antiochus had gotten all the Countrey thereabout, whilst Philip was busied in his former warre; and since they, by their victorie had gotten vnto themselves all the title, which Antiochus thereto could pretend. Wherefore he onely submitted his right vnto the good pleasure of the Senate: referring it vnto their disposition, Whether Enus and Marone should be set at libertie, whether left in his hand, or whether bestowed vpon Eumenes; who begged them, as an appendix to Lysimachia and Cherfonnesus, that were already his by their gift. What they would determine, he might easily perceiue, by the demerit of their Embassadors towards him: who sitting as Iudges betwene him and all that made complaint vpon him, gaue sentence against him in euerie controuersie. Neuertheless, he sent Embassadors to Rome, there to maintaine his right vnto these Townes; wherein he thought, that equitie (if it might preuaile) was wholly on his side. For he had holpen their Consuls in the warre against Antiochus and the Atolians: wherein whatsoever he had gotten for himselfe, was now taken from him by their Embassadors: and would they now deprive him of those two Townes, lying so fitly for the guard of his Kingdome, which he had gotten to himselfe out of the ruines of Antiochus, like as out of his owne ruines Antiochus had gotten in those quarters a great deale more? By such allegations either hee was likely to preuaile, or at leastwise to gaine time, wherein he might berinke himselfe what he had to doe. It was not long ere he had word from Rome, That the Senate were no more equal to him, than had bene their Embassadors. Wherefore, considering how insolently the Maronites had behaued themselves, in pleading against him for their libertie, he tooke counsell of his owne passions; and (as by nature hee was verie cruell) gaue order to Onomastus, that was Warden of the Sea coasts, to handle these Maronites in such sort, as they might haue little joy of the libertie by them so earnestly desired. Onomastus employed Cassander, one of the Kings men dwelling in Marone, and willed him to let in the Thracians by night, that they might sacke the Towne, and vse all cruelties of warre. This was done, but so ill taken by the Roman Embassadors, who had better notice, than could haue bene feared, of these proceedings; that the King was by them directly charged with the crime, and called more strictly, than became his Majestie, to an account. He would haue remoued the blame from himselfe, and layed it euen vpon the Maronites; affirming, That they, in heart of their Factions, being some inclinable

to him, other some to Eumenes, had fallen into such outrage, that they had cut one anothers throates. And hereof hee willed the Embassadors to inquire, among the Maronites themselves: as well knowing, that they who furnished were either his owne friends; or so terrified and amazed by the late execution of his vengeance among them, that they durst not utter an offensive word. But hee found the Romans more seuer, and more thoroughly informed in the himselfe, than to rest contented with such an answer. He was plainly told, That if he would discharge himselfe of the crime objected; he must send Onomastus and Cassander to Rome, there to be examined as the Senate should thinke fit. This did not a little trouble him. Yet he collected his spirits, and said that Cassander should be at their disposition: but concerning Onomastus, who had not bene at Marone, nor neare to it, heerequested them not to presse him; since it stood not with his honour, so lightly to giue away his friends. As for Cassander, because he should tell no tales; hee tooke order to haue him poisoned by the way. By this weelee, That the doctrine, which Machiavel taught vnto Cesar Borgia, To employ men in mischievous actions, and afterwards to destroy them when they haue performed the mischiefe, was not of his owne inuention. All ages haue giuen vs examples of this goodlie policie, the latter hauing bene apt schoolers in this lesson to the more ancient: as the reigne of Henrie the eighth here in England, can beare good witness; and therein especially the Lord Cromwell, who perished by the same vniust Law that himselfe had deuised, for the taking away of another mans life.

Such actions of Philip made an vnpleasant noise at Rome, and were like to haue brought vpon him the warre which hee feared, before hee was ready to entertaine it. Wherefore hee employed his younger sonne Demetrius as Embassador vnto the Senate: giuing him instructions, how to make answer to all complaints; and withall to deliuer his owne grievances, in such wise that if ought were amisse, yet might it appeare that hee had bene strongly vrged to take such courses. The summe of his Embassage was, to pacifie the Romans, and make all euen for the present. Demetrius himselfe was knowne to be verie acceptable vnto the Senate; as hauing bene well approved by them, when he was hostage in Rome; and therefore seemed the more likelie, to preuaile somewhat; were it onely in regard that would be borne vnto his person.

Whilst this businesse with the Macedonians hung in suspense, and whilst he, by his readinesse to make submission, seemed likelie to diuert from himselfe some other way the Roman armes: the same Embassadors, that had bene Iudges betwene him and his neighbours, made their progresse through the rest of Greece; and tooke notice of the controuersies, which they found betwene some Estates in the Countrey. The greatest cause that was heard before them, was the complaint of the banished Lacedemonians against the Achaens. It was objected vnto the Achaens, That they had committed a grieuous slaughter vpon many Citizens of Lacedemon: That vnto this crueltie they had added a greater, in throwing downe the walles of the Citie: as also further, in changing the Lawes, and abrogating the famous Institutions of Lycorgus. Hereto Lycortas, then Prator of the Achaens, made answer, That these banished Lacedemonians, who now tooke vpon them to accuse the Nation that had once protected them, were notoriously knowne to be the men, who had themselves committed that murder, whereof shamefully they laid the blame vpon others: the Achaens hauing onely called those vnto iudgement, that were supposed to be chiefe authors of a Rebellion against both them and the Romans; and these plaintives hauing slaine them, vpon priuate, though iust hatred, as they were comming to make answer for themselves. Concerning their throwing downe the walles of Lacedemon, hee said it was most agreeable to Lycorgus his ordinance: who, hauing perswaded his Citizens to defend their Towne and libertie by their proper vertue, did inhibit vnto them all kinds of fortifications; as the

Retraits and Nefts either of Cowards, or (whereof Lacedæmon had wofull experience) of Tyrants and Vfurpers. Further he shewed, how the same Tyrants that had built these walles, and hemmed in the Spartans, had also quite abolished Lycorgus his ordinances; and governed the Citie by their owne lawlesse will. As for the Achaens; they communicated their owne Lawes, which they held for the best, or else would soone change them and take better, vnto the Lacedæmonians; whom they found without Lawes, or any tolerable forme of policie. For conclusion, Lycortas plainly told App. Claudius the chief of the Embassadors, That hee and his Countreimen held it strange, being friends and faithfull Allies of the Romans, to see themselves thus constrained, to answer and give account of their actions; as vassals and slaves vnto the People of Rome. For if they were indeed at libertie: why might not the Achaens as well require to be fastidied about that which the Romans had done at Capua, as the Romans did busie themselves, to take account how things went at Lacedæmon? For if the Romans would stand vpon their greatnesse, and intimate, as they began, that the libertie of their friends was nothing worth, longer than should please themselves to ratifie it: then must the Achaens haue recouise vnto those Agreements, that were confirmed by oath, and which without perurie could not be violated; as recuering, and indeed fearing, the Romans but much more, the immortal gods. To this bold answer of Lycortas, Appius found little to replie. Yet taking fild vpon him, hee pronounced more like a Master than a Judge, That if the Achaens would not be ruled by faire meanes, and earne thanks whilst they might; they should be compelled with a mischief, to doe what was required at their hands, whether they would or no. This altercation was in the Parliament of the Achaens; which groned to heare the Lordly words of Appius. Yet Feare preuailed aboue Indignation: and it was permitted vnto the Romans to doe as they listed. Hereupon the Embassadors restored some banished and condemned men: but the Roman Senate, verie soone after, did make void all Indgements of death or banishment, that had beene laid by the Achaens vpon any Citizen of Lacedæmon; as likewise they made it a matter of disputation, whether or no the Citie and Territorie of Lacedæmon, should be suffered to continue a member of the Achaen Common-wealth; or taken from them, and made, as it had beene, an Estate by it selfe. By bringing such a matter into question, the Romans well declared, That they held it to depend vpon their owne will, how much or how little any of their confederates should be suffered to enioy: though by contributing Sparta to the Council of Achaia, they discovered no lesse, as to them seemed, the loue which they bare vnto the Achaens, than the power which they had ouer them.

Into such slauerie had the Greekes, and all Kings and Common-wealths whatsoever, bordering vpon any part of the Mediterran Seas, reduced themselves; by calling in the Romans to their succour. They wanted not the good counsaile and persuasions of many wife and temperate men among them; They had also the examples of the Italians, Spaniards, Gauls, and Africans, all subdued by the Romans, and, by seeking Patronage, made meere vassals, to instruct them, what in the like case they should expect: yet could not the true reasons of Estate and Policie lo preuaile with them, but their priuate passions, and neighbouring hatred, which hath euermore bought reuenge at the price of selfe ruine, brought them from the honour which they enioyed, of being free Princes and Cities, into most base and fearfull seruilitie.

All this made well for Philip of Macedon: who though he saw the Greekes verie farre from daring to stirre against those, by whom both hee and they were kept in awe; yet was hee not without hope, that (few of them excepted, whom the Romans by freeing from his subiection had made his implacable enemies) in heartie affection all the Countreie would be his, whensoever he should take armes, as short-

lie he was like to doe. Young Demetrius, coming home from Rome, brought with him the desired ratification of peace; though qualified with much indignitie soone following. He had beene louingly vied at Rome, and heard with great fauour in the Senate. There being confounded with the multitude of obiections, whereto his youth, vnskillfull in the Art of wrangling, could not readily make answer: it was permitted vnto him, to reade such briefe notes as hee had receiued from his Father, and out of those the Senate were contented to gather satisfactions; more for Demetrius his owne sake, as they then said and wrote into Macedon, than for any goodnesse in the defence. Such pride of theirs, in remitting his faults at the entreatie of his sonne, together with some infolence of his sonne, growing (as appeared) from this fauour of the Romans; did increase in Philip his hatred vnto Rome, and breed in him a calouise of his too forward sonne. To set him forward in these passions, there came daily new Embassadors from Rome; some bringing one commandement; some another; and some, requiring him to fulfill those things, which had beene imposed vpon him by their fore-goers. Neither were there wanting that obserued his countenance: and when hee had fulfilled all that was required at his hands; yet laid it to his charge that hee had done things vnwillingly, and would be obedient, no longer than he needs must. With these Embassadors young Demetrius was conuerfant: rather perhaps out of implicitie, and for that they made much of him, than for any ambitious respect; yet a great deale more than was pleasing to his father. So the rumour grew current through all Macedon, That Perseus, the elder sonne of the King, should not succeed vnto his father; but that the Diademe should be conferred vpon Demetrius, if not by some other pretence, yet by meere fauour of the Romans. This offended not onely Perseus, but Philip himselfe: who suspected his younger sonne, as more Roman than his owne; and accordingly misconstrued all his doings. But ere wee proceed vnto the bitter fruits of this iealousie; it will not be amisse, to speake of some memorable accidents that were in the meane time.

§. II.

The death of PHILOPOEMEN, HANNIBAL, and SCIPIO. That the military profession is of all other the most vnhappie: notwithstanding some examples, which may seeme to proue the contrarie.

He Romans, wanting other matter of quarrell in the Continent of Greece, had of late beene so peremptorie with the Achaens; that they seemed not vnlike to take part against them, in any controuersie that should be moued. Hereupon the Messenians, who against their will were annexed vnto the Achaen Common-wealth, hauing long beene of a contrarie Faction thereto; grew bold to withdraw themselves from that Societie, with purpose to set vp againe an Estate of their owne, secured from communion with any other. This was the deuice of some that were powerful in their Citie: who finding the multitude onely inclinable to their purpose, and not ouer-strongly affected in the businesse, were careful to seeke occasion of reducing things to such passe, that all their Citizens might be entangled in a necessitie of standing out, and of not returning to the Achaen League. And hereupon they began to doe some acts of hostilitie; whereby it was probable that blood should be drawne, and either side so farre exasperated, that little hope of agreement would be left. Vpon the fame of their commotion and proceedings; Philopomen, then Pretor of the Achaens, leuied such forces as hee could in haste, and went against them. Many principall gentlemen of the Achaens, especially of the Megalopolitans, were soone in a readinesse to wait vpon him. Besides these, which were all, or for the most part, Horfe; he had some Auxiliaries out of Thrace and Crete, that vsually were kept in pay. Thus accompanied, hee met with Dinoocrates, Captaine of the Messenians; whom hee charged, and forced to runne. But whilst his horsemen were too earnest in following the chase; there arrived, by chance, a supple of five hundred from Messene, which gaue new courage vnto those that fled. So the Enemies began to make head againe; and with the helpe of those, who very seasonably came to their aide, compelled Philopomens Horsemen to turne backe. Philopomen himselfe had long bene sicke of an Ague, and was then very weak: yet the greatness of his courage would not suffer him, to bee negligent of their safetie, which had so willingly aduertured themselves vnder his conduct. He tooke vpon him to make the Retreat: and suffering his horsemen to passe along by him in a narrow lane, he often turned about against the Messenians; whom his reputation, and the knowledge of his great worth, did terrifie from approaching ouer-neare to him. But it fell out vnappily, that being cast to ground by a fall of his horse, and being withall in very weak plight of bodie, he was vnable to get vp againe. So the Enemies came vpon him, and tooke him; yet scarce beleeued their fortune to bee so good, although their eies were witnesses. The first messenger that brought these newes to Messene, was so farre from being beleued, that he was hardly thought to be in his right wits. But when the truth was affirmed by many reports, all the Citie ran forth to meet him, and beheld the spectacle seeming so incredible. They caused him to be brought into the Theater, that there they might satisfie themselves with beholding him. The greatest part of them had compassion on his misfortune: and in commemoration both of his vertue, and of the singular benefits by him done vnto them, especially in deliuering them from Nabis the Tyrant; began to manifest their good will for his deliuerie. Contrariwise, Dinoocrates and his Faction were desirous hastily to take away his life: because they held him a man implacable, and one that would neuer leaue any disgrace, or iniurie, done to him, vnrerouged. They durst not one trust another with the keeping of him: but committed him into a strong vault vnder ground, that had bene made for the custodie of their Treasure. So thither they let him downe fast bound, and with an engine laid an heauie stone vpon the mouth of the vault. There hee had not staid long, ere his enemies had concluded his present death. The Hangman of the Citie was let downe vnto him, with a cup of poison, which Philopomen tooke in his hand: and asking no more than whether the Horsemen were escaped, and particularly whether Lycortas was safe, when he heard an answer to his minde, he said it was well: and so with a cheerefull countenance, dranke his last draught. Hee was seuentie years old, and weakened with long sicknesse, whereby the poison wrought the sooner, and easily tooke away his life. The Achaens, when they missed him in their flight, were maruellously offended with themselves, for that they had bene more mindfull to preferre their owne liues, than to looke vnto the safetie of so excellent a Commander. Whilst they were deuiling what to doe in such a case: they got aduertisement of his being taken. All Achaia was by this report vehemently afflicted: so as Embassadors were forthwith dispatched vnto Messene, craving his enlargement: and yet preparation made withall, to obtaine it by force, in case that faire means would not serue. Lycortas was chosen Generall of the Armie against Messene: who comming thither, and laying siege to the Towne, enforced it in short space to yeeld. Then Dinoocrates, knowing what he was to expect, laid hands vpon himselfe, and made an end of his owne life. The rest of those that had bene partakers in the murder, were compelled to wait in bonds vpon the altar of Philopomen, that were carried home in solemne pompe to Atgalepolis; where they were all of them slaine at his funeral, as sacrifices to his Ghost whom they had offended. Q. Martins, a Roman Embassador, was then in Greece; whence, vpon one occasion or other, the Roman Embassadors were seldom absent. He would haue entemed in this bulines of Messene, had not Lycortas made short worke, and left him nothing to doe.

About

About the same time was T. Quintus Flaminius sent Embassador to Prusias King of Bithynia: not so much to withdraw him from prosecuting the warre against Eumenes, as to entreat him, that he would deliuer Hannibal, the most spitefull enemy in all the world vnto the Senate and People of Rome, into his hands. Prusias (there in vnworthie of the Crowne he ware) did readily condescend: or rather (as Luie thinke) to gratifie the Romans, he determined either to kill Hannibal, or to deliuer him aliuie to Flaminius. For vpon the first conference betweene the King and Flaminius, a troupe of Souldiours were directed to guard and enuiron the lodging where Hannibal lay. That famous Captaine hauing found cause before this to suspect the faith of Prusias, had deuised some secret fallies vnder ground to saue himselfe from any treasonable and sudden assault. But finding now that all parts about him were fore-closed, he had recourse to his last remedie: which he then was constrained to practise, as well to frustrate his enemies of their triumphing ouer him, as to saue himselfe from their torture and mercilesse hands; who, as he well knew, would neither respect his famous enterprises, his honour, nor his age. When therefore he saw no way of escape, nor counsell to resort vnto, he tooke the poyson into his hand, which he alwayes preferred for a sure Anridore against the sharpest diseases of aduers fortune; which being readie to swallow downe, he vttered these wordes: *I will now (said he) deliuer the Romans of that feare, which hath so many years possessed them; that feare, which makes them impatient to attend the death of an old man. This victorie of FLAMINIUS ouer me, which am disarmed, and betrayed into his hands, shall neuer be numbred among the rest of his heroicall deedes: No; it shall make it manifest to all the Nations of the World, how farre the ancient Roman vertue is degenerate and corrupted. For such was the noblesse of their forefathers; as, when PERSEVS invaded them in Italie, and was readie to giue them battaile at their owne dores, they gaue him knowledge of the treason intended against him by poyson: whereas these of a later race haue employed FLAMINIUS, a man who hath heretofore bene one of their Consuls, to practise with PERSEVS, contrarie to the honour of a King, contrarie to his Faith giuen, and contrarie to the Lawes of Hospitality, to slaughter or deliuer up his owne Guest. He then cursing the perfon of Prusias, and all his, and desiring the immortal gods to reuenge his infidelitie, dranke off the poyson, and died.*

In this yeare also (as good Authors haue reported) to accompanie Philopomen and Hannibal, died Scipio the African: these being, all of them, as great Capitaines as euer the world had; but not more famous, than unfortunate. Certainly, for Hannibal, whose Tragedie we haue now finished, had he bene Prince of the Carthaginians, and one who by his authoritie might haue commaunded such supplies, as the Warre which he vndertooke, required; it is probable, that he had torne vp the Roman Empire by the roots. But he was so strongly croft by a cowardly and enuious Faction at home; as his proper vertue, wanting publicke force to sustaine it, did lastly dissolue it selfe in his owne, and in the common miserie of his Countrey and Commonweale.

Hence it comes, to wit, from the enuie of our equals, and ieaousie of our Masters, be they Kings, or Commonweales, That there is no Profession more vnprosperous than that of Men of Warre, and great Capitaines, being no Kings. For besides the enuie and ieaousie of men; the spoiles, rapes, famine, slaughter of the innocent, vastation, and burnings, with a world of miseries layed on the labouring man, are so hatefull to God, as with good reason did Atoniue the Marshall of France confesse, That were not the mercies of GOD infinite, and without restriction, it were in vaine for those of his profession to hope for any portion of them: seeing the cruelties, by them permitted and committed, were also infinite. How soeuer, this is true, That the victories, which are obtained by many of the greatest Commanders, are commonly either ascribed to those that serue vnder them, to Fortune, or to the cowardise of the Nation against whome they serue. For the most of others, whose vertues haue rayed them about the kuel of their inferiours, and haue surmounted their enuie: yet haue haue they beene rewarded in the end, either with disgrace, banishment, or death. Among the Romans we finde many examples hereof; as Coriolanus, M. Titinius, L. Amylius, and this our Scipio, whom we haue lately buried. Among the Greekes we read of not many, that escaped these rewards. Yealong before these times, it was a Legacie that Daniel bequeathed vnto his victorious Capitaine Isab. With this fare Alexander feasted Pammenio, Philotas, and others; and prepared it for Antipater and Cassander. Hereto Valentinian the Emperour inuited Attius; who, after many other victories, ouerthrew Attila the Hunnes, in the greatest battaile, for the well fighting and resolution of both Armies, that euer was stricken in the world; for there fell of those that fought, besides runne-awaies, an hundred and fourescore thousand. Hereupon it was well and boldly told vnto the Emperour by Prosimus, That in killing of Attius, he had cut off his owne right hand with his left: for it was not long alter that Maximus (by whose perswasion Valentinian slew Attius) murdered the Emperour, which hee neuer durst attempt, Attius liuing. And, besides the losse of that Emperour, it is true, That with Attius, the glorie of the Westerne Empire was rather dissolued, than obscured. The same vnworthie destinie, or a farre worse, had Bellisarius; whose vndertakings and victories were so difficult and glorious, as after-ages suspected them for fabulous. For he had his eyes torne out of his head by Iustinian; and he died a blinde begger. Nasus also, to the great preiudice of Christian Religion, was disgrac'd by Iuliane. That Rule of Cato against Scipio, hath bene well obserued in curie age since then, to wit, That the Common-weale cannot be accounted free, which standeth in awe of any one man. And hence haue the Turkes drawne another Principle, and indeed a Turkish one, That euerie warlike Prince should rather destroy his greatest men of warre, than suffer his owne glorie to be obscured by them. For this cause did Baiares the second dispatch Bassa Acomat; Selim strangle Bassa Mustapha; and most of those Princes, bring to ruine the most of their Vissiers. Of the Spanish Nation, the great Gonsaluo, who draue the French out of Naples: and Ferdinando Cortese, who conquered Mexico; were crowned with nettles, not with Lawrell. The Earles of Egmond and Horn, had no heads left them to wear garlands on. And that the great Captaines of all Nations, haue bene paid with this copper coine; there are examples more than too many. On the contrarie it may bee said, That many haue acquired the State of Princes, Kings, and Emperours, by their great abilitie in matter of warre. This I confesse. Yet must it be had withall in consideration, that these high places haue bene giuen, or offered, vnto verie few, as rewards of their militarie vertue; though many haue vsurped them, by the helpe and fauour of those Armies which they commanded. Neither is it vnregardable, That the Tyrants which haue oppressed the libertie of free Cities: and the Lieutenants of Kings or Emperours, which haue traitorously call downe their Masters, and stepped vp into their seats; were not all of them good men of warre: but haue vsed the advantage of some commotion, or many of them, by base and cowardlie practises, haue obtained those dignities, which vnderstandly were ascribed to their personall worth. So that the number of those, that haue purchased absolute greatnesse by the greatnesse of their warlike vertue; is farre more in seeming, than in deed. Ptoleus was a souldiour, and by helpe of the souldiours, hee got the Empire from his Lord Mauritius: but hee was a coward; and with a barbarous crueltie, seldome found in any other than cowards, hee slue first the children of Mauritius, a Prince that neuer had done him wrong, before his face, and after them Mauritius himselfe. This his bloudie aspiring was but as a debt, which was paid vnto him againe by Nerolius: who tooke from him the Imperiall Crowne, vnjustly gotten; and set it on his owne head. Leontius laid hold vpon the Emperour Iuliane, cut off his nose and eares, and sent him into banishment: but Gods vengeance rewarded him with the same punishment, by the hands of Tiberius; to whose charge hee had left his owne men of warre. Iuliane, hauing recovered forces, lighted on Tiberius; and barbed him after the same

- same fashion. Philippicus, commanding the forces of Iuliane, murdered both the Emperour and his sonne. Anastasius, the vassall of this new Tyrant, surpris'd his Master Philippicus, and thrust out both his eyes. But with Anastasius, Theodosius dealt more gently: for hauing wrested the Scepter out of his hands, hee enforced him to become a Priest. It were an endless, and a needlesse worke to tell, how Leo rewarded this Theodosius; how many others haue bene repayed with their owne crueltie, by men alike ambitious and cruel; or how many hundreds, or rather thousand, hoping of Capitaines to make themselves Kings, haue by Gods iustice miserably perished in the attempt. The ordinarie, and perhaps the best way of thriving by the practise of armes, is to take what may be gotten by the spoyle of Enemies, and the liberalltie of those Princes and Cities, in whose seruice one hath well deserued. But scarce one of a thousand haue prospered by this course. For that obseruation, made by Salomon, of vnthankfulness in this kind, hath bene found belonging to all Countries and Ages: A little Citie, and few men in it, and a great King came against it, and compassed it about, and builded Forts against it: And there was found a poore and wise man therein, and he deliuered the Citie by his wisdom: but none remembered this poore man. Great Monarchs are vnwilling to pay great thanks, least thereby they should acknowledge themselves to haue bene indebted for great benefits: which the vnwisest sort of them thinke to fauour of some impotencie in themselves. But in this respect they are oftentimes couened and abused: which proues that weakenesse to be in them indeede, whereof they so gladly flunne the opinion. Contrariwise, free Estates are bountifull in giuing thanks; yet so, as those thanks are not of long endurance. But concerning other profit which their Capitaines haue made, by enriching themselves with the spoyle of the enemy, they are very inquisitiue to search into it, and to strip the well-deseruers out of their gettings: yea most iniuriouly to rob them of their owne, vpon a false supposition: that euen they whose hands are most clean from such offences, haue purloyned somewhat from the common Treasurie. Hereof Ineed not to produce examples: that of the two Scipios being so lately recited.
- In my late Soueraignes time, although for the warres, which for her owne safetie shee was constrained to vndertake, her Majestie had no lesse cause to vse the seruice of Martiall men both by Sea and land, than any of her Predecessors for many yeares had, yet, according to the destinie of that profession, I doe not remember, that any of hers, the Lord Admiral excepted, her eldest and most prosperous Commander, were either enriched, or otherwife honoured, for any seruice by them performed. And that her Majestie had many aduic'd, valiant, and faithfull men, the prosperitie of her affaires did well witness, who in all her daies neuer receiued dishonour, by the cowardlie or infidelitie of any Commander, by her selfe chosen and employed.
- For as all her old Capitaines by Land died poore men, as Milbey, Ran'el, Drenrie, Reade, Wilford, Leyton, Pellam, Gilbert, Cunsable, Bourcher, Barkely, Bingham, and others: so those of a later and more dangerous imployment, whereof Deuice and Yere were the most famous, and who haue done as great honor to our Nation (for the meanes they had as euer any did: those I say) with many other braue Collonels, haue left behinde them (besides the reputation which they purchased with many trauailes and wounds) no title nor estate to their posteritie. As for the L. Thomas Burrough, and Peregrine Bertie L. Willoughbie of Eresby, two verie worthy and exceeding valiant Commanders, they brought with them into the world their Titles and Estates.
- That her Majestie in the aduancement of her Men of warre did sooner beleuee other men than her selfe, a discale vnto which many wise Princes, besides her selfe, haue bene subiect, I say that such a confidence, although it may seeme altogether to excuse her Noble Nature, yet can it not but in some sort accuse her of weaknesse. And exceeding strange it were, were not the cause manifest enough, that where where the prosperous Actions are so exceedingly prized, the Actions are so vnprofitable and so generally neglected. The cause, I say, which hath wrought one and the same effect in all times, & among all Nations, is this, that those which are nearest the person of Princes (which martial men seldom are) can with no good grace commend, or at least magnifie a Profession farre more noble than their own, seeing therein they should only mind their Masters of the wrong they did vnto others, in giuing lesse honour and reward to men of farre greater deservings, and of farre greater vse than themselves.

But his Majestie hath already payed the greatest part of that debt. For besides the relieving by Pensions all the poorer sort, he hath honored more Martiall men 10 than all the Kings of England haue done in this hundred years.

He hath giuen a Crownet to the Lord Thomas Howard for his chargeable and remarkable seruice, as well in the yeare 1588, as at Caliz, the Islands, and in our owne Seas; hauing first commanded as a Capitaine, twice Admirall of a Squadron, and twice Admirall in chiefe. His Majestie hath changed the Baronies of Montjoy and Burley into Earldomes, and created Sidney Vicount, Knollys, Russel, Carew, Pamers, Arundel of Warder, Gerald, and Chichester, Barons, for their governments and seruices in the Netherlands, France, Ireland, and elsewhere.

§. III.

PHILIP making prouision for warre against the Romans, desires hardly with manie of his owne subiects. His negotiation with the Bastarne. His crueltie. He suspecteth his sonne DEMETRIUS. DEMETRIUS accused by his brother PERSEVS; and shortly after slain, by his fathers appointment. PHILIP repenteth him of his sonnes death, whome he findeth to haue bene innocent: and intending to reuenge it on PERSEVS, he dieth.

VINTVS MARTIVS the Roman Embassador, who trauailed vp and downe, seeking what worke might be found about Greece, had receiued instruction from the Senate, to vse the most of his diligence in looking into the Estate of Macedon. At his returne home, that he might not seeme to haue discovered nothing, hee told the Fathers, That Philip had done whatsoever they enjoyed him; yet so, as it might appeare, that such his obedience would last no longer, than mere necessitie should enforce him thereunto. He added further, That all the doings and sayings of that King did wholly tend vnto rebellion, about which he was deuiuing. Now it was so indeed, that Philip much repented him of his faithfull obsequiousnesse to the Romans, and forsooke their intent, which was, to get his Kingdome into their owne hands, with safetie of their honour, if they could finde conuenient meanes; or otherwise (as to him seemed apparant) by what meanes soeuer. He was in an ill case: as hauing been already vanquished by them; hauing lost exceedingly both in strength and reputation; hauing subiects that abhorred to heare of Warre with Rome, and hauing neither neighbour nor friend, that, if he were thereto vrged, would adventure to take his part: yet he provided as well as he could deuise against the necessitie which hee daily feared. Such of his owne people as dwelt in the maritime Townes, and gaue him cause to suspect, that they would doe but bad seruice against the Romans, hee compelled to forsake their dwellings, and removed them all into Emathia. The Cities and Countrey, whence these were transplanted, he filled with a multitude of Thracians, whose faith he thought a great deale more assured, against those enemies that were terrible to the Macedonians. Further, he deuided vpon alluring the Bastarne, a strong and hardie Nation, that dwelt beyond the river 40 of of Danubius, to abandon their seat, and come to him with all their multitude: who, besides other great rewards, would helpe them to root out the Dardanians, and take possession of their Countrey. These were like to doe him notable seruice against the Romans: being not only stout fighting men; but such, as being planted in those quarters by him, would beare respect vnto him alone. The least benefite that could be hoped by their arrival, must be the vtter extirpation of the Dardanians; a People alwayes troublesome to the Kingdome of Macedon, whensoever they found aduantage. Neither was it judged any hard matter, to perswade those Bastarnes, by hope of spoyle, and other incitements, vnto a more desperate Expedition, through Illyria, and the Countreys vpon the Adriaticke Sea, into Italie it selfe. It was not knowne who should withstand them vpon the way: Rather it was thought, that the Scordisci, and peradventure some others, through whose Countreys they were to passe, would accompanie them against the Romans, were it onely in hope of spoyle. Now to facilitate the remove of these Bastarnes from their owne habitations, into the Land of the Dardanians, vpon the border of Macedon; a long and tedious journey vnto them, that carried with them their wives and children: Philip with gifts did purchase the good will of some Thracian Princes, Lords of the Countreys through which they were to passe. And thus hee sought meanes to strengthen himselfe, with helpe of the wilde Nations, which neither knew the Romans, nor were knowne vnto them; since he was not like to finde assistance from any ciuile Nation, about the whole compasse of the Mediterranean Seas. But these deuises were long ere they tooke effect: so as the Bastarne came not before such time as he was dead; his death being the ouerthrow of that purpose. In the meane time he neglected not the trayning of his men to warre, and the exercise of them in some small Expeditions, against those wilde people that bordered vpon him, and stood worst affected toward him.

But these his counsailes and proceedings were miserably disturbed by the calamities that fell vpon him, both in his Kingdome, and in his owne house. The Families and whole Townships, which he had caused much against their wills to forsake their auncient dwellings, and betake themselves to such new habitations, as he in his discretion thought meetest for them, were vehemently offended at the change. Yet their anger at first contained it selfe within wordes: hee hauing done them no great wrong in that alteration, other wise than by neglecting their affection to the places wherein they had long liued: which also he did vnwillingly, being himselfe ouer-ruled by necessitie, that seemed apparant. This euill therefore would soone haue bene determined, had not his cruell and vindictiue nature made it worse. He could not pardon words proceeding from iust sorrow: but imputed all to traitorous malice; and accordingly sought reuenge where it was needefull. In his rage hee caused many to die: among whome were some eminent men; and few or none 40 of them delectuall. This encreased the hatred of the people, and turned their former exclamations into bitter curses. Which grew the more generall; when the King in a barbarous and base furie, mistrusting all alike whome hee had iniured, thought himselfe vnlike to be safe, vntill he should haue massacred all the children of those parents, whome tyrannically he had put to death. In the execution of this his vnmanly pleasure, some accidents, more tragical than perhaps hee could haue desired, gaue men cause to thinke (as they could not in reason thinke otherwise) that, not without vengeance powred on him from Heauen, he felt the like miserie in his owne children. It is hard to say what the Romans intended, in the extraordinary fauour which they shewed vnto Demetrius, the Kings younger sonne. It may 50 well be (though it may be also suspected) that they had no purpose to make and nourish dissention betwene the brethren, but onely to cherish the vertue and towardlinesse of Demetrius; like as we finde it in their Histories. But their notable fauour towards this young Prince, and his mutuall respect of them, bred extreme jealousy in the fathers head. If any custome of the Romans, the manner of their life, life, the fallion of their apparrell, or the vnlighty contriuing and building (as then it was) of the Towne of Rome, were jelled at in ordinarie discourse and table-talk. Demetrius was sure to be presently on fire, defending and praying them, euen in such points as rather needed excuse. This, and his daily conuersion with their Embassadors, as often as they came, gaue his father cause to thinke, that he was no fit partaker of any counsaile held against them. Wherefore he communicated all his deuices with his elder sonne Perseus: who fearing so much leaſt his brother should ſtep betwene him and the ſucceſſion, conuerted wholly vnto his deſtruction, that grace which he had with his father. Perseus was then thirtee yeares olde; of a ſtirring ſpirit, though much deſectiue in valour. Demetrius was younger by ſixe 10 yeares, more open and vnwarie in his actions, yet thought old and craftie ynough, to entertaine more dangerous practises, than his free ſpeeches diſcouered. The jealous head of the King hauing entertained ſuch ſuſpitions, that were much encreaſed by the cunning practise of his elder ſonne, a ſlight occaſion made the fire breake out, that had long layne ſmothered. A Muſter, and ceremonious luſtration of the Armie, was wont to be made at certaine times with great ſolemnitie. The manner of it at the preſent was thus. They cleft in twaine a bitch, and threw the head and fore-part, with the entrails, on the right hand, and the hinder part on the left hand of the way, which the Armie was to paſſe. This done, the Armes of all the Kings of Macedon, from the verie firſt original, were borne before the Armie. Then fol- 20 lowed the King betwene his two ſonnes: after him came his owne band, and they of his guard; whome all the reſt of the Macedonians followed. Hauing performed other ceremonies, the Armie was diuided into two parts: which, vnder the Kings two ſonnes, charged each other in manner of a true fight, vſing poles, and the like, in ſtead of their pikes and accuſtomed weapons. But in this preſent ſkirmiſh there appeared ſome extraordinary contention for the victorie: whether happening by chance, or whether the two Capitaines did ouer-carnestly ſeek eache to get the vpper hand, as a betokening of their good ſucceſſe in a greater trial. Some ſmall hurt there was done, and wounds giuen, euen with thoſe ſtokes, vntill Perseus his ſide at length recoyled. Perseus himſelfe was forrie for this, as it had bene ſome bad pre- 30 ſage: but his friends were glad, and thought, that hereof might be made good vſe. They were of the craftier ſort: who perceiving which way the Kings fauor bent, and how all the courſes of Demetrius led vnto his owne ruine, addreſſed their ſeruices to the more malicious and craftie head. And now they ſaid, that this victorie of Demetrius would afford matter of complaint againſt him; as if the heat of his ambition had carried him beyond the rules of that ſolemn paſtime. Each of the brethren was that day to ſeall his owne companions, and each of them had ſpyes in the others lodging, to obſerue what was ſaid and done. One of Perseus his Intelligencers behaued himſelfe ſo indifferently, that he was taken and well beaten by three or foure of Demetrius his men, who turned him out of dores. After ſome ſtore 40 of wine, Demetrius told his companions, that he would goe viſit his brother, and ſee what cheare he kept. They agreed to his motion, excepting ſuch of them as had ill handled his brothers man: yet he would leaue none of his traine behind, but forced them alſo to beare him companie. They, fearing to be ill rewarded for their late diligence, armed themſelues ſecretly to preuent all danger. Yet was there ſuch good eſpiall kept, that this their coming armed was forthwith made knowne to Perseus: who thereupon tumultuouſly locked vp his dores, as if he ſtood in feare to be aſſaulted in his houſe. Demetrius wondered to ſee himſelfe excluded, and ſa- 50 red verie angrily with his brother. But Perseus, bidding him be gone as an enemy, and one whoſe murderous purpoſe was detected, ſent him away with entertaine- ment, no better than defiance. The next day the matter was brought before the King. The elder brother accuſed the younger vnto the father of them both, Much there was alledged, and in effect the ſame that hath bene here recited, ſue that by miſconſtruction all was made worſe. But the maine point of the accuſation, and which

which did aggrauate all the reſt, was, That Demetrius had vnder-taken this murder, and would perhaps alſo dare to vnder-take a greater, vpon confidence of the Romans; by whom he knew that he ſhould be defended and borne out. For Perseus made ſhew, as if the Romans did hate him; becauſe he bore a due reſpect vnto his father, and was forrie to ſee him ſpoiled, and daily robbed of ſome what by them. And for this cauſe he ſaid it was, that they did animate his brother againſt him: as alſo that they fought how to winne vnto Demetrius the loue of the Macedonians. For prooſe hereof he cecited a letter, lent of late from T. Quintius to the King himſelfe: whereof the contents were, That he had done wiſely in ſending Demetrius 10 to Rome; and that he ſhould yet further doe well to ſend him thither againe, accompanied with a greater and more honorable traine of Macedonian Lords. Hence he enforced, That this counſell was giuen by Titus, of purpoſe to ſhake the allegiance of thoſe, that ſhould wayt vpon his brother to Rome; and make them, forgetting their duties to their old King, become ſeruants to this young Traytor Demetrius. Hereto Demetrius made anſwere, by rehearſing all paſſages of the day and night foregoing, in ſuch manner as hee remembered them, and had conceiued of them: bitterly reprehending Perseus, that conuerted matters of Paſtime, and what was done or ſpoken in wine, to ſuch an accuſation, whereby he fought his innocent brothers death. As for the loue which the Romans did beare him; He ſaid that it 20 grew, if not from his owne vertue, at leaſt wiſe from their opinion thereof: ſo as by any impious practiſe, He were more like to loſe it wholly, than to encreaſe it. In this wretched pleading there wanted not ſuch paſſions, as are incident to fathers, children, and brethren; beſides thoſe that are common to all Plaintiffes and Defendants, before ordinarie Iudges. The King pronounced like a father, though a iealous father, That he would conclude nothing vpon the exceſſe or error, whatſoeuer it were, of one day and night, nor vpon one houres audience of the matter, but vpon better obſeruatiou of their liues, manners, and whole carriage of themſelues both in word and deed. And herein he may ſeeme to haue dealt both iuſtly and compaſſionately. But from this time forward, he gaue himſelfe ouer wholly 30 to Perseus: vſing ſo little conference with his younger ſonne, that when he had matters of weight in hand, ſuch eſpecially as concerned the Romans, He liked neither to haue him preſent, nor neare vnto him. About all, he had eſpecial care, to learne out what had paſſed betwene Demetrius and T. Quintius, or any other of the Roman great ones. And to this purpoſe he ſent Embaſſadors to Rome, Phloetes and Apelles; men whom hee thought no way intereſſed in the quarrells betwene the brethren; though indeed they altogether depended on the elder, whom they ſaw the more in grace. Theſe brought home with them a letter, ſaid to be written by Titus (whoſe ſcale they had counterfeited) vnto the King. The contents where- 40 of were, A deprecation for the young Prince; with an intimation, as by way of granting it, That his youthfull and ambitious deſires had cauſed him to enter into practiſes vnliſſible, againſt his elder brother; which yet ſhould neuer take effect, for that Titus himſelfe would not be author, or abettor, of any impious deuice. This manner of excuſe did forcibly perſwade the King, to thinke his ſonne a dangerous traytor. To ſtrengthen him in this opinion, one Didas, to whom he gaue Demetrius in cuſtodie, made ſhew as if he had pitied the eſtate of the vnhappy Prince; and ſo wrung out of him his ſecret intentions, which he ſhortly diſcouered vnto Philip. It was the purpoſe of Demetrius to ſlie ſecretly to Rome; where he might hope not onely to liue in ſafety, from his father and brother, but in greater likelihood, than he could finde at home, of bettering ſuch claime as he had in reuerſion vnto the 50 Crowne of Macedon. Whatſoeuer his hopes and meanings were, al came to nought through the falſhood of Didas; who playing on both hands, offered vnto the Prince his helpe for making the eſcape, and in the meane while revealed the whole matter to the King. So Philip reſolved to put his ſonne to death, without further ex- pence of time. It was thought behouefull to make him away priuily, for feare leſt

the Romans should take the matter to heart, and held it as proofe sufficient, at least, of the Kings despight against them, if not of his meaning to renew the warre. Lidus therefore was commanded to rid the vnhappie Prince out of his life. This accursed Minister of his Kings vnadvised sentence, first gaue poyson to Demetrius: which wrought neither so hastily, nor so secretly, as was desired. Hereupon hee sent a couple of Russians, to finish the tragedie: who villanously accomplished their worke by smothering that Prince, in whose life consisted the greatest hope of Asia.

In all the race of Antigonus there had not bene found a King, that had thus cruelly dealt with any Prince of his owne blood. The houses of Lysimachus and Cassander fell eyther with themselves, or euen vpon their heeles; by intestine discord and ieaousities, grounded on desire of soueraigne rule, or feare of loosing it. By the like vnnatural hatred, had almost bene cut off the lines of Ptoleme and of Seleucus: which though narrowly they escaped the danger, yet were their kingdomes thereby grievously diltempered. Contrariwise, it was worthe of extraordinary note, how that vpiant family of the Kings of Pergamus had raised it selfe to marvellous greatness, in very short space, from the condition of meere slaueerie: whereof a principall cause was, the brotherly love maintained by them, with singular commendation of their pietie. Neyther was Philip ignorant of these examples; but is said to haue propounded the last of them, to his owne children, as a patterne for them to imitate. Certainly he had reason to doe: not more in regard of the benefit which his enemies reaped by their concord, than in remembrance of the tender fosterage, wherewith King Antigonus his Tutor had faithfully cherished him in his minority. But hee was himselfe of an vmercifull nature; and therefore vnmeet to bee a good perswader vnto kindly affection. The murders by him done vpon manie of his friends, together with the barbarous outrages, which for the satiating of his blood-thirstie appetite hee delightfully had committed vpon manie innocents, both strangers, & subjects of his owne, did now procure vengeance downe from Heaven, that rewarded Him with a draught of his owne Poyson. After the death of his sonne, He too late began to examine the crimes that had bin objected; and to weigh them in a more equal ballance. Then found hee nothing that could giue him satisfaction, or by good probability induce him to thinke, that malice had not bene contriuer of the whole proceesse. His only remaining Son Perseus could so ill dissemble the pleasure which hee tooke, in being freed from all danger of competition: as there might easily be perceived in him a notable change, proceeding from some other cause, than the remove of those dangers, which he had lately pretended. The Romans were now no lesse to be feared than at other times, when hee, as hauing accomplished the most of his desires, left off his vsuall trouble of mind, and carelesse of making prouision against them. He was more diligently courted, than in former times; by those that well vnderstood the difference, betweene a rising and a setting Sunne. As for old Philip, hee was left in a manner desolate: some expecting his death, and some feare enduring the tediousnesse of such expectation. This bred in the King a deep melancholy, and filled his head with suspitious imaginations; the like wherof hee had neuer bene slow to apprehend. He was much vexed: and so much the more, for that he knew, eyther well to whom, nor perfectly wherof to complain. One honourable man, a Cousen of his, named Antigonus, continued true to Philip, that hee grew thereby hateful to Perseus: and thus becoming subiect vnto the same ialous impressions which troubled the King, became also partaker of his secrets. This counsailler, when hee found that the anger conceived against Perseus would not vent it selfe, and giue ease to the King, vntill the truth were knowne Whether Demetrius were guiltie or no of the treason objected; as also that Philetes and Apelles, (the Embassadors which had brought from Rome that Epistle of Flaminius, that serued as the greatest euidence against Demetrius) were suspected of forgery in the busines: made diligent inquirie.

inquire after the truth. In thus doing, hee found one Xychus, a man most likely to haue vnderstood what false dealing was vsed by those Embassadors. Him hee apprehended, brought to the Court, and presented vnto the King: saying that this fellow knew all, and must therefore bee made to vtter what hee knew. Xychus for feare of torture, vttered as much as was before suspected: confessing against himselfe, that hee had bin employed by the Embassadors in that wicked peece of businesse. No maruell, if the Fathers passions were extreme, when hee vnderstood, that by the vnnatural practise of one sonne, hee had so wretchedly cast away another, farre more vertuous, and innocent. Hee raged exceedingly, against himselfe, and withall against the Authors of the mischiefe. Vpon the first newes of this discouerie, Apelles fled away, and got into Italia. Philetes was taken: and either so farre as hee could not denie it when Xychus confronted him, yeelded himselfe guiltie, or else was put to torture. Perseus was now growne stronger, than that he should need to flee the Countrey: yet not so stout as to aduenture himselfe into his fathers presence. He kept on the borders of the kingdome, towards Thrace, whilst his father wintered at Demetrias. Philip therefore, not hoping to get into his power this his vngracious sonne; tooke a resolution, to aliene the Kingdome from him, & conferre it vpon Antigonus. But his weake bodie, and excessive greife of minde, so disabled him in the trauell hereto belonging; that ere hee could bring his purpose to effect, he was constrained to yeild to nature: He had reigned about two & fortie yeares: alwayes full of trouble, as vexed by others, and vexing himselfe, with continuall wars, of which that with the Romans was most vnhappie, and few or none of the rest found the conclusion, which a wise Prince would haue desired, of bringing forth together, both honour and profit. But for all the euill that betell him, he might thanke his owne peruerse condition: since his vnle King Antigonus, had left vnto him an estate, so great, and so well settled, as made it easie for him, to accomplish any moderate desires, if he had not abhorred all good counsaile. Wherefore hee was iustly punished: by feeling the difference betweene the imaginarie happinesse of a Tyrant, which hee affected, and the life of a King, wherof hee little cared to performe the dutie. His death, euen whilst yet it was only drawing neare, was foresignified vnto Perseus, by Calligenes the Philitian; who also concealed it awhile from those that were about the Court. So Perseus came thither on the suddaine, and tooke possession of the kingdome: which in fine hee no lesse imprudently lost, than hee had wickedly gotten.

¶ IIII.

How the Bastarns fell vpon Dardania. The behaviour of PERSEVS in the beginning of his Reigne. Some warres of the Romans: and how they suffered MASANISSA, cruelly to oppress the Carthaginians. They quarrell with PERSEVS. They allow not their Confederates to make warre without their leave obtained. The Treason of CALLICRATES; whereby all Greece became more obnoxious to Rome, than in former times. Further quarrels to PERSEVS. He seeks friendship of the Asians, and is withstood by CALLICRATES. The Romans discover their intent of warring vpon him.

IMmediately vpon the death of Philip, came the Bastarns into Thrace: where order had bin taken, long before, both for their free passage, and for the indemnitie of the Countrey. This compact was friendly obserued, as long as none other was knowne than that Philip did liue, to recompence all that should be done, or sustained, for his seruice. But when it was heard, that a new King reigned in Macedon; & not heard withall, that he tooke any care what became of the enterprize: then was all daft

and confounded. The Thracians would no longer afford so good markets vnto these strangers, as formerly they had done. On the other side, the Bastarnæ would not be contented with reason, but became their owne caruers, Thus each part hauing lost the rich hopes reposed in Philip: grew carefull of thriving in the present; with little regard of right or wrong. Within a while they fell to blows; and the Bastarnæ had the vpper hand, so as they chased the Thracians out of the plaine Countreies. But the victors made little vlew of their good fortune. For whether by reason of some overthrow, receiued by them in assaulting a place of strength; or whether because of extreme bad weather, which is said to haue afflicted them as it were miraculously: all of them returned home, fave thirtie thousand, which pierced on into Dacia. How these thirtie thousand sped in their voyage, I doe not find. It comes that by the careless vying of some victories, they drew losse vpon themselves: and finally tooke that occasion, to follow their companions backe into their owne Countrey.

As for Perseus he thought it not expedient, in the noueltie of his Reigne, to embroyle himselfe in a warre so dangerous, as that with the Romans was likely to proue. Wherefore he wholly gaue his mind to the settling of his Estate: which well done, he might afterwards accommodate himselfe, as the condition of his affaires should require, eyther for war or peace. To prevent all danger of rebellion: he quickly tooke away the life of Antigonus. To winne loue of his people; he came personally to heare their causes in iudgment (though herein hee was so over-diligent and curious, that one might haue perceived this his vertue of iustice to be no better than feined) as also he gratified them with many delightfull spectacles, magnificently by him set forth. Aboue all he had care to auoide all necessitie of warre with Rome: and therefore made it his first worke, to send Embassadours thither, to renew the league; which hee obtained, and was by the Senate saluted King, and friend vnto the State. Neyther was he negligent in seeking to purchase good will of the Greeks, and other his neighbors: but was rather herein so excessively bountifull, that it may seeme a wonder, how in few yeares, to his vtter ruine, hee became so griping and tenacious. His feare was indeede the murthering passion, which over-rul'd him, and changed him into so manie shapes, as made it hard to discern which of his other qualities were naturally his owne. For prooue this, there is requirite no more, than the relation of his actions past and following.

The Romans continued, as they had long, busie in wars against the Spaniards and Ligurians; people often vanquished, and as often breaking forth into new rebellion. They also conquered Syria; subdued the rebelling Sardinians; and had some quarrels, though to little effect, with the Libyrians and others. Over the Carthaginians they bore (as cuer since the victorie) a heauie hand: and suffered Masaniissa to take from them what he liked. The Carthaginians, like obedient vassals to Rome, were afraid, though in defence of their owne, to take Armes: from which they were bound by an article of peace, except it were with leaue of the Romans. Masaniissa therefore had great advantage ouer them: and was not ignorant how to vse it. Hee could get possession by force, of whatsoeuer he desired, ere their complaining Embassadours could bee at Rome; and then were the Romans not hardly entreated, to leaue things as they found them.

So had Hee once dealt before, in taking from them the Countrey of Emporia: and so did hee vse them againe and againe; with pretence of title, where hee had anie; otherwise, without it. Gala the Father of Masaniissa had wonne some land from the Carthaginians; which afterward Syphax wanne from Gala, and within a while, restored to the right owners, for loue of his Wife Sophonissa, and of Adrabal his Father-in-law. This did Masaniissa take from them by force: and by the Romans, to whose judgment the case was referred, was permitted quietly to hold it. The Carthaginians had now good experience, how beneficiall it was for their Estate, to vse all manner of submissiue obedience to Rome.

They

They had scarcely this digested iniurie, when Masaniissa came vpon them againe, and to take from them aboute leuentie to wnes and Castels, without any colour of right. Hereof by their Embassidors they made lamentable complaint vnto the Roman Senate. They threwe downe grievously they were oppressed by reason of two articles in their League: That they should not make warre, out of their owne lands; nor with any Confederates of the Romans. Now although it were so, that they might lawfully withstand the violence of Masaniissa, invading their Countrey, howe-foeuer he was pleased to call it his: yet since hee was confederate with the Romans, they durst not presume to beare defence armes against him, but suffered themselves to be eaten vp, for feare of incurring the Romans indignation. Wherefore they entreated, that eyther they might haue fairer iustice; or be suffred to defend their owne by strong hand; or at least, if right must wholly giue place to fauour, That the Romans yet would bee pleased to determine, how farr forth Masaniissa should bee allowed, to proceed in these outrages. If none of these petitions could be obtained, then desired they, that the Romans would let them vnderstand, wherein they had offended since the time that Scipio gaue them peace; and vouchsafe to inflict on them such punishment, as they themselves in honour should thinke meete: for that better and more to their comfort it were, to suffer at once what should be appointed by such Iudges; than continually to liue in feare, and none otherwise draw breath, than at the mercie of this Namidian Hangman. And herewithall the Embassadours threw themselves prostrate on the ground, weeping, in hope to moue compassion. Here may we behold, the fruites of their enuie to that valiant house of the Burchinians; of their irresolution, in prosecuting a war so important, as Hannibal made for them in Italy; and of their halfe pennie-worthing, in matter of expense, when they had aduentured their whole estate, in the purchase of a great Empire. Now are they seruants, euen to the seruants of those men, whose fathers they haue often chased, slaine, taken, and sold as bondslaves in the streets of Carthage, and in all Cities of Africa and Greece. Now haue they enough of that Roman peace, which Hanno so often and so earnestly desired. Only they want peace with Masaniissa; once their mercinarie, and now their master, or rather their tormentor; out of whose cruell hands, they beseech their masters to take the office of correcting them. In such case are they, and adore the Romans, whom they see flourishing in such prosperitie as might haue bin their own. But the Romans had farre better entreated Varro, who lost the battell at Cannæ; then Hannibal that wanne it: was vsed by the Carthaginians; they had freely bestowed, euerie man of them, all his priuate riches, vpon the Common wealth; and employed their labours for the publike, without craving recompense: as also they had not thought it much, though being in extreme want, to set out an armie into Spain, at what time the enemy lay vnder their owne walls. These were no Carthaginian vertues: and therefore the Carthaginians, hauing fought against their betters, much patiently endure the miseries belonging to the vanquished. Their pittifull behaviour bred peradventure some commiseration, yet their teares may seeme to haue beene mistrusted, as proceeding not lesse from enuie to the Romans, than from any feeling of their owne calamitie. They thought themselves able to fight with Masaniissa: which estimation of their forces was able to make them, after a litle while, enter into coparisons with Rome. Wherefore they obtained no such leaues as they sought, of defending their owne right by armes: but contrariwise, when without leaue obtained they presumed so far, the destruction of Carthage was thought an easie punishment of that offence. At the present, they receiued a gentle answer; though they had otherwise litle amends.

Gulussa the sonne of Masaniissa was then in Rome; and had not as yet craved audience. Hee was therefore called before the Senate; where hee was demanded the reason of his coming; and had related vnto him the complaint, made by the Carthaginians against his Father. He answered, That his Father, not being thoroughly aware of anie Embassadours thither sent from Carthage, had had therefore not giuen him instructions, how to deale in that busines. Only it was knowne, that the Carthaginians had held counsell diuerse nights, in the Temple of Aesculapius: whereupon he himselfe was dispatched away to Rome, there to entreat the Senate, that these common enemies of the Romans and of his Father might not bee ouermuch trusted; especially against his Father, whom they hated most maliciously, for his constant faith to the People of Rome. This answer gaue little satisfaction. Wherefore the Senate replied, that for Masaniissa's sake, they had done, and would doe, whatsoeuer was reasonable; but that it stood not with their iustice, to allow of this his violence, in taking from the Carthaginians those lands, which by the covenants of the league, were granted vnto them freely to enioy. With this milde rebuke they dismissed Galaissa; bestowing on him friendly presents (as also they did on the Carthaginians) and willing him to tell his father, that he should doe well to send Embassadors, more fully instructed in this matter. This happened when the Macedonian warre was euen ready to begin: at which time the Romans were not willing, too much to offend, either the Carthaginians, (for feare of vrging them vnseasonably to rebellion) or Masaniissa, at whole hands they expected no little helpe. So were they aided both by the Carthaginians, and Masaniissa: by the Carthaginians, partly for feare, partly for hope of better vantage in the future; by Masaniissa, in way of thankfulness; though if it had happened (which was vnlikely) that they should bee vanquished; hee made none other account, than that all Africke round about him and Carthage therewithall should bee his owne.

In the midst of all these cares, the Romans had not bene vnmindfull of Perseus. They visited him daily with Embassadours; that is, with honourable spies to obserue his behaviour. These hee entertained kindly at first, vntill (which tell our ere long) hee perceived whereto their diligence tended. First they quarrelled with him about the troubles in Dardania; neyther would they take any satisfaction, vntill the Bessians were thence gone; though hee protested, that hee had not sent for them. Afterward they pried narrowly into his doings; and were no lesse ill contented with good offices, by him done to sundrie of his neighbours, than with those wrongs, which they said (that he did vnto other some). Where hee did harme to anie; they called it, making warre vpon their friends: Where hee did good; they called such his bounty, seeking friends to take his part against them. The Dolopians, his subiects, vpon what occasion it is vncertaine; rebelled, and with exquisite torments slew Euphranor, whom hee had appointed their gouernour. It seemes that Euphranor had played the Tyrant among them. For they were a people without strength to resist the Macedonian: and therefore vnlikely to haue presumed so farre, vnlesse eyther they had bin extremely prouoked; or else were secretly animated by the Romans. Whatsoeuer it was that bred this outrage in them: Perseus did soone allay it, and reclaime them by strong hand. But the Romans tooke verie angrily, this presumption of the King: euen as if he had invaded some Countie of their Italian confederates, and not corrected his owne Rebels at home. Faine they would haue had him to draw in the same yoke with the Carthaginians; whereto hee had humbled him by his necke, they could not themselves haue done the part of Masaniissa, though Eumenes, or some other fit for that purpose, had bene wanting. And to this effect, they told him, That conditions of the league betweene them were such, as made it vnlawfull, both to his father heretofore, and now to him, to take armes without their license first obtained.

To the same passe they would also faine haue reduced the Greekes, and generally all their adherents euen such as had entred into league with them vpon equall termes: whom usually they rewarded with a frowne, whensoever they presumed to right themselves by force of Armes, without seeking first the Oracle at Rome. Hereof the Acheans had good experience: whose confidence in their proper strength made them otherwhiles bold to be their owne caruers; and whose hope of extraor-

dinarie fauour at Rome caused them the more willingly to referre their causes to arbitrement. For when they went about to haue chastised the Messenians by warre; T. Quintus rebuked them, as too arrogant, in taking such a worke in hand, without his authoritie: yet by his authoritie he ended the matter, wholly to their good liking. Semblably at other times were they rephended, euen with Lordly threats, when they tooke vpon them to carrie any bulinesse of importance, by their owne power, without standing vnto the good grace of the Romans. Who neuertheless, vpon submission, were apt enough to doe them right. Thus were they tamed by little and little, and taught to forget their absolute libertie, as by which they were not like to thrive; especially in vsurping the practise of armes, which belonged only to the Imperiall Citie. In learning this hard lesson, they were such vnward scholars, that they needed, and not long after felt, verie sharp correction. Yet was there no small part of blame to be imputed vnto their Masters. For the Roman Senate, being desirous to humble the Acheans; refused not only to giue them such aide as they requested, and as they challenged by the tenour of the League betweene them; but further, with a careless insolencie, rejected this honest and reasonable petition, that the Enemie might not be supplied from Italie, with victuals or armes. Herewith not content, The Fathers, as wearied with dealing in the affaires of Greece, pronounced openly, That if the Argives, Lacedaemonians or Corinthians, would revolt from the Acheans; they themselves would thinke it a bulinesse no way concerning them. This was presently after the death of Philopamen: at what time it was beleueed, that the Common wealth of Achaia was like to fall into much distresse; were it not vpheld by countenance of the Romans. All this notwithstanding, when Lyortus Praetor of the Acheans had vtterly subdued the Messenians farre sooner than was expected; and when as not only no Towne rebelled from the Acheans, but manie entred into their corporation: then did the Romans, with an ill fauoured grace, tell the same Embassadours, to whose petition they had made such bad answere (and who as yet were not gone out of the Citie) that they had strictly forbidden all manner of succour to bee carried to Messene. Thus thinking, by a fained grauitie, to haue serued their owne turnes; they manifested their conditions: both to set on the weaker, against the stronger and more suspected; and also to asume vnto themselves a Soueraigne power, in directing all matters of warre, which dissemblingly they would haue seemed to neglect. In like manner dealt they with all their confederates: not permitting anie of them to make warre, whether offensive or defensive; though it were against meere strangers; without interposing the authoritie of the Senate and People of Rome: vnlesse peradventure sometimes they winked at such violence, as did helpe towards the accomplishment of their owne secret malice. Now these Roman arts howsoeuer manie (for gainfull or timorous respects) would seeme to vnderstand them; yet were they generally displeasing vnto all men endued with free spirits. Only the Athenians, once the most turbulent Citie in Greece, hauing neyther subiects of their own that might rebell, nor power wherewith to bring anie into subiection; for want of more noble argument wherein to practise their eloquence that was become the whole remainder of their ancient commendations, were much delighted in flattering the most mightie. So they kept themselves in grace with the Romans, remained free from all trouble, vntill the warre of Antiochus: being men vnfit for action, and thereby innocent, yet beeing a part in many great actions, as Gratulators of the Roman victories, and Pardon-crauers for the vanquished. Such were the Athenians become. As for those other Common weales and Kingdomes, that with ouer nice diligence stroue to preserve their liberties and lands, from consuming by piece-meale: they were to be deuoured whole, and swallowed vp at once. Especially the Macedonian, as the most vnpliant, and wherein manie of the Greekes beganne to haue affiance, was necessarily to bee made an example, how much better it were better to bow than to breake.

Neither Perseus, nor the Romans were ignorant, how the Greekes at this time stood affected. Perseus by reason of his neare neighbourhood, and of the daily commerce betweene them and his subjects, could not want good information, of all that might concerne him, in their affaires. He well knew, that all of them now apprehended the danger which Philippeian had long since foretold, of the miserable subiection, whereinto Greece was likely to be reduced, by the Roman patronage. Indeed they not only perceived the approaching danger: but as being tenderly sensible of their libertie, felt themselves grieved with the present subiection, wherto already they were become obnoxious. Wherefore though none of them had the courage, in matters of the publike to fall out with the Romans: yet all of them had the care, to choose among themselves none other Magistrates, than such as affected the good of their Countre, and would for no ambition, or other seruile respect, bee flatterers of the greatnesse which kept all in feare. Thus it seemed likely, that all domestickall conspiracies would soone bee at an end; when honestie and loue of the Commonweale, became the fairest way to preferment. Of this careful provision for the safetie of Greece, the Romans were not thoroughly aduertised: eyther because things were diligently concealed from their Embassadors, whom all men knew to be little better than Spies, or because little account was made of that intelligence, which was brought in by such Traytors (of whom euerie Citie in Greece had too manie) as were men vnregarded among their owne people, and therefore more like to speake maliciously than truly; or perhaps because the Embassadors themselves, being all Senators, and capable of the greatest Office or charge, had no will to find out other matter of trouble, than was fitting to their owne desires of employment. But it is hard to conceale that which manie know, from those that are feared or flattered by manie. The Acheans being to send Embassadors to Rome, that should both excuse them, as touching some point wherein they refused to obey the Senate; and informe the Senate better in the same businesse; chose one Callicrates, among others, to goe in that Embassage. By their making choise of such a man; one may perceiue the advantage, which mischituous wretches, who commonly are forward in pursuing their vildesires, haue against the plaine sort of honest men, that least earnestly thrust themselves into the troublesome businesse of the weale publike. For this Callicrates was in such wise transported with ambition; that hee chose much rather to betray his Countre, than to let any other bee of more authority than himselfe therein. Wherefore instead of well discharging his credence, and alladging what was meetest in iustificacion of his people; hee vttered a quite contrarie tale; and strongly encouraged the Romans, to oppress both the Acheans, and all the rest of Greece, with a farre more heauie hand. He told the Senate, that it was high time for them, to looke vnto the setting of their authoritie, among his froward Countreimen; if they ment not wholly to foregoe it. For now there was taken vpa custome, to stand vpon points of confederacie, and lawes: as if these were principally to bee had in regard; any iunction from Rome notwithstanding. Hence grew it that the Acheans both now, and at other times, did what best pleased themselves, and answered the Romans with excuses: as if it were enough to say, That by some condition of League, or by force of some Law, they were discharged, or hindered, from obeying the decrees of the Senate. This would not be so, if He, and some other of his opinion, might haue their wils: who caused not to asseme, That no Columnes or Monuments erected, nor no solemn oath of the whole Nation, to ratifie the obseruance of Confederacie or statute, ought to be of force, when the Romans willed the contrarie. But was euen the fault of the Romans themselves, That the multitude refused to giue eare, vnto such perswasions. For howsoeuer in popular Estates, the sound of libertie vsed to bee more plausible, than any discourse tending against it: yet if they which vnderooke the maintenance of an argument, seeming neuer so bad, were sure by their so doing, to procure their owne good; the number of them would increase increase apace, and they became the preualent faction. It was therefore strange, how the Fathers could so neglect the aduicement of those, that sought wholly to enlarge the amptitude of the Roman maiesty. More wisely, though with seditious & rebellious purpose, did the Greekes: who many times, yea & ordinarily, conferred great honors, vpon men otherwise of little account or desert; only for hauing vttered some braue words against the Romans. The Fathers, hearing these & the like reasones, wherewith he exhorted the to handle roughly those that were obnoxious, & by cherishing their friends, to make their partie strong; refused to follow this good counsaile, in euery point, yea to depreesse al those that held with the right, & to set vp their own followers, were it by right or by wrong. And to this end, they not only dealt thecesserforth more peremptorily with the Acheans, than had been their manner in former times; but wrote at the present vnto al cities of Greece, requiring them to see that their mandate (which was concerning the restitution of those that were banished out of Lacedemon) should be fulfilled. Particularly in behalfe of Callicrates, they aduised all men, to be such, and so affected, as he was, in their feuerall common-weales. With this dispatch, Callicrates returned home a ioyfull man: hauing brought his Countre into the way of ruine, but himselfe into the way of preferment. Neuertheless he forbore to vant himselfe, of his eloquence vsed in the Senate. Only he so reported his Embassage, that all men became fearefull of the danger, wherwith he threatened those that should presume to oppose the Romans. By such arts hee obtained to be made Pretor of the Acheans: in which Magistracy, as in al his courtes following, hee omitted nothing, that might serue to manifest his readie obsequiousnes vnto those whom he had made his Patrons.

Now as the Romans by threatening termes wane manie flatterers, and lost as many true friends: so Perseus on the other side, thinking by liberrall gifts, and hopeful promises, to assure vnto himselfe those that ill could brooke his enemies; got indeed a multitude of partakers, though little honestier than his enemies had. Thus were all the Cities of Greece distracted with factions: some holding with the Romans; some with the Macedonian; and some few, respecting only the good of the Estates whereto they liued. Hereat the Lords of the Senate were highly offended; and thought it an indignitie not sufferable. That a King, no better than their vassall, should dare to become head of a faction against them. This therefore must be reckoned in the number of his trespasses: wherof if not any one alone, yet all of them together, shall afford them iust occasion to make war vpon him. Perseus hauing finished his businesse among the Dolopians, made a iournee to Apollonia his temple at Delphi. He tooke his armie along with him; yet went, and returned, in such peaceable and friendly wise, that no place was the worfe for his iournee, but the good affected towards him generally increased thereby. With those that were in his way, hee dealt himselfe; to such as lay further off, he sent Embassadors or letters: praying them, That the memorie of all wrongs whatsoever, done by his father, might bee buried with his father; since his own mening was to hold friendship sincerely with al his neighbors. The Romans perhaps could haue bene pleased better, if he had behaued himselfe after a contrarie fashion, and done some acts of hostilitie in his passage. Yet as if he ought not to haue taken such a iournee, without their licence; this also was made a valuable matter, and cast into the heap of his faults. He laboured greatly to recover the loue of the Acheans: which his father had so lost, that by a solemn decree, they forbade any Macedonian to enter their territories. It was jealousie perhaps, no lesse than hatred, which caused them, at the first, to make such a decree. For howsoeuer Philip had by manie vile acts, especially by the death of the two Arats, giuen them cause to abhor him: yet in the publike administration of their estate, he had, for the more part, bin to them so beneficiall, that not without much adoe and at length, without any generall consent, they refused to forsake him. Wherefore it was needfull, euen for preseruacion of concord among them, to vse all circumspection, that he might not, by his agents, negotiate, and hold intelligence with any, in a Countre to wards wards him so doubtfully affected: especially when by hearkening to his messages, they might make themselves suspected by their new friends. But the continuance of this decree, beyond the time of war, and when all danger of innovation was past; was vnciuill, if not inhumane, as nourishing deadly hatred, without leaving means of reconciliation. And herofe the Acheans reaped no good fruit. For although they were not, in like sort, forbidden the Kingdom of Macedon: yet vnderstanding what would be due to them, if they should aduenture thither, none of them durst set foot therein. Hence it came to passe, that their bondmerit, knowing a safe harbour, out of which their masters could not fetch them, ranne daily away, in great numbers: exceedingly to the losse of such, as made of their slaues very profitable vse. But Perseus took hold vpon this occasion: as fitly scruiing to pacifie those, whose enmitie faime he would haue changed into loue. He therefore apprehended all these fugitiues, to send them home againe: and wrote vnto the Acheans, That as for good will vnto them, he had taken paines to restore back their seruants; so should they do very well to take order for keeping them, that hereafter they might not runne away againe. His meaning was readily vnderstood, and his letters kindly accepted by the greater part; being openly reuerbered by the Pretor, before the Councell. But Callistratus took the matter very angrily, and bad them be aduised what they did; for that this was none other, than a plaine deuice, to make them depart from the friendship of the Romans. Herewithall heooke vpon him, somewhat liberally, to make the Acheans before hand acquainted with the war, that was coming vpon Perseus, from Rome. He told them, how Philip had made preparations for the same wars, how Demetrius had bin made away, because of his good affection to the Romans; and how Perseus had, since his being King, done manie things, tending to the breach of peace. Briefly He rehearsed all those matters, which were afterwards alleged by the Romans; the inuasion of the Balsarna, vpon the Dardaniens; the Kings iourne against the Dolopians; his voyage to Delphi; and finally his peaceable behauiour, which was (he said) a dangerous temptation of men to his partie. Wherefore he aduised them, to expect the euent of things, and not ouer-hastily to enter into any degree of friendship with the Macedonians. Hereto good answer was made by the Pretors brother: That Callistratus was too earnest, in so light a matter; and that, being neyther one of the Kings cabinet, nor of the Roman Senate, he made himselfe too well acquainted with all that had passed, or was like to follow. For it was well knowne, that Perseus had renewed his league with the Romans; that hee was by them saluted King, and friend to the Estate; and that He had louingly entertained their Embassadors. This being so: why might not the Acheans, as well as the Atolians, Thessalians, Epirots, and all the Greeks, hold with him such correspondence, as common humanitie required? Neuertheless Callistratus was growne a man so terrible, by his Romane acquaintance, that they durst not ouer-lustily gain say him. Therefore the matter was referred vnto further deliberation: and answere made the whilst, That since the King had only sent a letter without any Embassadour; they knew not how to resolve. Better it was to say thus, than that they were afraid to doe as they thought most reasonable and conuenient. But when Perseus, herewith not contented, would needs vrge them further, and send Embassadors: then were they faime, without a nic good pretence, to put on a countenance of anger, and denie to giue audience: which was prooue sufficient (to one that could vnderstand) of the condition wherein they liued. For hearkning to this aduice of Callistratus, they were sooner after highly commended by a Roman Embassadour: whereby it became apparent, that the Romans intended warre vpon the Macedonian; though hitherto no cause of warre was giuen.

§. V.

How EVMEDES King of Pergamus was busied, with PHARNACES, the Rhodiens and others. His hatred to the Macedonian: whom hee accerseth to the Roman Senate. The Senate honours him greatly, and condemnes his enemies the Rhodiens; with the causes thereof. The vniuersall stoutnesse of the Macedonian Embassadors. PERSEUS his attempt vpon EVMEDES. The brotherly loue betwene EVMEDES and ATTALVS. PERSEUS his deuice to perswade some of the Roman Senators: whereupon they decree warre against him, and send him defiance. Other things, concerning the issue of this warre.

EVMEDES* King of Pergamus had beene troubled, about these times, by the Kings Pharnaces and Antiochus his neighbours. Hee had taken the right courle; in making first his complaint to the Romans: by whom he was animated with comfortable words, & promise, That they, by their authoritie, would end the busines, to his content. But in conclusion, by the helpe of the Kings Prusias and Antiochus, hee ended the warre himselfe; and brought his Enemies to seeke and accept peace, on such conditions as pleased him to giue them. After this being at good leisure, hee beganne to consider, how the affaires of Macedon stood vnder Perseus. His hatred to Perseus was verie great: and therefore hee was glad to vnderstand, that the hatred of the Romans, to the same his Enemy, was as great, and withall notorious. Now besides his ancient and hereditarie quarrell with the Macedonians; it vexed him exceedingly, That his owne honours (whereof the Greekes, prodigall in that kind, had heaped immoderate store on his father and him) began to wax euerie where pale: whilst Perseus, either by his currying fauour, or by the enuie borne to the Romans, had gotten their best liking and wilhes. For despite of this indignitie, Hee flured vp the Lycians against the Rhodiens his old friends: and in helping these rebels was so violent, that he proceeded, in a manner, to open warre. But small pleasure found hee, in these poore and indirect courses of reuenge. The Lycians could not bee saued by his patronage, from seuerer and cruell chastisement, giuen to them by the Rhodiens. This rendered him contemptible: as likewise, his acts of hostilitie, little different from robberies, made him hateful to those which loued him before. As for his honours in the Cities of Greece; they not only continued falling into neglect; but were abrogated by a decree of the Acheans, as too vncircumfered, misbecoming them to giue, and affected by him beyond the proportion of his deservings. All this (which hee needed not to haue regarded, had hee not bene too vainly ambitious) betell him, especially for his being ouer-seruiceable to the Romans, and for his malice to that noble Kingdom, which if it fell the libertie of Greece was not like to stand. Now for the redresse hereof; hee thought it vaine to strue any longer with bountie, against such an aduersarie, as by hopefull promises alone, without any great performance, had ouer-topped him in the general fauour. And therefore hee resolved euen to ouerturne the foundations of this Popularitie, by inducing the Romans utterly to take away from the eyes of men, this Idol, The Macedonian Kingdom, which all so vainly worshipped. Neyther would it proue a difficult matter, To perswade those that were alreadye desirous rather he was like to bee highly thanked, for setting forward their wilhes; and perhaps to be recompensed with some peece of the Kingdom: as he had bin rewarded, for the like seruice, when Antiochus was vanquished.

To this end, He made a second voyage to Rome: where though hee had little to say which they knew not before; yet his words were heard with such attention, as if they had contained some strange noueltie, and so pondered by the Fathers, as if the weight of them were to turne the ballance, that before was equall. The death of

of Demetrius; the expedition of the Basilinna into Dardania; that of Perseus himselfe against the Dolopians; and to Delphi; the great estimation of the Macedonian in Greece; his intermedling in buisinesse of his neighbours; his riches; and his great productions: were all the materiall points of Eumenes his discourse. Only He defended vnto particulars, hauing searched into all (as he professed) like vnto a Spie. Hee said, That Perseus had thirtie thousand foot, and siue thousand Horse of his owne; monie in a readinesse to entertaine tenne thousand mercenaries for tenne yeares; armes, to furnish a number thrice as great; The Thracians his friends at hand, ready, at a call, to bring him soldiers as manie as he should require; and that hee prepared victuals for tenne yeares, because he would not bee driuen, eyther to liue vpon spoile, or to take from his owne subiects. Herewithall Hee prayed them to consider, that King Seleucus the sonne and successor of Antiochus the great, had given his daughter Laodice in marriage to Perseus; Perseus not wooing, but Seleucus offering the match; That King Prusias of Bithynia, by earnest suite, had gotten to wife the sister of Perseus; and that these marriages were solemnized with great concourse of Embassages from all quart. rs. Neyther spared Hee to tell them, (though seeming loath to vtter it plainly) That euen the enie to their Estate was the cause, why many that could not endure to beare of amitie with Philip, were now growne maruellously well affected to his sonne. All this, and some facts of Perseus, which might eyther bee denied, or iustified (as that hee had procured the death of some 20 which were friends to the Romans; and that hee had expelled Abrypolis the Illyrian, who invaded Macedon, out of his Kingdom or Lordship) Eumenes failed not to amplify vnto the most: saying that hee thought it his due to forewarne them; since it would bee to Himselfe a great shame, if Perseus got the start of him, and were in Italie making war vpon the Romans, ere Eumenes could come thither to tell them of the danger.

It were too great follie, to beleuee that the Romans stood in feare of Perseus, least he should set vpon them in Italie. Neuerthelesse forasmuch as they loued not to make war without faire pretence, not only of wrong done to them or their associates, but of further hurt intended: great thanks were giuen to Eumenes, who had 30 euery way furnished them with such goodly colour, to beautifie their intendment. Now thought it were so, that He told them little else than what they knew before: yet his person, and the manner of his coming, made all seeme greater. For if vpon anie relation made by their owne Embassadors, or vpon tales deuiled by their flatterers and spies, that he had warred against Perseus, ere Hee had committed any open act of hostilitie against them, their iniustice, and oppression, would haue bene most manifest. But when the wrongs to them done were so notorious, and the danger breathing them so terrible; that such a Prince as Eumenes, came out of his owne Kingdom, as farre as from Asia, to bid them looke to themselves: who could blame them, if they took the speediest order to obtaine their own right and 40 securitie? Toward this iustification of the warre, and magnifying the necessitie that enforced them thereto, their more than vsuall curiositie, in concealing what Eumenes had vttered in the Senate, when they could not but vnderstand that their errand was well knowne; helped not a little. The Macedonian and Rhodian Embassadors were at Rome, prouided of answers to the words, which they knew before hand that hee would speake; and with matter of recrimination. The vanitie, eyther of Him, or of some about him, seemes to haue disclosed all: when the warrenesse of the Fathers, in hiding that which all men knew, made a notable shew of some fearefull apprehension; against which, it behooued their wisdom to neglect no possible remedie. Wherefore carelesse audience was giuen to the Rhodian Em- 50 bassadors; who accused Eumenes, as one more troublesome to Asia, than Antiochus had euer bene, and a prouoker of the Lycians to rebellion. The Rhodian had with great pompe conueighed by Sea vnto Perseus, his bride Laodice, which friendly office as the Macedonian bountifully required, so the Romans despitfully accepted.

cepted. Hence it grew, that when the Lycians, as alreadie vanquished, were setting themselves in their obedience to the people of Rhodes: Embassadors came from Rome with strange newes which gaue new life to the rebellion. For the Senate pronounced, That it stood not with the manner of the Romans, to aliene quire from their owne protection anie people or Nation by them vanquished; and that the Lycians were by them assigned vnto those of Rhodes, not as mere vassals, but as dependants and associates. For prooffe hereof, they referred the melues vnto the commentaries of the ten Embassadors, whom they had sent to dispose of things in Asia, after the victorie against King Antiochus. Hereat Eumenes, Atanassa, The Atolians, 10 and all other Kings or Estates, that were beholding to Rome for increasing the number of their subiects, had cause to find themselves agrieved if they wel considered the matter: since by force of this or the like decree, those their subiects might easily bee made their fellowes, whensoever it should please the Senate; though it were so, that all men knew the present meaning of the Senate, which was only to plague the Rhodians, for their good will to Perseus, by setting them and the Lycians together by the eares. The Fathers could therefore see no reason to dislike Eumenes, vpon this complaint made by the Rhodian Embassadors; which indeed more nearly touched themselves. Rather they honoured the King so much the more: for that others (as they would needes take it) conspired against him, because of his loue to 20 Rome.

But the Macedonian Embassage they heard not so carelesly as angrily: though peraduenture it well contented them to find cause of anger. For whereas at other times all care had been taken, to pacifie them with gentle words and excuses: now heard they plainer language, and were told, That King Perseus desired much to giue them satisfaction, concerning any deed or word of his, that might fauour of hostilitie; but that, if his trauaile in this kind proued vaine, then would hee be ready to defend himselfe by armes, and stand to the chance of warre, which often falls out contrarie to expectation. These big words may seeme to haue proceeded from the vehemencie of Fluplus, that was chiefe of the Embassadors; rather than from 30 instruction giuen by the King, with whose faint heart they agreed not. Yet was there good reason, why Perseus himselfe might, at this time, thinke to speed better by a shew of daring, than he was like to doe by any submission. For the eyes of all Greece being now cast vpon him, as on the greatest hope of deliuerance from the Roman seruitude; it was not expedient, that he should lessen, or perhaps vtterly cut off, the generall expectation, and the good affection borne to him, which thereon depended, by discouraging his too much weaknesse of spirit, vnanswerable to a worke of such importance. Wherefore He, or his Embassador for him, was bold to set a good countenance on a game not verie bad, but subiect (in appearance) to Fortune; which might haue bene his, had hee knowne how to vse it.

40 Now that this brauerie (as better it may bee termed than courage) proceeded from the Kings owne heat; it appears by his daring to aduenture some after, on a practise that more iustly might anger the Romans, and giue them fairer shew of reason to make war vpon him. It was knowne that Eumenes, in returning home, would take Delphi in his way, and there doe sacrifice to Apollo. Perseus deadly hating him, and thirsting after his blood, resolved to way-lay him, and by making there of him a sacrifice, to rid his owne hands of a most mischievous enimie. So there were appointed three or foure stout ruffians to do the murder: who placing themselves behind a broken mud wall on the side of a verie narrow path leading vp from the Seato the Temple; did thence assault the King, whom they sorely bruised 50 with great stones, and left for dead. They might haue finished their worke; such was the opportunitie of the place which they had chosen; but feare of being apprehended, made them; without staying to see all sure, liee in such halt, that they killed one of their owne companions, who could not hold pace with them, because he should not discover them. Eumenes was conueighed away to the little Ile of Ae-

gina, where he was cured being all the while kept so secretly, that the fame of his death was current in Asia. Hence it came, that his brother Attalus tooke upon him as king, and either took or would have taken to wife (supposing it belike a matter of state) Stratonice the daughter of King Ariarathes, whom hee then thought the widow of Eumenes. It may well be numbered among the rare examples of brotherly loue, That when the King returned aloue home, Attalus going forth to meet him and doe his dutie, as in former times, received none other checke, than that He should forbear to marrie with the Queene, untill hee were well assured of the Kings death. More than this, Eumenes neuer spake of these matters; but bequeathed at his death, vnto the same brother, both his wife and Kingdome. As likewise Attalus forbore to attempt any thing to the prejudice of the King his brother: though the Romans (with whom he continued and grew in especiall fauour, when Eumenes fel into their hatred) were in good readinesse, to haue transferred the Kingdome from his brother to him. By such concord of brethren was the Kingdome of Pergamus rayfed and vpheld: as might also that of Macedon haue bene, if Demetrius had liued and employed his grace with the Romans, to the benefit of Perseus.

It is likely that Perseus was verie glad when he vnderstood, that his ministers had both accomplished his will, and had suaded all from discouerie. But as hee was deceived in the maine point, and heard shortly after, that Eumenes liued: so was hee beguiled in that other hope, of the concealment, which hee vainly esteemed the lesse materiall. For He had written to one Praxa a Gentlewoman of Delphi, to entertaine the men whom he sent about this busines: and she, being apprehended by C. Valerius a Roman Embassador then attending vpon the matters of Greece, was carried to Rome. Thus all came to light. Valerius also brought with him to Rome, out of Greece, one Rammius a Citizen of Brundisium: who comming newly from the court of Macedon, laden with a dangerous secret, had presently sought out the Embassador, and thereof discharged himselfe. Brundisium was the ordinarie port, for ships passing betweene Italie and Greece. There had Rammius a faire house; wherein hee gaue entertainment, being a wealthie man, to Embassadors, and other honourable personages, both Romans and Macedonians, iourning to and fro. By occasion of such his hospitalitie, he was commended to Perseus, and inuited into Macedon with friendly letters; as one, whose manie courtesies to his Embassadors, the King was studious to requite. At his comming he was much made of; and shortly, with more familiaritie than he expected or desired, made partaker of the Kings secrets. The summe of all was, That hee must needs doe a turne, in giuing to such of the Romans as the King should hereafter name, a poyson of rare qualitie, sure in operation, yet not to be perceived either in the taking or afterward. He durst not refuse to accept this employment: for feare least the vertue of this medicine should bee tried vpon himselfe. But being once at libertie; he discouered all. Rammius was but one man, and one whom the King had neuer seene before, nor was like to see againe: and therefore, besides that the Kings deniall ought to be as good as such a fellows affirmation, the accusation was improbable. Thus did Perseus, in time shortly following, answer for himselfe; and in like sort concerning the attempt vpon Eumenes: denying to haue had any hand, cyther in the one or other: yet withall professing, That such obiections were not to be made vnto a King, to proue the rightfulness of making war vpon him; but rather vnto a subiect pleading for his life in judgment. But howsoeuer the Romans neglected the getting of stronger prooffe (which might haue bin easie) than any that we find by them produced: yet the base and cowardly temper of Perseus was very futeable to these practises. Neyther did the Senate greatly stand so to dispute the matter with him: these his treacheries being held inexcusable. And as for his Royall Estate, wherein he supposed that they ought not to touch him for such private offences; it gaue him no priuiledge: they judging him to haue offended in the nature of a King. Herein surely they were not good reason. For if hee might might not lawfully make warre vpon Eumenes their confederate; that is, if Hee might not send men, to wait the Kingdome of Pergamus, or to besiege the townes: might he send Ruffians to murder the King? If it were no lesse breach of the league to destroy the Senators by fire or famine, than by violence of the sword: was it lawfull for him to doe it by Poyson? Wherefore they presently decreed warre against him; and sent Embassadors to denounce it vnto him, vnto hee would yeeld to make such amends as they should require. Hee seemed, at this time, to haue bene so confident, in the generall fauour of Greece, and other comfortable appearances; that if he desired not warre, yet he did not feare it: or at least he thought by shew of courage, to make his enimies the more calme. He caused the Embassadors to dance attendance, till being wearie they departed without audience. Then called he them back; and bad them doe their errand. They made a tedious rehearsal of all matters, which they had long bene collecting against him, and wherewith Eumenes had charged him: adding thereto, that He had entertained long and secret conference in the Isle of Samothrace, with Embassadors sent to him out of Asia, about some ill purpose. In regard of all which they contemptorily required satisfaction; as was their manner when they intended to giue defiance. Better they might haue stood vpon the euidence, brought against him by Rammius and Praxa. For if those accusations could be verified, then wanted they not good ground wheron to build: of which otherwise they were delituite; it being no fault in a King, to be strong, welbeloued, and well friended. Perseus answered, for the present, in a rage, calling the Romans, Greedie, Proud, Insolent, and vnderminers of him by their daily Embassadors, that were no better then meere spies. Finally, he promised to giue them in writing their full answer: which was to this effect; That hee would no longer stand to the league, made betweene them and his father, and renewed by himselfe indeed onely for feare: but wished them to defend to more equal conditions, wherupon he, for his part, would aduise, as they might also doe for theirs.

In the forme of the league betweene Philip and the Romans, as it is set downe by Polybius, we finde no condition, binding the Macedonian to any inconuenience in the future; excepting those which he immediatly performed. But Luic inserts a clause, whereby he was expressly forbidden, to make any warre abroad, without leave of the Romans. It is most likely, that all the Roman confederats were included in this peace: whereby euery one of the neighbours round about Macedon, entring shortly into league with Rome, did so binde the Kings hands, that he could no more make warre abroad, than if he had bene restrained by plaine couenant. And thus might that seeme an Article of the peace, which neuer was agreed vpon, but only was inferred by consequence. Now if the Romans would vrge this point further, and say, that the Macedonian might not beare defensive armes, without their permission: then had Perseus very iust reason to find himselfe agrieved. For since they had allowed his father, without controule, to make warre in Thrace, (whilest they themselves were vnacquainted with the Thracians) and elsewhere abroad, though he asked not their licence: why should they now interpret the bargain after another fashion? Was it now become vnlawfull for him to chastise his owne Rebels, or to repay an Illyrian that invaded Macedon? By such allegations he maintained the right of his cause, in very milde sort; when it was too late. At the present, by disclaiming the league, as vnlikt; hee ministred occasion vnto the Embassadors, to giue him defiance. Having heard the worst of their message; he commanded them to be gone out of his Kingdome in three dayes. But either hee should haue bene lesse vehement; or more constant in his resolution. For if his heart could serue him to vndertake the warre; hee should courageously haue managed it, and haue fallen to worke immediatly, whilest the Enemy was vnpreparaed; not haue lost opportunitie, as now and often he did, in hope of obtaining a worse peace than the former.

The Romans solicit the Greekes, to ioyne with them in the warre against PERSEVS. How the Greekes good affected in that warre. The timorouse of PERSEVS. MARTIUS a Roman Embassador. deludes him with hope of peace. His forces. He takes the field; and winnes part of Thessalie. The forces of LICINIUS the Roman Consul: and what assistants the Romans had in this warre. Of Tempe in Thessalie; and what advantages the Macedonian had, or might haue had; but lost by his feare. PERSEVS braues the Romans; fights with them; knowes not how to vse his victorie; sues for peace; and is denied it by the vanquished. PERSEVS hauing the worse in a skirmish, forsakes all the countrey lying without Tempe. The Boetians rebell against the Romans, and are rigorously punished. The Roman Commanders unfortunate in the warre against PERSEVS. They vex the Greekes their friends; for whose ease the Senate makes prouision; hauing heard their complaints. The slauing of Alabanders.

SO long had the Romans beene seeking occasion to take in hand this Macedonian warre, that well they might haue bin readie for it, when it came; and not (as they were) behinde hand in prouisions. But it was on a sudden that they met with a confluence of good pretences to make the warre; whereof if no one alone had weight enough, yet all of them together, seemed more than sufficient. This opportunitie of making their cause honest in common opinion, was not to be neglected: though otherwise they were vnprepared for the action. Wherefore knowing, or hauing reason to beleue, that their owne strength was such as would preuaile in the end; they hastily embraced the faire occasion of beginning, and referred other cares to the diligence of Time. Neither was this their vncadence a small helpe, towards examining the disposition of the Greekes, and others; who multatierwards dearly pay for any backwardnesse found in their good will. There was not indeed any cause to feare, that all of the Greekes or other Easterne people should conspire together, and take part with the Macedonian: such was the dissension betwene their severall estates; howsoever the generalitie of them were inclined the same way. Neuerthelessse Embassadors were sent to deale with them all; and to craue their helpe against PERSEVS, or rather to demand it, in no lesse ample manner, than heretofore they had yielded it against Philip and Antiochus, in warres pretending the liberty of Greece. The Embassadors vied as gentle words, for fashions sake; as if they had stood in doubt, that their request might happen to be denied. But the Greekes were now growne well acquainted with such Roman courtiesse: and vnderstood, that not only such as made refusal, euen when they had done their best, lest it should bee ill taken, as if they had bailed in some part of their dutie. It is strange that men could bee so earnest to set vp the side, whereof they gladly would haue scene the ruine. The vulgar fort was euen where added to PERSEVS, of the Nobles and Rulers, if some were vehemently Roman; they wanted not opposers, that were wholly Macedonian; yea the wisest and most honest, who regarded onely the benefit of their Countrey, wished better to PERSEVS then to the Romans. And of this number, Polybus the chiefe of Historians was one: who though hee * judged the victorie of PERSEVS, like to proue hurtfull vnto Greeces, yet wished hee the Romans ill to thriue, that so the Greekes might recouer perfect libertie: for his endeuours in which course, hee was at length tyrannically handled, as shall be shewed hereafter. This considered, it appears, that that an extraordinary feare, and not onely reuerence of the Imperiall Citie, made the Achaeans, and other Estates of Greece, thus conformable to the Romans. The occasion of this their feare, may be iustly imputed vnto the timorous demeanour of PERSEVS himselfe. He had vnderaken a war, whereof the benefit should redound, not only to his own kingdom, but vnto all that were oppressed by the Romans. Yet no sooner were some few companies brought ouer sea, to make a countenance of meaning somewhat against him; than he began to speake the enemy faire, and sue for peace at Rome. Since therefore it was knowne, that euerly small thing would serue to terrifie him; and consequently, that it should at all times be in the Romans power, by giuing him any tolerable conditions of peace, to take reuenge at leisure vpon thole which had assisted him: little cause was there, why any should adventure to partake with him. He made indeed a great noise; leading about his armie; taking by force or composition, some few townes; and soliciting all to ioyne with him. But wise men could not be so beguiled. For at the same time, he sought all meanes of pacification: and to that end, made humble suit vnto the Roman Embassadors. Q. Martius, the chiefe of those Embassadors, and a man of more finenes in cunning then was vsuall among the Romans, made shew of inclination to the Kings desire: and gaue out such comfortable words, that the King intreated, and obtained a meeting at the Riuer Peneus. There did Martius very gently rebuke the King, and charge him with those crimes that are before mentioned. Whereof though PERSEVS made none other answer, than the same which they could haue made for him; yet the Embassadors, and especially Martius, took it in good part, as therewith satisfied; and aduised him to giue the like satisfaction to the Senate. That this might conveniently bee done; a truce was agreed vpon. Thus had Martius his desire; which was to make the King lose time. For PERSEVS had all things then in readines, and might haue done much, ere the Roman armie could haue bin in Greece. But by the interposition of this truce, he no way increased his forces; he iusted a most convenient season, of winning vpon the enemy, to slip away; and obtained in recompence nothing else, than leisure and vaine hope. Yet was he pleased herewith, as it had bin with some victory: publishing a copie of the disputation between him and the Romans, whereby he gaue men to vnderstand, how much he had the better, and what great hope there was of peace. Hee sent Embassadors also to the Rhodians, of whose good will to him he was best perswaded; not onely to let them know how much he was superior in cause; but to intreat them, that they would take vpon them, as moderators, to compound the differences between him and the Romans, if perhaps, notwithstanding the goodnes of his cause, hee should be denied peace. These were poore helps. For hereby it appeared, that his late standing vpon points of Honor, was no better than meere vanity: his owne safety being the vtmost of his ambition. This his fearefulness might seeme excusable, and the blame thereof to appertaine vnto the Greekes; who deceived his expectation, by being wanting to him in time of a necessitie, that was partly their own: had it not bin his office, who took vpon him as their Champion, to giue such a manly beginning to the warre, as might incourage all others to follow him. But his timorous quality being found, men grew daily more and more queris from him, and were carefull, not to put their shoulders to a falling wall. The Rhodians, among whom he had many stout partizans, desired him not to craue any thing at their hands, in which they might seem to do against the good liking of the Romans. The Boetians also, who had entred of late into a strict society with the Macedonian; renounced it now, and made the like with the Romans: to whom further, in a fort, they yielded themselves as vassals. Neither was Martius contented to accept their submission vnder a general forme; but caused their severall towns to make couenant apart, each for it selfe; to the end, that being thus distracted into many little common-weales, they might not (were they neuer so desirous to rebell) haue such force to doe hurt, as when they agreed, and were incorporated in one, vnder the Citie of Thebes. This work, of separating the Boetians from

from Thebes their their head; was more than Agesslaus could effect, or Epaminondas would suffer, then when all Greece followed the Lacedemonians, so far more available to Thebes, being destitute of helpe from abroad, was the vertue of Epaminondas and a few braue Citizens; than was the societic with King Perseus, against a number not so great as followed the Lacedemonians.

Martius brought this to effect, whillett the King sat still, as being bound by the truce: and having done this, he returned to the Citie; where vaunting what hee had wrought by his craft, he was commended, and (though some reprobud it as dishonest) employed againe by the Senate, with commission to deale as he should thinke expedient. Touching the Embassadors which Perseus had sent; audience was giuen to them, for that they should not plainly see how their Master was deluded: but neither excuse, nor intreatie, would serue their turne; the Senate being resolu'd before hand what to doe. It was enough that they were admitted into the Citie, and had thirtie daies respite allowed them to depart out of Italy: whereas they who came laft on the same errand, did their mteffage without the walles, in the Temple of Belona (the usual place of giuing audience to open Enemies, or to such Commanders, as might not, by reason of some custome, enter the Citie) and had only the short warning of eleuen dayes, to be gone out of Italy. Neither did this poore courtlie seruice alone to hide the craft of Martius, as if hee had meant none other but good earnest: but it was a likely mean, both to keepe a long while from Perseus the knowledge of his businesse, and to stagger his resolution, when he should need it most firme.

And accordingly it fell out. For Licinius, the Roman Consul, was at Apollonia, in a manner as soone, as the Macedonian Embassadors were with their King at Pella. Which though it were enough to haue rouz'd Perseus, and haue made him lay aside all cowardly hope of getting pardon: yet was hee content to deliberate a while, Whether it were not better to offer himselfe tributary to the Romans; and to redeeme their good will with some part of his kingdom: that so he might enjoy the rest; than to put all at once to hazard. But finally, the stoutest counsaile prevailed: which also was the wisest; and so would haue proued, had it bene stoutly and wisely followed. He now began, as if the warre had not begunne vntill now; to doe what should haue bin done long afore. He caus'd all his forces to be drawn together, and appointed their Rendezous at Citium, a towne in Macedon. All being in readines, he did royall sacrifice, with an hundred beafts, to I know not what Mi-nerua, that was peculiarly honored in his Country: and then, with all his Courtiers, and those of his guard, set forward to Citium. His armie he found consisting of nine and thirtie thousand foot, and foure thousand horse: whereof about twelue thousand foot, and a thousand horse, were strangers of sundry Nations, most part Thracians; therof his owne Macedonians. These hee animated with liuely speeches; laying before them the glory of their ancestors, the insolencie of the Romans, the goodnesse of his cause, the greatnesse of his prouisions, and the many aduantages which they had of the Enemy, especially in numbers. They answered him cheerfully, with loud acclamations, and bade him be of good courage. From all Cities of Macedon there came likewise messengers, offering to helpe him with money and victuals, according to their feuerall abilities. He gaue them thanks: but answered, That his owne prouisions would abundantly suffice, willing them only to furnish him with carts, for his engines and munition.

Out of his owne kingdom he issued forth into Thessalie: knowing that the Romans were to passe through that countrey, in their iourney towards him. Some townes of Thessalie opened their gates vnto him, without making offer to defend themselves: some he balked, thinking them too strong or well manned; and some he wanne by force. Of these last was Styssa; a towne thought impregnable, and therefore, not more stoutly then proudly defended by the Inhabitants, who gaue contumelious language to the assailants. It was taken by reason of a fallie; which the the Townemen rashly made, and being driuen backe, receuued the Macedonians, that entred pell mell with them at the gate. All crueltie of warre was practis'd heere: to the greater terror of the oblitrate. So Velatiae and Connus (towns of much importance, especially Connus, which stood in the freights of Ossa, leading into Tempe) yielded at the first. Having well fortified this passage, the king marched on wards to Sycrium, a towne seated on the foot of mount Ossa; where he rested a while, expecting newes of the Enemy.

Licinius the Consul brought with him only two Roman Legions: being promised other strength of auxiliaries, which was thought sufficient. Eumenes and Attalus his brother, came to him in Thessalie, with foure thousand foot, and a thousand horse. Thither also came, from euery part of Greece, such aide as the feuerall Estates could afford, or thought expedient to send; which from the most of them was very little. Of the kings abroad; Masaniassa sent thither his sonne Misagones, with a thousand foot, as many horse, and two and twentie Elephants. Antiochus the Cappadocian, by reason of his affinitie with Eumenes, was friend to the Romans, and had sent to Rome his yong sonne, there to be brought vp: yet hee did little or nothing in this warre; perhaps because Eumenes himselfe began within a while, but when it was too late, to be otherwise aduised than he had bene in the beginning. Prusias was content to be a looker on: as being allied to Perseus, and yet fearing the Romans. Antiochus, and Ptoleme (though Ptoleme was then yong, and vnder Tutors) had busines of their owne; the Syrian meaning to invade the Aegyptian: yet each of them promised helpe to the Romans, which they cared not to performe. Gentius the Illyrian was inclinable to the Macedonian: yet made good countenance to the Romans, for feare. It was a prettie trick, where with Ms. Lucetius, the Roman Admirals brother, serued him, for this his counterfeiter good will. This king had foure and fittie shippes, riding in the haue of Dyrrachium, vncertaine to what purpose: all which Lucetius tooke away, after a very kind fort; making shew to beleue, That for none other end than to serue the Romans, their good friend Gentius had sent thither this fleet. But whatsoeuer Gentius thought in the beginning; he foolishly lost both his kingdom and himselfe, in the end of this war; by offering, rather then giuing, his helpe to Perseus.

With none other company than what he brought ouer the sea, Licinius came into Thessalie: so tyred with a painfull iourney, through the mountainous country of Athamania, which stood in his way from Epirus; that if Perseus had been ready, attending his descent into the Plaines, the Romans must needs haue taken a great overthrow. He refreshed himselfe and his wearied armie, by the riuer Peneus; where he encamped, attending his auxiliaries, that came in as fast as they could. It was not any slender helpe, that could enable him to deale with Perseus. Therefore he resolu'd; to abide where he then was, and keepe his trenches, vntill his numbers were sufficiently increased: contenting himselfe in the meane while, to haue gotten quiet entrance into the Countrey. The land of Thessalie, in which these two armies lay, was better affected to the Romans, than any part of Greece besides: as hauing bene freed by them from a more heauie yoke of bondage to the Macedonians, when there was little hope or expectation of such a benefit. It was generally rich, fruitfull, and abounding in all things needfull to mans life. In the midst of it, but somewhat more to the East, was that beautifull valley of Tempe, so exceedingly full of all delights, that the name was often vsed at large, to signifie the most pleasant and goodly places. This valley of it selfe was no great: but adding to it those huge mountaines, Ossa and Olympus (famous in Poesie) with their Spurs or branches, by which it was on all sides enclosed; it occupied the better part of Thessalie. And this way were the Romans to enter into Macedon: yflesse they would make an hungrie iourney, thorow the countrey of the Dassaretians, as in the former warre with Philip, they had long, in vaine, attempted to doe. Perseus therefore had no small aduantage, by being master of the freights leading into Tempe: though far greater greater he might haue had, if by mispending of time he had not lost it. For in defending the ragged passages of these mountaines, he was able to put the Romans often to the worke; yea to winne vpon them (for a while) every yeare more than other, both in strength and reputation: questionlesse he might haue done far greater things, had he seized vpon the freights of Aous, which his father once kept, and defended all the countrie behind the Mountaines of Pindus. Surely not without extreame difficultie, must the Romans haue either traueled by land, with all their carriages and impediments, through places wherein was no reliefe to bee found; or else haue committed their armies, and all things thereto needfull, vnto the mercie of seas that were very dangerous; if they would haue sought other way into Macedon, than through the heart of Greece: vpon neither of which courses they once deuised, notwithstanding any trouble which they found in this present warre. It may perhaps be said, that the Greekes, and others, whom the King must haue left on his backe, would haue made him vnable to defend any places too farre from his owne home. But they were all, excepting the Thessalians, better affected now to him, than they had bin to his father in the former warre. The Ætolians, vpon whom the Albanians depended, grew into suspicion with the Romans (as we shall finde anon) euen as soone as they met with Perseus. The Boeotians, how politickly sooner Marcius had wrought with them, aduertured themselves desperately in the Macedonians quarrell: what would they haue done, if he at first had done his best? The Rhodians, Illyrians, yea and Eumenes himselfe, after a while began to wauer, when they saw things goe better with Perseus, then they had expected. So that if in stead of discouraging his friends, by suing basely for peace; he had raised their hopes, by any braue performance in the beginning; and encreased the number of his well-willers, yea and bought downe with money (as he might haue done) some of his enemies, and among them Eumenes, who offered for good recompence, to forget his broken head; then might the Romans perhaps haue bin compelled to forsake their imperious patronage ouer Greece; and to render the libertie, by them giuen, entire; which otherwise was but imaginarie. Such benefit of this warre, since it was hoped for afterwards, might with greater reason haue bene expected at first, from greater advantages. But as a fearefull companie running from their enemies, till some riuier stay their flight; are there compelled by mere desperation to doe such actes, as done, while the battell lasted, would haue wonne the victorie: so fell out with Perseus. In seeking to auoid the danger of that war, whereof he should haue fought the honor; hee left his friends that would haue stood by him, and gaue them cause to prouide for their owne safetie: yet being overtaken by necessitie, he chose rather to set his back to the mountaines of Tempe, and defend himselfe with his proper forces; than to be driuen into such miserie, as was inescapable, if he gaue a little further ground. What was performed by him or the Romans, all the while that he kept his footing in Thessalie, it is hard to shew particularly; for that the historie of those things is much perished. Wherefore we must be contented with the summe.

The Consul hauing no desire to fight, vntill such time as all his forces were arriued; kept within his trenches, and lay still encamped by the Riuier of Peneus, about three miles from Larissa. That which perswaded the Consul to protract the time; did contrariwise incite the King, to put the matter vnto a hasty triall. Wherefore he invited the Romans into the field; by walling the land of the Phereans their confederates. Finding them patient of this indignitie; he grew bold to adventure euen vnto their trenches: out of which if they issued, it was likely, that his advantage in horse would make the victorie his owne. At his coming they were troubled; for that it was sudden: yea way terrified; as knowing themselves to bee safely lodged. They sent out a few of King Eumenes his horse, and with them some light armed foot, to entertaine skirmish. The Capitaine, and some other of these were slaine: but no matter of importance done; for that neither Licinius, nor Eumenes, found it reasonable to hazard battaile. Thus day after day, a while together, Perseus continued offering battaile: which they still refused. Hereby his boldnes much encreased; and much more, his reputation: to the griefe of those, who being too farre come to make a conquest, could ill digest the blame, that fell vpon them by their enduring these brauadoes. The towne of Styracum, where Perseus then lay, was twelue miles from the Romans: neither was there any conuenient watering in that long march, which vsed to take vp foure houres of the morning; but he was faine to bring water along with him in carts, that his men might not be both wearie and thirstie when they came to fight. For remedie of these inconueniences, he found out a lodging, seuen miles neerer to the Enemie: whom he visited the next day by the Sunne rising. His comming at such an vnusuall houre, filled the Campe with tumult: in so much as though hee brought with him onely his horse and light armature, that were vsuit to assaile the trenches, yet the Consul thought it necessary, and resolved to giue checke to his pride. Wherefore he sent forth his brother C. Licinius, King Eumenes, Attalus, and many braue Captaines, with all his power of horse, his Velites, and all the rest of his light armature, to trie their fortune: he himselfe remaining in the Campe, with his Legions in readinesse. The honor of this morning, was the Macedonian Kings; for he obtained the victorie in a manner entire, (though the Thessalians made a good retreat) with little losse of his owne. But hee discouraged his weaknesse ere night, by hearkening, as Princes commonly doe, to counsaile giuen by one of his owne temper. For whereas the Romans were in great feare lest he should assaile their Campe; and to that purpose, vpon the first newes of his successe, his Phalanx was brought vnto him by the Captaines, though vsient for: he neuertheless tooke it for sound aduice, which indeed was timorous and base, To worke warily, and moderate his victorie; by which meanes it was said, That either he should get honest conditions of peace, or at leastwise many companions of his fortune. Certainly it was like, that his good fortune would exalt the hope and courage of his friends. Yet had it bin greater; and had hee wonne the Roman Campe, his friends would haue bene the more, and the bolder. But ouer-great was his folly, in hoping then for peace: and in suing for it, euen when he had the victorie, what else did hee, than proclaim vnto all which would become his partakers, that neither good nor bad fortune should keepe him from yielding to the Romans, whensoever they would be pleased to accept him? At this time the ioy of his victorie would admit none of these considerations. Hee had slaine of the Roman horse two hundred, and taken of them prisoners the like number. Of their foot hee had slaine about two thousand: losing of his owne no more than twentie horse and fortie foot. The Roman Campe, after this disaster, was full of heavinesse and feare: it being much doubted that the enemie would set vpon it. Eumenes gaue counsaile to dislodge by night, and remove to a surer place beyond the Riuier Peneus. The Consul, though ashamed to professe, by so doing, in what feare he stood; yet thought it better to acknowledge the losse past, than by standing on proud tearmes, to draw vpon himselfe a greater calamitie. So hee passed the Riuier in the dead of the night, and incamped more strongly on the further side. The Ætolians were sorely blamed for this losse: as if rather a trayterous meaning, than any true feare, had occasioned their flight, wherein the rest of the Greekes followed them. Five of them, that were men of speciall marke, had ben obscured, to be the first which turned their backs: an obseruation likely to cost them deere, at a time of better leisure. As for the Thessalians, their vertue was honored with reward: so as the Greekes might learne, by examples of either kinde, that if they would hunne indignation, or incurre fauour; then must they adventure no lesse for their Lordes sake, than gladly they would doe for their own libertie. Thus farred it with the Consul and his armie: Perseus came the next day to correct the former dayes error; which how great it was, hee not vntill then found. The Romans were gotten into a place of safetie; whither they could neuer haue

haue attained, if the King had either pressed his victorie, or giuen better heed to them that night: his light armature alone being sufficient to haue rowted them, whilst they were conuincing themselves to the other side of Peneus. But it was vaine to tell what might haue been done: since there was no remedie. The Romans were beaten, euen the flower of their Citie, the Gentlemen of Rome; out of whom were chosen their Senators, and consequently the Generals themselves, Pretors, Consuls, and all that bore office or command among them; yea they were beaten so shamefully, that they stole away by night, and suffered him to gather vp the spoiles of them without resistance, as yielding themselves ouercome. With such braue words did the King set out the glory of his action; diuiding the spoiles among his followers. But there was much wanting within him, to haue made his honor sound. He came nearer to the Romans, and encamped at Mopselus, a place in the mid-way betwene Tempe and Larissa: as if it were his meaning to presse them somewhat harder. Neuertheless hee was easily perswaded to vnder the occasion, which he seemed to haue, of obtaining peace. Therefore hee sent vnto the Consul, and offered to yield vnto the same conditions, wherein his father had been bound to the Romans; if the war might so take end. It were needlesse, heere againe to shew the folly of this his course. Towards the accomplishment of this desired peace, there was in the Consul no greater power, than to grant a truce, whilst Embassadors might goe to Rome: it resting in the Senate and People to approve the conditions, and ratifie the league. And of such a truce granted by Martius, he had lately found no small discommodity redounding. But Licinius dealt plainly, and returned answer, That other hope of peace there was none; saue that Perseus would yield both his Kingdome and Person, simply and absolutely, to discretion of the Senate. A manly part it was of Licinius to bee so resolute in aduersitie. On the other side, it argued a very faint heart in Perseus, that hauing receiued an answer so peremptorie, he still persisted, making vaine offers of greater tribute. Finding that the peace, which he so much desired, could not be purchased with money, the king withdrew himselfe backe to Sycyrium. There he lay hearkening what the Enemy did; whose forces were well repaired by the comming of Misagenes the sonne of Misamis, with the aid before mentioned. This distance betwene the King and them, caused the Romans to waxe the more bold in making their haruest: about which businesse they ranged ouer all the fields. Their carelesse demeanour gaue him hope to doe some notable exploit: which hee attempted, both vpon their Campe, and vpon those that were abroad. The Campe he thought to haue fired on the sudden: but the alarme being taken in good season, he failed in the enterprise. As for the forragers, he had a good hand vpon them, if he could haue withdrawn it, and giuen ouer in time. But whilst he strove to force a garrard, he was visited by the Consul; by whom either in a skirmish of horse, or (for the report is diuers) in a great battaile, he was ouercome. This misadventure, whether great or small, caused Perseus, after a few dayes, to fall backe into Macedon; as being naturally giuen to feare danger, euen where none was: whereby what losse he felt will appeare hereafter. He left all behinde him, saue only Tempe, weakly guarded: and consequently an easie prey to the Romans.

After the Kings departure, Licinius went straight vnto Comus; hoping to haue taken it, and so to haue gotten entrance into Tempe. But finding the work too hard, he returned backe vpon the Perrhabian and others; from whom hee wanne some townes, and among the rest, Larissa. There were sundrie townes thereabout, bearing the same name of Larissa: so that this which the Consul tooke, may seeme, not to haue belonged vnto the Thessalians; vnlesse, perhaps, after his victorie, Perseus did greater actes than we finde recorded, and got some part of Thessalie.

Of matters happening in Greece at this time, it is hard to giue a precise account, for that the histories of them are greatly defective. One may thinke it strange, that the Boeotians, whom a Roman Embassador could terrifie, and bring altogether to his owne will, should not be afraid of a Roman armie, then on foot in Greece, and a Nauie on their coast. But more strange it is, that the Thebans, from whom their dependants were taken by the art of Martius; were more true to Rome, than other petty townes, which by that same distraction of the Boeotians, became within themselves more absolute, than formerly they had beene. The causes hereof were to haue beene sought among the changes happening in their variable factions: whereof the knowledge is now lost. Some of them rebelled, and were thoroughly punished by Lucretius the Roman Admirall: who got so much by spoiling them, that hee would haue brought others to rebell in like sort, if by extreme oppression hee could haue driuen them so farre. Neither was Licinius the Consul vndiligent in the same kinde. What his doings were, after such time as he was at leisure from Perseus, I finde no where mentioned. Onely this is said in generall; That in the warre which he made, he * cruelly and countously demeaned himselfe.

After the same fashion dealt they, that commanded in the yeare following; Hosilius the Consul, and Hortensius the Admirall, or Pretor of the Fleet. Hosilius shewed more of his industrie, in picking quarrels with the confederats of Rome, than in prosecuting the warre against the Macedonian. For concerning the Roman war vpon his kingdome, after that the Consul had fought passage in vaine ouer certain mountaines, Perseus seemed, in a manner, * free from it. He was troubled indeed on that side which looked towards Illyria, by Ap. Claudius, whom the Consul felt thither with an armie of foure thousand, and who, by leaues made vpon the Confederates, doubled this his armie. But Claudius thinking to haue taken Vesana, a border towne of Illyria, by treason, came thither in such carelesse order, that the inhabitants which had made shew of treason, with purpose onely to traine him into danger; falsed forth vpon him, ouerthrew him, and chased him so farre, that hardly hee escaped with a fourth part of his company. Yet this towne of Vesana shortly after became Roman: which howsoever it happened, Perseus very loone recovered it, and many other places therewithall: Cotys, a Thracian king, securing him on the one side of Macedon; and Cephalus an Epirote, revolted from the Romans, on the other. Perseus likewise made a painfull journey into Ætolia: where hee was promised to be admitted into Stratus, that was the strongest Citie in that Region. Of this hope though hee were disappointed by those of the Roman faction; yet in his returne home, hee tooke in Sperantia; and shortly heard good newes, That Ap. Claudius was againe thoroughly beaten by Cleues, one of his Lieutenants. Such successe had the Macedonian war vnder Hosilius. The same Consul offended much the Greekes, by the strict inquisition which his Embassadors made into mens affection towards Rome. For these Embassadors traueling thorow all the Cities of Peloponnesus, gaue out speeches tending to shew, That they liked no better of those who fought not by might and maine to aduance their busines, than of those which were of the Macedonian faction. Their meaning was, to haue accused by name, in the Parliament of Achaia, Lycortas that worthy Commander, who nobly followed the steps of Philopemen; and together with him, his sonne Polybius, who loone after was Generall of the Achaean horse, but more notable by that excellent historie which he wrote, than by his great employments, which hee well and honorably discharged. The summe of the accusation should haue beene; That these were not heartie friends vnto the Romans, but such as abstaied from raising troubles, more for lacke of opportunitie, than for any loue to the common quiet. But since no colour of truth could bee found, that might giue countenance to such a tale; it was thought better, for the present, to let it alone, and giue gentle words, as if all were well. In like manner dealt they among the Ætolians. They demanded hostages; and found some in the Councill that approved the motion: as also among the Acarnanians, there were that entreated to haue Roman garrisons bestowed in their townes. But neither the one nor the other of these propositions tooke effect. They of the Roman faction, accused not only such as were inclinable to the Macedonian,

domum, but also the good Patriotes; making it no lesse then a matter of treason, to be a Grecian in Greece. On the contrary side, there wanted not some, who soundly to'd these pick thanks of their base flatterie; rating them openly in such sort that one of them hardly escaped being stoned, even in presence of the Embassadors. Thus was all full of accusations and excuses: among which the Embassadors caried themselves, as men that could beleue none ill; though it were well enough knowne what they thought. The best was, that an order from the Senate was brought into Greece, and published, to this effect: That it should be free for all men, to refuse obedience to any Roman Magistrate, imposing any burthen for the present warre, vntlesse it were such, as the Senate had likewise thought meete. Of this decree the whole cuntry was glad: for it was, or seemed, a good remedie of many inconueniences. But they that standing on priuiledge hereof, refused to fulfill euery commandement, were numbered among the Patriotes; which in the end of this warre, proued little better, if not worse, than to haue bene traytours. The Senate was diuinen to set downe this order; by reason of the many and vehemēt complaints brought to Rome, concerning the wrongs done by Roman Magistrates, and especially by the Admiralls, Lucretius and Hortensius. Lucretius was condemned in a great summe of money, for the wrongs by him done: highly to the commendation of the Romans, in that they loued not to haue their subiects oppressed. Hortensius being still in office, had warning to amend.

Among the great number of Embassages that came to Rome about this time, either to seek redress of injuries, or to offer their seruices: it is note-worthy, that from Alabanda, a towne of the lesser Asia, there was presented vnto the Senate, and well accepted, a most base peece of flatterie. These Alabanders brought three hundred horsemens targets; and a crowne of gold, to bestow vpon Iupiter in the Capitol. But hauing a desire to gratifie the Romans with some exquillite token of their dutifull obedience, wherein they would bee singular; and being not able to reach vnto any great performance: they built a Temple, vnto the Towne Rome, and appointed anniuersarie games to bee celebrated among them, in honour of that Goddess. Now who can wonder at the arrogant folly of Alexander, Antigonus, Ptolemie, and the like vaine men, that would bee thought gods; or at the shamelesse flatterie of such as bestowed vpon men, and not the most vertuous of men, diuine honours; when hee sees a Towne of houses, wherein powerfull men dwell, worshipped as a Goddess, and receiuing (without sorne of the grieues, or shame of the present) the title of Deitie, at the gift of such a rascall Citie as Alabanda?

Q. MARTIVS the Roman Consul, with extreame difficultie and danger, enters into Tempe. The cowardize of PERSEVS in abandoning Tempe. The towne of Dium quitted by MARTIVS; repaired and fortified by the King. The Romans attempt many places, with ill success. Their affaires in hard estate. MARTIVS a cunning and a bad man. POLYBIUS sent Embassador to MARTIVS from the Achaens. POLYBIUS his honest wisdome beneficiall to the Achaens. King EVMEDES grieues auers from the Romans. PERSEVS negotiates with ANTIOCHVS and EVMEDES. His false dealing with GENTIVS King of Illyria; whom hee draves into the Roman warre. He sends Embassadors to the Rhodiens; who vainly take vpon them to be arbitrators betwene him and the Romans. PERSEVS leaues a mightie succour of the Bactrians, by his wretched parsimonie.

FTER two yeares of the Macedonian warre, things were further out of tune in Greece, than when the warre began; which had been thought likely to reforme all those Countries, and bring them to what passe the Romans desired; as it did in the end. Perseus had hitherto the better, and was stronger now, than when he liued in peace. He had enlarged his borders on the Illyrian side; his friends, in all parts of Greece, took courage daily: and his reputation grew such, as caused those that were before wholly Roman, to suspect what the issue of the war might proue, and therupon to become wise for themselves. Contrariwise, Licinius and Hosilius the Consuls, had one after the other spent their time in vaine, seeking way into Macedon; and defaced the glorious enterprize of conquest, by many losses received. The Roman Admiralls had so demeaned themselves, that many towns, even of the best affected to Rome, kept them out by force. Generally, the feare was great on the Roman side; and the armie much lessened, not only by casualties of warre, but by the facilitie of the Tribunes or Colonels, or else of the Consul himselfe (for they laid the blame one vpon the other) in licencing the souldiers to depart. Quintus Martius the new Consul, who succeeded vnto Hosilius, was to amend all this: which neuertheless was more than he knew how to doe: though he brought with him a strong supplie of men. He began hotly to set the warre on foot, which a long time had slept. And he began the right way: not seeking to force the streights that were surely guarded, but taking paines to clime the mountaines, which were thought able to forbid all passage ouer them, without helpe or need of any custodie. The King heard of his approach; and being vncertaine what way he meant to take, distributed his owne forces, to the defence of all places which might giue entrance, or permit ascent. But the Consul proceeded in his iourney: with hope, either not to bee discovered by the Enemy, or to breake through all opposition, or at leastwise, to fight on as conuenient ground, as they should haue that lay to stop him, and at length, if all failed, to make a safe retreat. He sent before him foure thousand of his most expedit foot, to discouer the wayes. Two dayes was this company troubled, in overcoming the difficultie of no more than fifteene miles: after which they had fight of the Enemy, that lay to deny their passage. They occupied therefore a safe peece of ground; and sent backe word to the Consul, where they were; intreating him to hasten vnto them: which he did. The Macedonians were not a whit dismayed at his arriuall, but met him, and fought with him, two or three dayes together; each returning to their owne Campe at night, with little losse on either side. This bickering was on the narrow ridge of a mountaine, which gaue scarcely roome vnto three to march in front. So that very few hands came to be employed: all therett were beholders. In this case it was impossible to get forwards: yet a shame to returne. Wherefore Perseus tooke the only course remaining; and indeed the best. Part of his men he left with Pepilius, to attend vpon the Macedonians: whilst hee, with with the rest, fetcht a compasse about, and sought out wayes that neuer had bene troden. Herein he found extreame difficultie: which notwithstanding he overcame. Besides the troubles commonly incident to such journeyes, through places vnfit for habitation: he was compelled, by labour of hand, to make pathes where none were, yea where Nature might seeme to haue intended, that none should be. So sleepe he found the descent of the mountaines, in this way which he took: that of seuen miles, which they traueled the first day, his men were compelled, for the more part, to rowle themselves downe, as not daring to trust their feet. Neither was this the worst. For they met with rockes, that stood one ouer another, so vp-right, and cumbersome to get downe; that their Elephants were afraid of the goodie prospect, and casting their gouernours, made a terrible noise, which affrighted the horses, and bred great confusion. Having therefore gone, or wallowed, foure miles of this grieuous journey, there was nothing more desired by the fouldiours, than that they might be suffered to creepe backe againe, the same way which they had come. But shift was made to let downe the Elephants, by a kinde of bridges, like vnto falling draw-bridges: whereof the one end was ioyned to the edge of the cliffe; the other sustained by two long postes, fastened in the ground below. Vpon these two postes, or poles, which indeed (not being very strong, since it was intended that they should be either cut or broken) were fastened two rafters, answerable in length to the distance, between the higher and the lower fall, so as the end of one bridge might reach to the beginning of another. These were covered with planks and turfe; that they might seeme continuent with the ground, so to make the beasts aduenturous, to goe vpon them. If there were a Plaine of any good extent from the foot of a rocke, to the next downhill; then might the bridge be shorter. When an Elephant was gone a pretie way, vpon one of these; the postes vpholding the frame were cut asunder; thereby causing him to sincke downe vnto the next bridge; whence he was conueyed, in like manner, to the third, and onward still, to the very bottome. Thus went they downe sliding, some on their feet, others on their buttocks, till they came to an euery valley. By this it appeares, how thoroughly provided the Romans vsed to be in their journeyes, of things needfull in all occasions: as also what insupportable paines they tooke in this descent, about the conueyance of themselves and all their carriages downe the mountaines. The next day they rested; staying for Popilius and his company, who hardly, or perhaps neuer, should haue overtaken them, if the Enemie had followed, and set vpon him from aloft. The third and fourth daies journeyes were like vnto the first: save that custom, and the nearnesse to their wayes end without meeting enemies, caused them the better to endure the labour.

Perseus could not be ignorant of the Romans comming towards him: since they fought with his men vpon the passage, three dayes together; he lying so night, that he might well neare haue heard the noise. Yet was he so possessed with feare; that he neither stirred to helpe his owne men, or to hinder the Consul, nor made any provision for that which might fall out; but as one void of counsaile, late hearkning after the euent. Foure only passages there were, leading into Tempe: the first by Connus; which the Romans were vnable to force; the second and third were the same which Martius had attempted in vaine, and another like vnto it: the last, by the Citie of Dium out of Macedon. All these were sufficiently guarded; and who-soeuer would seek any other way, must be faine to take such paines as Martius had vndergone. The entrance by Dium was fairer than any of the rest: whereof only the King had benefit; for that his enemies could not get thither, save through the valley it selfe; into which they must first pierce another way. Dium stood vpon the foot of the huge mountaine Olympus, about a mile from the sea: of which mile, the river Hylcon becoming there a lake, and called Baphyras, tooke vp the one halfe; the rest being such as might easily haue bene fortified. Besides all these, there was in the middle of Tempe, a passage which ten men might easily keepe; where the spurs of the mountaines, reaching farre into the valley, drew neare to the verie banks of Peneus, a goodly and deepe riuer which ran thorow it. Wherefore nothing had bene: more easie, than to make the Consul repent him of his troublesome journey: if Perseus could haue seene his owne aduantages. For the Roman armie was not only in ill case to fight, after the vexation of that miserable trauell: but must needs haue either perished for want of victuals, or bin enforced to returne the same way that it came, if the King had made good the freight of Dium. To haue returned, and climbed vp with their Elephants and carriages, against those rockes, from which, with extreame labour, they could hardly get downe, it seemed a matter of impossibilitie: especially considering, how the enemies, from above their heads, would haue beaten vpon them; being now aware of the path which they had taken, though he knew it not when they stole away from him. It may therefore bee thought strange, that the Romans did not rather take their journey into Macedon, from the side of Illyria, whence that kingdome had often bin invaded, as lying open on that part: than put themselves to the trouble of breaking into Tempe; whence, after that they were there arrived, there was no means to escape, without forcing one of those passages, which they despaired to winne. But the cowardize of Perseus, did commend the counsaile by them followed, as wise. For he no sooner heard that the Enemie was come ouer the mountaines into Tempe; than he fired like one out of his wits; saying, That he was vanquished, & had lost all without battaile. Herewithall he began to take out of Dium, what he could carry away in haile; and straight wayes abandoned the Towne. In the same vehemencie of amazement, he sent a strait commandement to Thessalonica, that the Arsenall there should be set on fire; and to Pella, that his treasures there should be cast into the sea: as if the Romans were like presently to be masters of these two Cities. Nicias, who was appointed to drowne the treasure, performed it hastily as wel as he could: though soone after, his matter grew sorie for the losse; and it was all, in a manner, recovered by Diuers from vnder the water. But Andronicus, who had charge to set fire on the Kings Arsenall, deferred the execution; foreseeing that repentance might follow: and so he prevented the damage. Whether Nicias, for his absolute and blinde obedience, or Andronicus, for his carefull prouidence, merited the greater commendation, or more easie pardon; it rested in the King to interpret. The reward of their seruice was this. Perseus growing ashamed of his mad cowardize, that appeared in this battie direction; caused them both to be blaine. Also those poore men, which had fetcht his treasure out of the sea by their diuing, were payd their wages after the same sort: that so there might be no witnesses of the Kings base folly. Such end must they feare, who are priuie to dishonourable actions of great Princes. If Perseus would haue gone surely to worke, for the hiding of his fault; then must he so royally haue behaued himselfe, that no man might beleue him capable to be the author of any vnworthy act or counsaile. But his vertue was of no such capacite. He thought it enough to lay the blame vpon others. And therefore, hauing called Hippias away (the Captaine which had topped the Consul on the top of the mountaine) and Arsilepiodatus, from defence of the passages, whereto they were by him appointed he rated them openly saying, that they had betrayed vnto the Enemie the gates and barres of Macedon. Of this reproch if they would discharge themselves, by laying it vpon him, to whom of right it belonged: then might they haue sped as did Nicias and Andronicus.

The Consul Martius had great cause to reioyce, for that the King so hastily relinquished his possession of Tempe, and all the passages leading thereinto: since the Roman armie, this notwithstanding, was hardly able to subsist, for want of victuals. He tooke Dium without resistance, & thence went forward into Macedon: wherein hauing traueled about a dayes journey, and gotten one towne that yeelded, he was compelled, by meere lacke of food for his men, to returne backe towards Thessalie. His fleet came to him, in this time of necessitie, well appointed to haue holpen him in the war: but having left behinde, at Magnesia, the ships of burthen, which carried the provisions. Wherefore it fell out happily, that one of his Lieutenants had been carefull to occupy the Castles about Tempe, which were forsaken by the Macedonians: for by those waies, only might come be brought into the army. To meet the sooner with this corne, which was desirously expected, he forooke Dium, and went to Phila; by which foolish journey (if not worse than foolish) he lost more, than a little the longer fasting had bin worth. It is probable, that his carts, with all or the most of his store, were lost among the mountains: for otherwise it had bin madnes to put himself on such an enterprise, so slenderly provided, as that without enforcement, or fight of the Enemy, he should be faine to quit it. Howsoever it was: men thought him a coward, or at least a bad man of warre; since he thus recoyled and gaue off, when it most behoued him to haue prosecuted the action.

By vnderstanding the folly, or cowardize of Martius; the King recollecte himself; vnderstood his owne error; sought to hide it by such poore means as haue bin shewed; and laboured to make what amends he could. He quickly repossessed the town of Dium, which he hastily repaired, finding it dismantled by the Romans. This done, he encamped strongly by the riuer Enipeus: meaning thereby to stop the Enemies proceeding all that Summer. Lesse diligence, more timely vsed, would haue bin enough, not only to haue deliuered Martius into his hand, who had beguiled him with an idle hope of peace: but to haue giuen him such a noble victory, as might cause the Romans to seek a good end of the war vpon faire conditions, and not to begin againe in halte. Yet this recovery and fortification of Dium, was to the Consul an exceeding hindrance. For little or nothing could afterward be done toward the conquest in hand, in all the continuance of his office. Only the towne of Heraclea, standing on the riuer of Peneus, five miles from Dium, was taken by force; or rather by a trick of climbing vpon mens heads, somewhat after the manner of our tumblers. But it made such defence as it could; and was not giuen vp for feare. After this Martius did set a bold face towards Dium; as if he would haue taken it againe, and haue driuen the King further off: though his intent or hope was nothing like so great: his chiefe care, being to provide for his wintering. He sent the Admirall to make attempt vpon the sea-townes, Thessalonica, Cassandrea, Demetrias and others. All these were assayed: but in vaine. The fields about Thessalonica were wasted; and some companies, that sundrie times aduenced forth of the towne, were still put to the worse. As for the towne it selfe; there was danger in comming neere it, either by land or sea; by reason of the engines, which shot from the wals, and reached vnto the fleet. Wherefore the Admirall letting faile from thence, ranne along by Aonia, and Antigonea (landing neare to each of them, and both doing and receiving hurt) vntill he came to Palene, in the territory of Cassandrea. There King Eumenes ioyned with him, bringing twentie ships of warre: and five other were sent thither from King Prusias. With this assistance of strength, the Admirall was bold to trie his fortune at Cassandrea: which was bad. There was a new ditch lately cast by Perseus, before the towne: which while the Romans were filling vp, question was made, what became of the earth taken thence, for that it lay not vpon the bank. By this occasion, it was learned, that there were arches in the town wal filled vp with that earth, and couered with one single row of brick. Hence the Admirall gathered hope of making way into the towne, by sapping the wals. To this worke he appointed such as he thought meetest: giuing an alarme to the other side of the towne, thereby to shadow his attempt. The breach was soon made. But while the Romans were shouting for ioy, & ordering themselves for the assault: the Captaines within the towne perceived what was done; & salying forth vnexpected, gaue a fierce charge on the companies that were between the ditch & the wall; of whom they slew about six hundred & suffered few to escape vnwounded. This disaster, & the want of good successe on that part of the towne which king Eumenes assailed (a supply in the meane while entering the towne by sea) caused the siege to beake vp. Torone was the next place which

which the Admirall thought meet to attempt: and thence likewise he was repelled. Finding this too well manned; he made way towards Demetrias: wherunto Euphranor, a Macedonian Captaine, was gotten before his comming, with such forces, as were not only sufficient to haue defended the Towne, if the Admirall had layed siege to it, but to keepe the land about it from spoyle; or at least (as they did) to make the enemy pay deare for all that he there got. This Euphranor had taken his journey to Demetrias, by Melthra; whither the Consul (that he might not be quite without worke) had sent his Lieutenant to besiege it: and by the terror of his appearing suddainly ouer their heads, caused the besiegers to dilodge in all 10 halt, setting their Campe on fire.

Such fortune attended on the Romans; or rather, so farre was their abilitie short of their Enterprises, euer since their Consul (whether dauidly, or carelessly) most vnlike a good Commander, had let goe his hold of Macedon, by forsaking Dium: Yea, it is to be suspected, that some greater harme befell them, or at least, that they were in some greater danger, than is expressed in the broken remaining Historie of this Warre. For Martius perswaded the Rhodians, by Agessipolis their Embassadour, who came to him at Heraclea about other business of lesse importance, That they should doe well to interpose themselves as mediators, and seeke to finish the Warre. Now, although Polybius doe most probably coniecture, that 20 this was rather a malicious deuce of Martius, craftily seeking to bring the Rhodians in danger (as anon it fell out) by their oppoling the resolution of the Senate; than that it proceeded from any true feare in him, either of Perseus, or of Antiochus, who had then an armie on foot: yet since he made shew of feare, it is like withall, that somewhat had happened, which might make his feare seeme not counterfeit. And so were the Rhodians moued to thinke of him; not only for that the extraordinary courtesie, both of him and of the Admirall, towards their Embassadour, comming from proud natures, did argue diffidence, where there was no ambition to cause it; but much more, for that (shortly after the Embassadours of Perseus, & of Gentius the Illyrian, did set out their business at Rhodes, not more with the strength of a good 30 fleet, which the Macedonian had gotten, than with the honor of some victory, wherein he had lately slaine great numbers of the Roman horse. Thus much we finde intimated: though the time, place, or other circumstances of the fight, be not specified. And hereto may be referred, the report of those that were sent from Rome, to view the estate of Martius his army. For they found the Consul wanting meat; the Admirall, wanting men; and for those few that he had, wanting both money and clothes: and Ap. Claudius the Pretor, who lay on the frontiers of Illyria, so vnable to invade Macedon, that contrariwise, he was in extreme danger, so as either he must quickly be sent for thence, or a new army be sent thither to him. Wherefore it may seeme, that some blow had bin taken on the Illyrian side, which made al to halt; or at least, 40 that the Romans with greater losse, than is before spoken of, had been driuen from some of the Townes which they besieged.

Now although it were so, that Martius in very few of his actions, behaued himselfe like a man of war: yet in exercise of Cunning, which one hath most aptly termed, a crooked or sinister kinde of wisdom, he dealt as a craftie matter, with a relesse working diligence. This indeed neither proued his sufficiency, nor commended his honestie: since thereby he effected nothing to his owne benefit, and neuertheless, out of enuie, vaine-glory, or such delight as weake and busie headed men take, in creating inexplicable troubles, he directly made opposition to the good of his country. At such time as Perseus, by the successe of his doings against Hellinus, had gotten much reputation, and was thought likely to invade Thessalie, Archo, Lycois, and other good Patriotes among the Acheans, iudged it expedient for their Nation to helpe the Romans, as in a time of aduersitie, whom in prosperitie they loued not to flatter. Wherefore Archo proposed a decree which passed: That the Acheans should send their whole power into Thessalie, and participate with the Romans in all danger. So the armie was leuied; and Polybius, with others, sent Embassadors vnto Martius, to certifie him thereof, and know his pleasure. Polybius found the Consul busied in seeking passage through Tempe into Macedon. He went along with the armie; and awaited the Consuls leisure, till they came to Hieraclea; where finding the time convenient, hee presented the Decece, and offered the seruice of his Nation, wherein sooner it should be commanded. Martius tooke this very kindly; but said, that he needed now no manner of helpe. Forthwith Polybius dispatched home his companions, to signifie thus much: tarrying himselfe behind in the Campe. After a while, word was brought to Martius, that App. Claudius desired, or rather imperiously required, of the Acheans, five thousand men, to be sent him into Epirus. It was manifest, that Appius had need of these men; and that if he were strong in field, he might doe notable seruice, by distracting the forces of Perseus. But the Labyrinthian head of Martius could not allow of such plaine reason. He called vnto him Polybius, to whom he declared, that Appius had no need of such aide: and therefore willed him to returne home, and in any wife take order that the men might not bee sent, nor the Acheans be put to such needlesse charges. Away went Polybius; mulling, and vnable to resolue, whether it were for loue to the Acheans, that the Consul was so earnest in this busines; or rather for enuie, and to hinder App. Claudius from doing any thing, since himselfe could doe nothing. But when Polybius was to deliuer his opinion in the Councell, touching this matter: then found hee a new doubt, that more neerely concerned his owne selfe, and those of his partie. For as he was sure to incurre the great indignation of the Consul, if he should neglect what was given him in charge; so was it manifest on the other side, that the words by Martius vnto him in priuat, would proue no good warrant for him and his friends, if openly they should refuse to helpe Claudius, alleging that he had no need. In this case therefore, he had recourse vnto the decree of the Senate: which exempted men from necessitie of doing what the Roman Commanders should require, vnlesse by special order from the Senate, the same were likewise appointed. So for lacke of warrant from the Senate, this demand of Appius was referred vnto the aduice of the Consul: by whom it was sure to be made frustrate. Hereby the Acheans were sauer, of more than an hundred and twentie talents: though Polybius himselfe ranne into danger of Appius his displeasure; and for such honest dealing in his Countries behalfe, was afterwards rewarded by the Romans with many a long yeares imprisonment.

Whether it were by the like policie of Martius, that King Eumenes grew cold in his affection to the Romans; or whether this King began when it was too late, to stand in feare, lest the fire, which hee himselfe had helped to kindle, would shortly take hold on his owne lodging; or whether the regard of money were able to ouerwey all other passions; it is hard to determine: since they that had better means to know the truth, haue not precisely affirmed any certaintie. One report is, that Eumenes did not so much as giue any helpe to Martius: but comming to haue ioyned with him, in such friendly manner as he did with the former Consuls, was not entertained according to his liking; and thereupon returned home in such anger, that he refused to leaue behind him certaine horse of the Gallogrecques, being requested to haue doncit. If this were true; and that his brother Attalus tarrying behinde with the Consul, did the Romans good seruice: then is the reason apparent, of the hatred, borne afterwards by the Senate to Eumenes, and the loue to Attalus. But it is more generally relieued; that Eumenes gaue a willing care to Perseus his desire of accord, for mere desire of gaine. And it might well bee, that courtousnesse drew him on, in the course, whereinto indignation first led him. Howsoeuer it befall; Perseus caused Eumenes to be founded, and found him so tractable, that he was hold to sollicite him by an Embassage. The tenour of his aduertisements, both to Eumenes, and to Antiochus, was: That there could be no perfect loue, betwene a King and a free Citie: That the Romans had quarrell alike to all Kings, though though they dealt with no more than one at a time, and vsed the helpe of one against another; That Philip was oppressed by them, with the helpe of Attalus; Antiochus, with the helpe of Philip and Eumenes; and now Perseus assailed, with helpe of Eumenes and Prusias. Herewith he willed Eumenes to consider, that when Macedon was taken out of their way, they would be doing with him in Asia, which lay next at hand; yea, that alreadie they began to thinke better of Prusias, than of him. In like sort he admonished Antiochus, not to looke for any good conclusion of his warre with the Egyptian, so long as the Romans could make him giue ouer, by denouncing their will and pleasure. Finally, he requested both of them, either to compell the Romans, to surcease from their war vpon Macedon; or else to hold them as common enemies vnto all Kings: Antiochus lay farre out of the Romans way: and therefore was little troubled with such remonstrances. Eumenes was more nearely toucht; and as hee felt part of this to bee true, so had he reason to stand in doubt of the rest. Yet when he should giue answer; hee began to offer a bargain of peace for money. He thought the Romans to be no lesse weary, than Perseus was afraid. Wherefore he promised, for his owne part, That if he might haue fifteene hundred Talents for withdrawing his hand from this Warre, then would he remaine a Neuter therein: and that for some greater quantitie of money (how much I finde not) he would also bring the Romans to consend vnto peace: and for assurance of his true meaning herein, he offered to giue hostages. Perseus liked well to receiue the hostages: but not to lay out the money; especially before hand, as was required. He would faine haue peace with Rome, and not with Eumenes only. For procuring of this, he promised to be at any reasonable cost: but hee would lay downe the money in the Temple at Samothrace: whence it should be deliuered vnto Eumenes, after that the peace was fully concluded and ratified. The Isle of Samothrace was Perseus his owne: and therefore Eumenes thought the money no nearer to him, being there, than if it remained in Pella. Besides, his labour deserued somewhat, howsoeuer the busines might happen to succeed: so that needs he would haue part of his wages in prest. Thus the two Kings did no more, than loose time; and Eumenes grew suspected of the Romans, as a Traitor.

After the same manner dealt Perseus with King Gentius the Illyrian. He had attempted this Illyrian before; who dealt plainly, and said, That without money he could not surre. Hereunto Perseus loued not to hearken; thinking, that his Treasures would serue at the last cast, to deliuer him from all his feares. But when the Romans had gotten within Tempe, then did his feare vrge him to prodigalitie; so as he agreed to pay three hundred Talents, which Gentius demanded for a recompence. So the bargain was soone made, and pledges on both sides deliuered for performance. This was openly done by Perseus; to the end that all his armie might haue comfort, by such access of strength to their partie. Presently vpon the bargain made, Embassadors were sent to Rhodes, from both Perseus and Gentius: who desired the Rhodians, to take vpon them, as arbitrators, betwene Perseus and the Romans, and to bring the Warre to an end. The Rhodians thinking that Martius the Consul was no lesse desirous of peace than the Macedonian, arrogantly promised, That they, by their authoritie, would make peace; wishing the Kings to shew themselves conformable. But the Roman Senate, hearing proud words, to the same effect, from the Rhodiack Embassadors; gaue an answer, as disdainefull, angrie, and menacing, as they could deuise: so as this vaine glorie of the Rhodians was thoroughly chafed; and more thoroughly should haue beene, if their submission had not beene as humble, as their tollie was proud. Such vse of Gentius his friendship, made Perseus; without laying out one ounce of Silver. Now faine he would haue hastened this young and rash Illyrian to enter with all speed into the Warre: but then must the money be hastened away. Pantaclus, the Macedonian Embassadour, who remained with Gentius, exhorted him him daily to begin the Warre by land and sea, whilest the Romans were vnprouided. But finding what it was that made call to fight, he sent word to Perseus. Hereupon tenne Talents were sent to Pantauchus: who deliuered it to the young King, as earnest of that which followed. More followed indeed; and sealed vp with the seale of the Illyrians; but carried by Maedonians, and not too fast. Before this money came into Illyria, Genius had layed hands vpon two Roman Embassadors, and caft them into prison. Which Perseus no sooner heard, than he recalled his Treasure-bearers, and sent them with their load to Pella; for that now the Illyrian was of necessitie to make warre with the Romans, whether hee were hyed thereto, or not.

Lin. lib. 19.
vit. Amyl.

There came about the same time, through Illyria, to the aide of Perseus, vnder one Clondicus a pettie King, tenne thousand horie and renne thousand foot, of the Gauls, which were (as Plutarch hath it) the Bastarna. These had before hand made their bargaine; and were to receiue present pay at the first. At their entrie into the Kingdome, Perseus sent one to them; desiring their Captaine to come visit him, whome he promised to gratifie with goodly rewards; hoping that the multitude would take good words for payment. But the first question that their Generall asked, was, Whether the King had sent money to give the souldiors their pay in hand, according to his bargaine? Hereto the messenger had not what to answer. Why then (said Clondicus) tell thy mailer, That the Gauls will not stirre one foot vntill they haue gold, was agreed, and hostages. Perseus hercupon tooke counsaile: if to vtter his owne opinion, before men to wile that they would not contradict him, were to take counsaile. He made an inuectiue against the inciuillie and auarice of the Bastarna: who came with such numbers, as could not but be dangerous to him and to his Kingdome. Five thousand horse of them hee said would be as manie as he should need to vse; and not so manie, that he should need to feare them. It had bene well done, if anie of his counsaillers would haue told him, That there wanted not employment for the whole armie of them, since without anie danger to the Kingdome, they might be let cut by the way of Panabes into Theffalie: where wasting the Country, and filling themselves with spoile, they should make the Romans glad to forsake Tempe, euen for hunger and all manner of want; therein doing the King notable seruice, whether they were anie victors, or not. This, and a great deale more, might haue bene alledged; if anie man had dared to give aduice freely. In conclusion, Antigonus, the same messenger that had bene with them before, was sent againe, to let them know the Kings minde. He did his errand: vpon which followed a great murmur of those manie thousands that had bene drawne so farre to no purpose. But Clondicus asked him now againe, Whether hee had brought the money along with him, to pay those five thousand, whome the King would entertaine. Hereto, when it was perceiued, that Antigonus could make no better answer, than shifing excuses; the Bastarna returned presently towards Danubius, wasting the neighbour parts of Thrace; yet suffering this craftie messenger to escape vnhurt: which was more than he could haue well expected.

Thus dealt Perseus, like a carefull Treasurer, and one that would preserve his money for the Romans, without diminishing the summe. Out of this painefull Office he was vrie soone discharged by L. Amylius Paulus the new Consul: who in fiftene dayes after his setting forth from Italie, brought the Kingdome of Macedon to that end, for which God had appointed ouer it a King so foolish and so cowardly.

VIII.

Of L. Amylius Paulus the Consul: his journey. He forceth Perseus to discompe: He will not hazard a battaile with anie disadvantage. Of an Escoppe of the Atome. Perseus vs his superstition. The Battaille of Pydna. Perseus his flight. He forsakes his Kingdome: which hastily yields to Amylius Paulus at Samothrace. He yeelds himselfe to the Roman Admirall, and is sent prisoner to Rome.

By the Warre of Macedon, the Romans hitherto had gotten much dishonour. Which, though it were not accompanied with anie danger, yet the indignitie so moued them; that either they decreed that Province to L. Amylius Paulus, without putting it, as was otherwise their manner, to the chance of lot; betwene him and this fellow Consul; or at least were gladder that the lot had cast it vpon him; than that so worthie a man was aduanced to the dignitie of a second Consulship. They refused to propound vnto the Senate anie thing that concerned his Province; vntill by Embassadors, thither sent to view the Estate of the Warre, it was perfectly vnderstood, in what condition both the Roman forces, and the Macedonian, at the present remained. This being thoroughly knowne to the Consul, hee altered the vote; the Senate appointed a strong supply, not onely to the Consul, but vnto the Naue, and likewise to the Armie that lay betwene Illyria and Epirus; from which App. Claudius was remooued, and L. Antius knit thither in his place. Amylius, before his departure from Rome, making an Oration to the People, as was the custome, spake with much grauitie and authoritie. Hee requested those that thought themselves wile enough to manage this Warre, either to accompanie him into Macedon, and there assist him with their aduice; or else to gouerne their tongues at home, and not take vpon them to give directions by hearesay, and censure by idle reports: for he told them plainly, That he would blame his doings to occasions; not to the expectation of the multitude. The like speech of his father L. Amylius, who died valiantly in the Battaille of Carus, might well be liuing in some of their memories: which was thought to make them conforme themselves the more gladly vnto the instructions giuen by a wise and resolute Consul.

All his businesse within the Citie being dispatched, Amylius was honourably attended, at his setting forth on his journey; with an especiall hope of men, that he should finish the Warre: though that he should finish it so soone and happily, was more than could haue bene hoped of in a misfard. He came to Brundisium: whence, when the winde came fauie, he set his seaie bracke of day; and arrived safely at the Isle of Corcyra before night. Thence passed he to Delphos, where, hauing done sacrifice to Apollo, after the fift day he set forwards to the Campe; and was there in five dayes more. So are there but five of the fiftene dayes remaining; in which he finished the Warre.

Perseus lay strongly encamped at Dium; hauing fortified the labour of men and of women to fortifie the banks of Enipeus, where it was reported to be the weather. So as there was little hope, or none to give him; and consequently as little possibility to enter that way into Macedon. One great inconvenience troubling the Romans, and much disabling them to make attempt vpon Dium, was lacke of fresh water. For there were no moles betwene Dium and Tempe; at the way lying betwene the Sea shoote and the foot of Olympus, without anie Brooke or Spring breaking forth on that side. But Amylius found present remedie for this, by digging Wells on the shoare; where hee found sweet Springs; as commonly there is no thoure that wants them, though they rise not above the ground. Want of this knowledge was enough to hinder Martius from taking vp his lodging anie neare to the enemy, than the Towne of Heraclea, on the Riuer of Teneus, where he had watered at pleasure, but could performe no seruice of anie worth. Yet when the Roman Campe had such means to lye close to the Macedonian, as it presently did; the passage onward, being defended as hath bene shewed, seemed no lesse difficult than before. Wherefore it was necessarie to search another way: which by enquire was soone found out. There was a narrow passage ouer Olympus, leading into Perrabia; hard of ascent, but slenderly guarded, and therefore promising a faire journey. Martius either had not been informed hereof; or durst not attempt it; or perhaps could not get his souldiers to make the adventure; they fearing least it would proue such a piece of worke, as had bene their march ouer Ossa into Tempe. But Paulus was a man of greater indurtrie, courage, and abilitie, to command. He had reformed, even at his first coming, manie disorders in the Roman Campe: teaching the souldiers, among other good lessons, to be obedient and ready in execution; without troubling themselves, as had bene their manner, to examine the doings and purposes of their Generall. And now he appointed about five thousand men to this Enterprise: whereof he committed the charge vnto Scipio, Amphilus, and Q. Fabius Maximus, his owne sonnes by nature, but adopted; the one of them, by a sonne of Scipio the African; the other, by one of the Edy. Scipio tooke with him some light-armed Thracians and Cretans; but his maine strength was of Legionaries. For the Kings guard, vpon the mountaine, consisted in a manner wholly of Archers and Slingers: who, though, at some distance, they might doe notable seruice against those that should climbe vp vnto them; yet when the darknesse tooke away their ayme, they were like to make a bad nights worke, being to deale with those that were armed to fight at hand. To conceale the buisinesse about which they went, Scipio and Fabius tooke a wrong way, towards the fleet, where victuals were provided for their journey: it being noised, that they were to runne along the coast of Macedon by sea, and wast the Countrey. All the while that they were passing the Mountaines (which was about three dayes,) the Consul made shew of a meaning to set vpon Perseus where he lay; rather to diuert the Kings atention from that which was his maine Enterprise, than vpon anie hope to doe good, in seeking to get ouer Empeus. The Channell of Empeus, which receiued in Winter time a great fall of waters from the Mountaines, was exceeding deepe and broad; and the ground of it was such, as though at the present it lay welcare all drie, yet it serued not for those that were weightily armed to fight vpon. Wherefore Amphilus employed none save his Velites; of whom the Kings light armature had advantage at farre distance, though the Romans were better appointed for the close. The Engines from off the Towers which Perseus had rayled on his owne banke, did also beat vpon the Romans, and gaue them to vnderstand, that their labour was in vaine. Yet Amphilus persisted as he had begun; and recontinued his assault, such as it could be, the second day. This might haue serued to teach the Macedonian, that some greater worke was in hand: since otherwise a good Captaine, as Amphilus was knowne to be, would not haue troubled himselfe with making such brauadoes, that were somewhat costly. But Perseus looked onely vnto that which was before his eyes: vntill his men, that came running fearfully downe the Mountaine brought word into the Campe, that the Romans were following at their backes. Then was all full of tumult; and the King himselfe no lesse (if not more) amazed than anie of the rest. Order was forthwith giuen to dislodge; pr. rather, without order, in all tumultuous haste, the Campe was broken vp, and a speedie retreat made to Pydna. Whether it were so, that they which had custodie of the passage were taken sleeping, or whether they were beaten by plaine force; Scipio and Fabius had verie good successe in their journey. It may well be, that they slept vntill the Romans came came somewhat neare to them; and then taking alarme, when their arrowes and slings could doe little seruice, were beaten at hande strokes: so as the different relations that are cited by Plutarch out of Polybius, and an Epistle of Scipio, may each of them haue bene true. Thus was an open way cleared into Macedon: which had bene effected by Martius in the yeare fore going; but was closed vp againe, through his not prosecuting so rich an opportunity.

Perseus was in extreame doubt what course to take, after this vnhappie beginning. Some gaue aduice, to manne his Townes, and so to linger out the Warre: hauing bene taught by the last yeares example, how resolute the people were in making defence. But farre worse counsaile prevailed: as generally it doth in turbulent and fearefull deliberations. The King resolved to put all at once to hazard of battaile: fearing belike to put himselfe into anie one Towne, least that should be first of all besieged; and he therein (as cowardly natures alwayes are jealous) not ouer-carefully reliued. This was euen the same that Amphilus, or anie inuador, should haue desired. So a place was chosen neare vnto Pydna, that serued well for the Phalanx, and had likewise on the sides of it some peeces of higher ground, fit for the archers and light armature. There beabode the coming of the enemy; who layed not long behind him. As soone as the Romans had sight of the Kings Armie; which, with greater feare than discretion, had halted away from them, forsaking the Campe that was so notably well fortified: they desired nothing more, than to giue battaile immediately; doubting least otherwise the King should change his minde, and get further off. And to this effect Scipio brake with the Consul; praying him not to loose occasion by delay. But Amphilus told him, That hee spake like a young man; and therefore willed him to haue patience. The Romans were tyred with their journey; had no Campe wherein to rest themselves; nor anie thing there, save onely the bare ground whereon they trode. For these and the like respects, the Consul made a stand; and shewing himselfe vnto the Macedonian, who did the like, in order of battaile; gaue charge to haue the Campe measured out and entrenched behinde the Armie; wherinto, at good leysure, hee fell backe, without anie manner of trouble. After a nights rest, it was hoped, both by the Romans, and by the Macedonians, that the matter should be determined; each part thinking their owne Generall too blame, for that they had not fought the same day. As for the King, he excused himselfe by the backwardnesse of the enemy; who advanced no further, but kept vpon ground seruing ill for the Phalanx: as on the other side, the Consul had the reasons before shewed, which he communicated to those about him the next day.

That euening (which followed the third of September, by the Roman account) C. Sulpicius Gallus, a Colonel, or Tribune of a Legion, who had the former yeare bene Prætor, foretold vnto the Consul, and (with his good liking) vnto the armie, an Eclipse of the Moone, which was to be the same night: willing the souldiers not to be troubled therewith, for that it was naturall, and might be knowne long before it was seene. It was the manner of the Romans, in such Eclipses, to beat Pannes of Brasse and Balons, as wee doe in following a swarme of Bees; thinking, that thereby they did the Moone great ease, and helped her in her labour. But this prognostication of Sulpicius converted their superstition into admiration of his deepe skill, when they saw it verified. Contrariwise, the Macedonians howled and made a great noyse as long as the Eclipse lasted: rather perhaps because it was their fætion, than for that they were terrified therewith as with a prodigie betokening their losse; since their desire to fight was no whit lessened by it. I will not here stand to dispute, Whether such Eclipses doe signifie, or cause, anie alteration in ciuile affaires; and matters that haue small dependance on naturall complexion: for the argument is too large. More worthe of obseruation it is, how superstition captiuates the wisdom of the wisest, where the helpe of true Religion is wanting. Amphilus, though hee were sufficiently instructed concerning this defect of the Moone, Moone, that it was no supernaturall thing, nor about the reach of humane understanding, so as he should need to trouble himselfe with anie devout regard thereof: yet could he not refrain from doing his dutie to this Moone, and congratulating with sacrifice her deliuerie, as soone as she shone out bright againe: for which, hee is commended euen by Plutarch, a sage Philosopher, as a godly and religious man. If Sulpicius perhaps did not assist him in this foolish deuotion; yet is it like, that he, being a Senatour, and one of the Councell for Warre, was partaker the next morning in a Sacrifice done to Hercules; which was no lesse foolish. For a great part of the day was vainely consumed, ere Hercules could be pleased with anie Sacrifice, and vouchsafe to shew tokens of good lucke in the entrailes of the beals. At length, in the bellie of the one and twentieth Sacrifice, was found a promise of victorie to Emilius; but with condition, That hee should not giue the onser. Hercules was a Grecke, and partiall, as nearer in alliance to the Macedonian than to the Roman. Wherefore it had bene better to call vpon the new Goddesse, lately canonized at Alabanda; or vpon Romulus, founder of their Citie, on whom the Romans had betowed his Deitie; or (if a God of elder date were more authentically vpon Mars the father of Romulus, to whom belonged the guidance of militarie affaires; and who therefore would haue limited his fauour, with no iniunctions contrarie to the rules of Warre.

Now concerning the Battaille; Emilius was throughly persuaded, that the King meant to abide it; for that otherwise hee would not haue stayed at Pydna, when, as a little before, his leysure serued to retire whither hee list, the Romans being further off. In regard of this, and perhaps of the tokens appearing in the Sacrifices, the Consul thought that hee might wait vpon aduantage, without making anie great haste. Neyther was it to bee neglected, that the morning Sunne was full in the Romans faces: which would be much to their hinderance all the forenoone. Since therefore Perseus kept his ground, that was commodious for the Phalanx, and Emilius sent forth part of his men to bring in Wood and Fodder; there was no likelyhood of fighting that day. But about tenne of the clocke in the morning, a small occasion brought to passe that, which whereto neither of the Generalls had ouer earnest desire. A horse brake loose at watering; which two or three of the Roman souldiers followed into the riuer, wading after him vp to the knees. The Kings men lay on the further banke; whence a couple of Thracians ranne into the water, to draw this horse ouer to their owne side. These fell to blowes, as in a priuate quarrell; and one of the Thracians was slaine. His countreimen seeing this, hastened to reuenge their fellows death, and followed those that had slaine him ouer the riuer. Hercupon company came in, to helpe on each part, vntill the number grew such, as made it past a fray, and caused both the armies to be carefull of the euent. In fine, each of the Generalls placed his men in order of battaille, accordly as the manner of his Countrie, and the armes, wherewith they serued, did require. The ground was a flat leuell, save that on the sides a few hillocks were raised here and there; whereof each part might take what aduantage it could. The Macedonians were the greater number, the Romans the better souldiers, and better appointed. Both the King and the Consul encouraged their men with liuely words: which the present condition could bountifully afford. But the King hauing finished his Oration, and sent on his men, withdrew himselfe into Pydna: there to doe sacrifice, as hee pretended, vnto Hercules. It is the lesse maruaile, that hee durst adventure battaille, since hee had bethought himselfe of such a stratageme: whereby to saue his owne person. As for Hercules, hee liked not the sacrifice of a coward: whose vnreasonable deuotion could be no better than hypocritie. For hee that will pray for a good Haruest, ought also to Plow, Sow, and Weede his Ground. When therefore the King returned to the battaille, hee found it no better than lost: and he, in looking to his owne safetie, caused it to be lost altogether, by beginning the flight.

The acts of this day, such as we finde recorded, are, That the Roman Elephants could doe no manner of good; That the Macedonian Phalanx did so stoutly presse on wards, and beat off all which came before it, as Emilius was therat much astonished; That the Feligni rushing desperately on the Phalanx, were ouer-borne, many of them slaine, and the Squadrons following them so discouraged herewith, as they retired apace towards an hill. These were the things that fell out aduerse to the Romans; and which the Consul beholding, is said to haue rent his coat-armor for griefe. If the King with all his power of horse, had in like manner done his deuoyre; the victorie might haue bin his owne. That which turned the fortune of the battaille, was the same which doubtlesse the Consul expected, euen from the beginning: the difficultie, or almost impossibilitie, of holding the Phalanx long in order. For whilest some of the Romans small battaillons pressed hard vpon one part of it, and others recoyled from it; it was necessarie (if the Macedonians would follow vpon those which were put to the worke) that some files hauing open way before them, should aduance themselves beyond the rest that were held at a stand. This comming so to passe, admonished the Consul, what was to be done. The long pikes of the Macedonians were of little vse, when they were charged in flanke by the Roman Targettiers; according to direction giuen by Emilius, when hee saw the front of the Enemies great battaille become vnequall, and the ranks in some places open, by reason of the vnequall resistance which they found. Thus was the vse of the Phalanx proued vnauailable against manie small squadrons, as it had bene formerly in the battaille of Cynocephalus: yea, this forme of embattailing was found vneruiceable against the other, by reason, that being not euerie where alike distressed, it would breake of it selfe; though here were little such inconuenience of ground, as had bene at Cynocephalus.

Perseus, when he saw his battaille begin to route, turned his bridle presently, and ranne amaine towards Pella. All his horse escaped, in a manner, vntouched, and a great number followed him; the little harme which they had taken, witnessing the little good seruice which they had done. As for the poore foote; they were left to the mercie of the Enemy: who slew about twentie thousand of them; though hauing little cause to be furious, as hauing lost, in that battaille, onely some fourescore, or sixscore men at the most. Some of the foot, escaping from the execution, ouertook the king & his company in a wood; where they fell to railing at the horse-men, calling them cowards, traytors, and such other names, till at length they fell to blowes. The King was in doubt lest they had ill meaning to himselfe: and therefore turned out of the common way, being followed by such as thought it good. The rest of the company dispersed themselves: euerie one as his owne occasions guided him. Of those that kept along with their King, the number began within a while to lessen. For hee fell to deuising vpon whom he might lay the blame of that daies misfortune, which was most due to himselfe: thereby causing those that knew his nature, to shrink away from him, how they could. At his comming to Pella, he found his Pages and household seruants, readie to attend him, as they had bin wont. But of his great men that had escaped from the battaille, there was none appearing in the Court. In this melancholike time, there were two of his Treasurers that had the boldnesse to come to him, and tell him roundly of his faults. But in reward of their vnreasonable admonitions, he stabbed them both to death. After this, none whom he sent for would come at him. This boded no good. Wherefore standing in feare, lest they that refused to come at his call, should shortly dare some greater mischief; he stole out of Pella by night. Of his friends hee had with him onely Euander (who had bene employed to kill Euменes at Delphi) and two other. There followed him likewise about six hundred Cretians; more for loue of his money, than of him. To these he gaue of his plate, as much as was worth about fiftie talents, though shortly he cozened them of some part thereof; making shew as if hee would haue redeemed it; but neuer paying the money. The third day after the battaile hee came to Amphipolis; where hee exhorted the townsmen to fidelitie, with teares; and his owne speech being hindered by teares, appointed Euander to speake what himselfe would haue vttered. But the Amphipolitans made it their chiefe care, to looke well to themselves. Vpon the first fame of the ouerthrow, they had emptied their towne of two thousand Thracians that lay there in garison: sending them forth vnder colour of againefull employment, and shutting the gates after them. And now to bee ridde of the King; they plainly bade Euander be gone. The King hearing this, had no minde to tarry: but embarking himselfe and the treasure which hee had there, in certaine vessels that hee found in the riuer Strymon; passed ouer to the Isle of Samothrace: where he hoped to liue safe, by priuiledge of the religious Sanctuarie therein.

These miserable shifts of the King make it the lesse doubtfull, how all the kingdome fell into the power of Amphilus, within so few dayes after his victorie. Pydna which was nearest at hand, was the last that yielded. About fixe thousand of the souldiours, that were of sundrie Nations, fled out of the battaile into that Towne; and prepared for defence: the confused rabble of so many strangers hindring all deliberation and consent. Hippius who had kept the passage ouer Ossa against Martius, with Pantaneus, who had bene sent Embassadour to Gentius the Illyrian, were the first that came in: yielding themselves and the Towne of Berea, whither they had retired out of the battaile. With the like message came others from Thessalonica, from Pella, and from all the Townes of Macedon, within two dayes: the losse of the head bereauing the whole bodie of all sense and strength. Neither did they of Pydna stand out any longer, when they knew that the King had forsaken his Countrey: but opened their gates vpon such termes, that the sacke of it was granted to the Roman armie. Amphilus sent abroad into the Countrey, such as hee thought meetest, to take charge of other Cities: hee himselfe marching towards Pella. Hee found 39 in Pella no more than three hundred talents; the same whereof Perseus had lately defrauded the Illyrian. But within a little while hee shall haue more.

It was soone vnderstood, that Perseus had taken Sanctuarie, in the Temple at Samothrace: his owne letters to the Consul, confirming therof. He sent these letters by persons of such meane condition; that his case was pittied, for that he wanted the seruice of better men. The scope of his writing was, to desire fauour: which though hee begged in termes ill becoming a King; yet since the inscription of his Epistle was, KING PERSEVS to the Consul PAVLVVS; the Consul, who had taken from him his Kingdome, and would not allow him to retaine the Title, refused to make answer thereunto. So there came other letters, as humble as could be expected: whereby hee craued and obtained, that some might bee sent to conferre with him about matters of his present estate. Neuertheless in this conference, hee was maruailous earnest, that hee might be allowed to retaine the name of King. And to this end it was perhaps, that hee had so carefully preferred his treasure, vnto the very last: flattering himselfe with such vaine hopes as these; That the Romans would neither violate a Sanctuarie, nor yet neglect those great riches in his possession; but compound with him for money, letting him haue his desire to liue at ease, and bee called King. Yeait seems that hee had indeede, euen from the beginning, a desire to liue in this 50 Isle of Samothrace: both for that in one of his consultations about the war he was dehorted by his friends, from seeking to exchange his Kingdome of Macedon, for *such a paltrie Iland; and for that hee offered to lay vp the money which Enne-

nes demanded, in the holie Temple that was there. But hee findes it otherwise. They vrge him to giue place vnto necessitie, and without more ado, to yeeld to the discretion and mercie of the people of Rome. This is so farre against his minde, that the conference breakes off without effect. Presently there arriues at Samothrace Cn. Octavianus the Roman Admirall, with his fleet: who assayes, as well by terrible threats, as by faire language, to draw the King out of his lurking hole, wherein, for feare of imprisonment, he had imprisoned himselfe. When all would not serue, a question was moued to the Samothracians; How they durst pollute their Temple, by receiuing into it one that had violated the like holie priuiledge of 10 Sanctuarie, by attempting the murder of King Eumenes at Delphi? This went to the quicke. The Samothracians, being now in the power of the Romans, take this matter to heart; and send word to the King, That Euander, who liues with him in the Temple, is accused of an impious fact committed at Delphi, whereof vnlesse he can cleare himselfe in iudgement, he must not be suffered to prophane that holie place, by his abiding in it. The reuerence borne to his Majestie, now past, makes them forbear to say, that Perseus himselfe is charged with the same crime. But what will this auale, when the minister of the fact being brought into iudgement, shall (as is to be feared) appeach the author? Perseus therefore willett Euander to haue consideration of the little fauour that can be expected at the Romans hand,

20 who are like to be presidents and cuerseers of this iudgement: so as it were better, to die valiantly, since none other hope remains, than hope to make good an ill cause; where, though he had a good plea, yet it could not helpe him. Of this motion Euander seemes to like well: and either kills himselfe, or hoping to escape thence, by deferring the time as it were to get payson wherewith to end his life, is killed by the Kings commandement. The death of this man, who had flocked to Perseus in all times of need, makes all the Kings friends that remained hitherto, to forsake him: so as none are left with him, save his wife and children, with his Pages. It is much to be suspected, that they which leaue him vpon this occasion, will tell perillous tales, and say, That the King hath lost the priuiledge of this holie

30 Sanctuarie, by murdering Euander therein. Or if the Romans will affirme so much, who shall dare to gainsay them? Since therefore there is nothing but a point of formalitie, and euen that also lyable to dispute, which preserues him from capitulatie; hee purpoeth to make an escape, and flye, with his Treasures, vnto Corys his good friend, into Thrace. Oroandes, a Cretian, lay at Samothrace with one shippe; who easily was persuaded to waite the King thence. With all secrecie the Kings money, as much as could be so conueyed, was carried aboard by night; and the King himselfe, with his wife and * children (if rather it were not true, that hee had with him onely * Philip his elder sonne, who was onely by adoption his sonne, being his * brother by nature) with much ado got out at a window by

40 a rope, and ouer a mudd wall. At his comming to the Sea side, hee found no Oroandes there: the Cretians had played a Cretian trick, and was gone with the money to his owne home. So it began to waxe cleare day, whilst Perseus was searching all along the shoare: who had layed so long about this, that he might feare to be intercepted ere hee could recover the Temple. Hee ranne therefore amaine towards his lodging: and thinking it not safe to enter it the common way, least he should be taken; hee hid himselfe in an obscure corner. His Pages missing him, ranne vp and downe making enquire; till Octavianus made proclamation, That all the Kings Pages, and Macedonians whatsoever, abiding with their maister in Samothrace, should haue their liues and libertie, with all to them 50 belonging, which they had either in that Isle, or at home in Macedon, conditionally, That they should presently yeeld themselves to the Romans. Hereupon they all came in. Likewise Ion, a Thessalonian, to whom the King had giuen the custodie of his children, deliuered them vp to Octavianus. Lastly, Perseus himselfe, with his sonne Philip, accusing the gods of Samothrace, that had no better protected him; rendered himselfe, and made the Roman victorie complete. If hee had not trusted in those gods of Samothrace, but employed his whole care in the defence of Macedon, without other hope of liuing, than of reigning therein; hee might well haue brought this Warre to an happier end. Now, by dimiding his cogitations, and pursuing, at once, those contrarie hopes of sauing his Kingdome by armes, and himselfe by flight; hee is become a spectacle of miserie, and one among the number of those Princes, that haue beene wretched by their owne default. Hee was presently sent away to Amynius; before whom hee fell to the ground so basely, that hee seemed thereby to dishonour the victorie ouer himselfe, as gotten vpon one of abject qualitie, and therefore the lesse to bee esteemed. Amynius vsed to him the language of a gentle Victor: blaming him, though mildly, for hauing, with so hostile a minde, made Warre vpon the Romans. Hereto good answer might haue beene returned by one of better spirit. As for Perseus, he answered all with a fearefull silence. Hee was comforted with hope of life, or (as the Consul tearmed it) almost assurance; for that such was the mercie of the People of Rome. After these good words, being inuited to the Consuls Table, and respectfully entreated, hee was committed prisoner to Quintus Ailius.

Such end had this Macedonian Warre, after foure yeares continuance: and such end therewithall had the Kingdome of Macedon, the glorie whereof, that had sometime filled all parts of the World then knowae, was now translated vnto Rome.

GENTIUS, King of the Illyrians, taken by the Romans.

* Called now

About the same time, and with like celeritie, Anicius the Roman Prætor, who succeeded vnto App. Claudius, had the like successe against King Gentius the Illyrian. Gentius had an Armie of fiftene thousand; with which hee was at Lissus, readie to assist King Perseus as soone as the money should come, whereof hee had receiued onely tenne Talents. But Anicius arrested him on the way; fought with him; ouercame him; and draue him into * Scodra. This Towne was verie defensible by nature, besides the helpe of fortification; and strongly manned with all the force of Illyria; which, assisted with the Kings presence, made it seeme vnpossible to be wonne, in anie not a verie long time. Yet Anicius was confident in his late victorie; and therefore presented his Armie before the walls, making countenance to giue an assault. The Illyrians, that might easily haue defended themselves within the Towne, would needes issue forth and fight. They were, it seemes, rather passionate than courageous: for they were beaten; and thereupon forthwith began amazedly to treat about yielding. The King sent Embassadors; by whome, at first, hee desired truce for three dayes, that he might deliberate concerning his estate. It ill became him, who had layed violent hand on the Roman Embassadors, to haue recourse to such mediation. But hee thought his owne fault pardonable, in as much as hitherto there was no greater harme done by him, than the casting of those Embassadors into prison; where they were still alieue. Hauing obtained three dayes respite, hee passed vp a Riuer, within halfe a myle of the Roman Campe, into the Lake of

Scodra, as it were to consult the more priuately; though indeede, to hearken whether the report were true, that his brother Caracanthus was coming to his rescue. Finding that no such helpe was toward, it is wonder, that he was so foolish as to returne into Scodra. He sent messengers crauing access vnto the Prætor: before whome hauing lamented his follie past (which, excepting the dishonestie, was not so great as his follie present) he fell downe humbly, and yielded himselfe to discretion. All the Townes of his Kingdome, together with his wife, children, brother, and friends, were presently giuen vp. So this Warre ended in thirtie dayes: the People of Rome not knowing that it was begun; vntill 10 Perperna, one of the Embassadors that had beene imprisoned, brought word from Anicius how all had passed.

20 NOW began the Romans to swell with the pride of their fortune; and to looke tyrannically vpon those that had beene vnmanly toward them before, whilst the Warre with Perseus seemed full of danger. The Rhodian Embassadors were still at Rome, when the tidings of these victories were brought thither. Wherefore it was thought good to call them into the Senate, and bid them doe their errand againe. This they performed with bad grace; saying, That they were sent from Rhodes, to make an ouerture of peace; forasmuch as it was thought, that this Warre was no less grievous to the Romans themselves, than to the Macedonians and manie others: but that now they were verie glad, and in behalfe of the Rhodians did congratulate with the Senate and People of Rome, that it was ended much more happily than had beene expected. Hereto the Senate made answer, That the Rhodians had sent this Embassage to Rome, not for loue to Rome, but in fauour of the Macedonian; whose partizans they were, and should so be taken. By these threats, and the desire of some (courtous of the charge) to haue Warre proclaimed against Rhodes; the Embassadors were so affrighted, that in mourning apparel, as humble suppliants, they went about the Citie; beseeching all men, especially the great ones, to pardon their indiscretion, and not to prosecute them with vengeance for some foolish words. This danger of Warre from Rome being knowne at Rhodes, all that had beene anie while auerle from the Romans in 40 the late Warre of Macedon, were cyther taken and condemned, or sent prisoners to Rome; excepting some that slew themselves for feare, whose goods also were confiscated. Yet this procured little grace; and lesse would haue done, if olde M. Cato, a man by nature vehement, had not vttered a milde sentence, and aduertised the Senate, That in decreeing Warre against Rhodes, they should much dishonour themselves, and make it thought, that * rather the wealth of that Citie, which they were greedie to ransacke, than anie iust cause, had moued them thereto. This consideration, together with their good deserts in the Warres of Philip and Antiochus, helped well the Rhodians: among whome, none of anie marke remained alieue, saue those that had beene of the Roman Faction. All 50 which notwithstanding, manie yeares passed, ere, by importunate suit, they could be admitted into the societie of the Romans: a fauour which, till now, they had not esteemed, but thought themselves better without it, as equal friends.

With the like, or greater seueritie, did the Romans make themselves terrible in all parts of Greece. Amphilus himselfe made progresse through the Countrey; visiting all the famous places therein, as for his pleasure; yet not forgetting to make them vnderstand what power he had ouer them. More than six hundred of the chiefe citizens in Demetrias were slaine at one time by those of the Roman faction, and with helpe of the Roman souldiours. Others fled, or were banished, and their goods confiscated. Of which things, when complaint was made to the Consul, the redresse was such, as requited not the paines of making supplication. His friends, that is to say, those which betrayed vnto the Romans the libertie of their Countrey, he sealed like a King, with exchequie cheare; yet so, that hee had all things verie cheape in his Campe: an easie matter, since no man durst be backward in sending provisions, nor set on them the due price. Embassadors likewise were sent from Rome; some, to giue order for settling the estate of Macedon, towards which they had more particular instruction from the Senate than was vsuall in such cases; and some, to visit the affaires of Greece. The Kingdome of Macedon was set at libertie by Amphilus and the Embassadors, his assistants, who had order therefore from the Senate. But this libertie was such as the Romans vsed to bestow. The best part of it was, That the Tribute which had been payed vnto the Kings, was lessened by halfe. As for the rest; the Countrey was diuided into foure parts, and they forbidden commerce one with the other. All the Nobilitie were sent captiue into Italie, with their wiues and children, as manie as were aboute fiftene 20 yeares old. The ancient Lawes of the Countrey were abrogated, and new giuen by Amphilus. Such mischief the Senate thought it better to doe, at the first alteration of things in this Prouince, and in the time of Conquest, than otherwise to leaue anie inconuenience that should be worse in the future. But concerning the Greekes, that were not subiects to Rome; the things done to them could deserue no better name than meere tyrannic, yea and shamelesse perjurie; were it not so, that the familiar custome, among Princes and great Estates, of violating Leagues, doth make the Oathes of confederation seeme of no validitie. The Embassadors that were sent to visit the Greekes, called before them all such men of note, from euerie 30 quarter, as had anie way discovered an vsuericable disposition towards the Romans. These they sent to Rome; where they were made sure enough. Some of these had sent letters to Perseus, which fell at length into the Romans hands: and in that respect, though they were no subiects, yet wanted there not colour, for vinding them as traytors, or at least as enemies. But since onely two men were beheaded, for hauing bene openly on the Macedonian side; and since it is confessed, that the good Patriotes were no lesse afflicted in this inquisition, than they that had sold themselves to the King: this manner of proceeding was inexcusable Tyrannie. With the Acheans these Embassadors were to deale more formally: not so much because that Commonwealt was strong (though this were to be regarded by them, hauing no Commission to make or denounce Warre) and like to proue 40 vntaughtable, if manifest wrong were offered; as for that there appeared no manner of signe, by letters, or otherwise, whereby anie one of the Acheans could be suspiciously charged to haue held correspondence with the Macedonian. It was also so, that neither Callierates, nor anie of his adherents, had bene employed by the Nation, in doing or offering their seruice to the Romans, but onely such as were the best Patriotes. Yet would not therefore the Embassadors neglect to vse the benefit of the time: wherein, since all men trembled for feare of Rome, the season serued fitly to ranke the Acheans with the rest. And hereto Callierates was verie 50 vrgent: fearing, and procuring them to feare in behalfe of him and his friends, that if some sharpe order were not now taken, hee and his fellows should be made to pay for their mischievous deuices, ere long time passed. So the Embassadors came among the Acheans: where one of them, in open assemblie of the Nation, spake as Callierates had before instructed him. Hee said, That some of the chiefe among them, had with money and other means befriended Perseus. This

This being so, he desired that all such men might be condemned, whom, after sentence giuen, he would name vnto them. After sentence giuen (cried out the whole assembly) what iustice were this? name them first, and let them answer; which if they cannot well doe, we will soone condemne them. Then said the Roman boldly, that all their Prætors, as many as had led their armies, were guilty of this crime. If this were true, said Xenon, a temperate man, and confident in his innocence; then I shall thoroughly answer him, either here presently, or before the Senate at Rome. Vpon these words of Xenon the Embassador laid hold, and said that euen so it were the best way, for him and the rest to purge themselves before the Senate at Rome. Then began he to name others, and left not vntill he had cited about a thousand; willing them to appeare, and answer before the Senate. This might euen be tearmed the captiuitie of Greece; wherein so many of the honestest and worthiest men were carried from home, for none other cause than their loue vnto their Countrey; to be punished according to the will of those, who could not endure, that vertue, and regard of the publike libertie, should dwell together in any of the Greekes. At their comming to Rome, they were all cast into prison: as men already condemned by the Acheans. Many Embassages were sent from Achaia (where it is to be wondered, that any such honest care of these innocent men could be remaining: since 20 honestie had bene thus punished as a vice, in so many of the worthiest among them) to informe the Senat, that these men were neither condemned by the Acheans, nor yet held to be offenders. But in stead of better answer it was pronounced; That the Senate thought it not expedient for the Countrey, that these men should returne into Achaia. Neither could any sollicitation of the Acheans, who neuer ceased to importune the Senate for their libertie, preuaile at all; vntill after seuentene yeeres, fewer than thirtie of them were enlarged, of whom that wise and vertuous man Polybius, the great Historian was one. All the rest were either dead in prison; or hauing made offer to escape, whether vpon the way before they came to Rome, or whether out of iayle, after that they were committed thereto, suffered death 30 as malefactors.

This was a gentle correction, in regard of what was done vpon the Epirots. For the Senate being desirous to preserue the Macedonian Treasure whole; yet withall, to gratifie the souldiours, gaue order, That the whole Countrey of Epirus should be put to sacke. This was a barbarous and horrible crueltie; as also it was performed by Amphilus with mischievous subtiltie. Hauing taken leaue of the Greekes, and of the Macedonians, with bidding them well to vse the libertie bestowed vpon them by the people of Rome; he sent vnto the Epirots for tenne of the principall men out of euerie Citie. These hee commaunded to deliuer vp all the gold and siluer which they had; and sent along with them, into euerie of their 40 Townes, what companies of men he thought conuenient, as it were to fetch the money. But he gaue secret instruction to the Captaines, that vpon a certaine day by him appointed they should fall to sacke euerie one the Towne whereinto hee was sent. Thus in one day were threescore and tenne Cities, all confederate with the Romans, spoyled by the Roman souldiours; and besides other acts of hostilitie in a time of peace, a hundred and fiftie thousand of that Nation made slaues. It may be granted, that some of the Epirots deserued punishment, as hauing fauoured Perseus. But since they, among this people, that were thought guilty of this offence, yea, or but coldly affected to the Romans, had bene already sent into Italie, there to receive their due; and since this Nation, in generall, was not onely at the present 50 in good obedience, but had, euen in this warre, done good seruice to the Romans: I hold this act so wicked, that I should not beleue it, had anie one Writer deliuered the contrarie. But the truth being manifest by consent of all, it is the lesse meruailous, that God was pleased to make Amphilus childlesse, euen in the glorie of his triumph, how great foucer otherwise his vertues were.

In such manner dealt the Romans, after their victorie, with the Greekes and Macedonians. How terrible they were to other Kingdomes abroad; it will appear by the efficacy of an Embassage sent from them to Antiochus: whereof before we speake, we must speake somewhat of Antiochus his foregoers, of himselfe, and of his affaires about which these Embassadors came.

§. XI.

The Warre of ANTIOCHUS upon Egypt, brought to end by the Roman Embassadors.

ANTIOCHUS the Great, after his peace with the Romans, did nothing that was memorable in the short time following of his reign and life. He died the six and thirtieth year after he had worne a Crown, and in the seuenteenth or eighteenth of Ptolemie Epiphanes: while he attempted to rob the Temple of Bel, or (according to Iulius) of Iupiter. He left behinde him three sonnes, Seleucus Philopator, Antiochus Epiphanes, Demetrius Soter, and one daughter, Cleopatra, whom he had giuen in marriage to Ptolemie Epiphanes, King of Egypt. Seleucus the fourth of that name, and the eldest of Antiochus his sonnes, reigned in Syria twelue yeares, according to Eusebius, Appian, and Sulpicius: though Iosephus giue him but seuen. A Prince, who as hee was slouthful by nature, so the great losse which his father Antiochus had receiued, tooke from him the meanes of managing any great affaire. Of him, about three hundred yeares before his birth, Daniel gaue this judgement, Et stabit in loco eius vilissimus & indignus decore regis. And in his place (speaking of Antiochus the father of this man) shall start up a wilde person, unworthy the honor of a King. Vnder this Seleucus, those things were done which are spoken of Onias the High Priest, in these words, and other to the same effect. What time as the holy Citie was inhabited with all peace, because of the godlinesse of ONIAS the Priest, it came to passe, that euen the King did honor the place, and garnished the Temple with great gifts. And all that is written in the third Chapter of the second of Machabees, of Simon of Beniamin, who by Apollonius betrayed the treasures of the Temple: and of Heliadorus sent by the King to reioyce with; of his miraculous striking by God; and his recovery at the prayers of Onias; of the Kings death, and of his successor Antiochus Epiphanes. It is therefore from the reign of this King, that the bookes of the Machabees take beginning. Which bookes seeme not to be deliuered by one and the same hand. For the first booke, although it touch upon Alexander the Great, yet it hath nothing else of his storie, nor of the acts of his successors, till the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, the brother and successor of this Seleucus; from whom downward to the death of Simon Machabees (who died in the hundred threecore and seuenteenth yeare of the Greekes in Syria) that first booke treateth. The Author of the second booke, although he take the storie somewhat further off, by way of a Proeme, yet hee endeth with the hundred and one and fiftieth yeare of the Gracian raigne, and with the death of Nicanor, slaine by Judas: remembring in the fourth Chapter the practise of Iafon, the brother of Onias, who after the death of Seleucus, perswaded with Antiochus Epiphanes, his successor for the Priesthood. It is also held by Iansenius and other graue Writers, that it was in the time of this Onias, that Arion King of the Spartans sent Embassadors to the Jewes, as to their brothers and kinsmen. Which intelligence between them and the Greekes, Jonathan the brother and successor of Judas, remembreth in the Preamble of that Epistle, which he himselfe directed to the people of Sparta by Numenius and Antipater his Embassadors, whom hee employed at the same time to the Senate of Rome; repeating also the former Letters word by word, which Arion had sent to Onias the High Priest, whereto Iosephus addes, addes, that the name of the Lacedemonian Embassador was Demoteles, and that the Letters had a square Volume, and were sealed with an Eagle holding a Dragon in her claws.

Now to this Seleucus, the fourth of that name, succeeded Antiochus Epiphanes, in the hundred and seuen and thirtieth year of the Greekes in Syria. Hee was the second sonne of the Great Antiochus: and he obtained his Kingdom by procuring the death of the King his brother; which also hee vsurped from his brothers sonne.

Ptolemie Epiphanes, the father of this King Philometor, had reigned in Egypt foure and twentie yeares; in great quiet, but doing little or nothing that was memorable. Philip of Macedon, and the great Antiochus, had agreed to diuide his Kingdom between them, whilst he was a childe. But they found such other busines, ere long, with the Romans, as made them giue ouer their vniuit purpose; especially Antiochus, who gaue, with his daughter in marriage, vnto this Ptolemie, the Provinces of Celestria, Phenice, and Iudea, which he had wonne by his victorie ouer Scopas, that was Generall of the Egyptian forces in those parts. Neuertheless, Ptolemie adhered to the Romans: whereby he liued in the greater securitie. Hee left behinde him two sons; this Ptolemie Philometor, and Ptolemie Physcon, with a daughter, Cleopatra. Cleopatra was wife to the elder of her brethren, and after his death to the yonger, by whom she was cast off, and her daughter taken in her stead. Such were the marriages of these Egyptian Kings.

Ptolemie Philometor, so called (that is, the louer of his mother) by a bitter nickname, because he slew her, fell into harred with his subiects, and was like to be chased out of his kingdom: his yonger brother being set vp against him. Physcon hauing a strong partie, got possession of Alexandria; and Philometor held himselfe in Memphis, crauing succour of King Antiochus his vnckle. Hereof Antiochus was glad: who vnder colour to take vpon him the protection of the yong Prince, sought by all meanes possible to possesse himselfe of that kingdom. He sent Apollonius the sonne of Mnethens Embassador into Egypt, and vnder colour to assist the Kings Coronation, hee gaue him instructions to perswade the Gouvernours of the yong King Philometor, to deliuer the King his Nephew with the principall places of that kingdom into his hands; pretending an extraordinarie care and desire of his Nephewes safetie and well doing. And the better to answere all argument to the contrary, he prepared a forcible armie to attend him. Thus came he althought the coast of Syria, to Ioppe, and from thence on the sudden he turned himselfe towards Jerusalem, where by Iafon the Priest (a Chaplin fit for such a Patron) hee was with pompe and solemnitie receiued into the Citie. For though lately, in the time of Seleucus, the brother and predecessour of Epiphanes, that impious traitor Simon of the Tribe of Beniamin, ruler of the Temple, when he would haue deliuered the treasures thereof to Apollonius Governor of Celestria and Phenicia, was disappointed of his wicked purpose by miracle from heauen; the said Apollonius being broken by the Angell of God, and recouering againe at the prayer of Onias: yet sufficed not this example to terrifie others from the like vngodly practises. Presently vpon the death of Seleucus, this Iafon, the brother of Onias, seeking to supplant his brother, and to obtaine the Priesthood for himselfe, offered vnto the King three hundred and threecore talents of siluer, with other rents and summes of money. So he got his desire, though he not long enioyed it.

This naughtie dealing of Iafon, and his being ouer-reached by another, in the same kinde, calls to minde a by-word taken vp among the Achaens, when as that mischieuous Colletter, who had bene too hard for all worthe and virtuous men, was beaten at his owne weapon, by one of his owne condition. It went thus.

One

One fire than other burnes more forcibly,
 One Wolfe than other Wolves does bite more sore;
 One Hawk than other Hawks more swift does fly.
 So one most mischievous of men before,
 CALLICRATES, false knave as knave might be,
 Met with MENALCIDAS more false than he.

And euen thus fell it out with Iafon: who within three yeares after, was betrayed, and ouerbidden by Menelaus the brother of Simon, that for three hundred talents more obtained the Priesthood for himselfe: Iafon thereupon being forced to flie from Ierusalem, and to hide himselfe among the Ammonites.

From Ierusalem, Antiochus marched into Phoenicia, to augment the numbers of his men of warre, and to prepare a Fleet for his expedition into Egypt; with which, and with a mightie armie of land-forces, Hee went about to raigne over Egypt, that he might haue the dominion of two Realmes, and entred Egypt with a mightie companie, with Chariots and Elephants, with Horsemen, and with a great Raie, and moued warre against PTOLEMAEVS King of Egypt, but PTOLEMAEVS was afraid of him and fled, and many were wounded to death. He wanne many strong Cities, and took away the spoiles of the Land of Egypt. Thus was fulfilled the Prophecie of DANIEL, He shall enter into the quiet and plentifull Provinces, and he shall doe that which his Fathers haue not done, nor his Fathers Fathers. Neuer indeed had any of the Kings of Syria so great a victorie ouer the Egyptians, nor took from them so great riches. For hee gaue a notable overthrow to the Captaines of Ptolemie, betwene Pelusi and the hill Cafius, after which he entered and sackt the greatest and richest of all the Cities of Egypt, Alexandria excepted, which he could not force. In conclusion, after that ANTIOCHVS had smitten Egypt, he turned againe and went up towards Israel and Ierusalem with a mightie people, and entered proudly into the Sanctuarie, and tooke away the golden Altar, and the Candlestick for the light, and all the Instruments thereof, and the table of the Shew-bread, and the pouring Vessels and the Bowler, and the golden Basins, and the Vase, and the Crowne, and the golden Apparell. He tooke also the Silver, and the Gold, and the 30 precious Jewels, and the secret Treasures: and when he had taken away all, he departed into his owne Land, after he had murdered many men.

It was about the beginning of the Macedonian warre, that Antiochus tooke in hand this Egyptian businesse. At what time he first laid claime to Celestria; justifying his title by * the same allegations which his father had made; and diffidly auerring, that this Prouince had not beene confiscated ouer to the Egyptian, or origin in dowrie with Cleopatra. Easie it was to approue his right vnto that which he had already gotten, when he was in a faire way to get all Egypt. The Athians, Rhodiens, Athenians, and other of the Greekes, pressed him, by feuerall Embassages, to some good conclusion. But his answer was; that if the Alexandrians could be contented to receiue their King his Nephew Philometor, the elder brother of the Ptolemies, then should the warre be presently at an end; otherwise not. Yet when hee saw, that it was an hard peece of worke to take Alexandria by force: he thought it better to let the two brothers consume themselves with intestine warre, than by the terror of his armes, threatening destruction vnto both of them, to put into them any desire of coming to agreement. He therefore withdrew his forces for the present; leauing the Ptolemies in very weake estate; the younger, almost ruined by his inuasion; the elder hated and forsaken by his people.

But how weake sooner these Egyptians were, their barred was thought to bee so strong, that Antiochus might leaue them to the prosecution thereof; and follow, at good leasure his other businesse at Ierusalem or elsewhere. So after the sacke of Ierusalem, he rested him a while at Antioch; and then made a journey into Cilicia, to suppress the Rebellion of the Tharsians and other in those parts, who had bin giuen, as it were, by way of dowrie, to a Concubine of the Kings, called Antiochis For

Gouernour of Syria in his absence, he left one Andronicus, a man of great authoritie about him. In the meane while Menelaus the brother of Simon, the same who had thrust Iafon out of the Priesthood, and promised the King three hundred talents for an Income, committing the charge of the Priesthood to his brother Lysimachus, stole certaine vessells of gold out of the Temple: whereof he presented a part to Andronicus the Kings Lieutenant, and sold the rest at Tyre, and other Cities adjoining. This he did, as it seemeth, to aduance the payment of the three hundred talents promised; the same being now by *Sositratu*s eagerly demanded. Hereof when Onias the Prielt (formerly dispossessed by Iafon) had certaine knowledge, being moued with zeale, and detesting the sacrilege of Menelaus, hee reproued him for it; and fearing his reuenge, he withdrew himselfe into a Sanctuarie at Daphne.

Daphne was a place of delight adjoining as a suburb to Antioch. In compasse it had about ten miles: wherein were the Temples of Apollo and Diana, with a Grove, sweet Springs, banquetting places, and the like; which were wholly, in a manner, abused to luit, and other such voluptuousnesse. Whether it were well done of Onias, to commit himselfe to the protection of Apollo and Diana, or to claime priuiledge, from the holines of a ground consecrated to any of the Heathen gods, I will not stand to discourse. Only I say for mine owne opinion; that the inconuenience is lesse, to hold this book as Apocryphall; than to iudge this fearfull thit which

Onias (though a vertuous man) made for his life, either commendable, or allowable, as the booke seemes to doe. As for this refuge, it could not saue the life of the poore old man: for MENELAUS taking ANDRONICVS apart, prayed him to slay ONIAS. So when he came to ONIAS, he counselled him craftily, giuing him his right hand with an oath, and perswading him to come out of the Sanctuarie; so he slew him incontinently, without any regard of righteousness. Hereof when complaint was made to Antiochus after his returne out of Cilicia, hee tooke away ANDRONICVS his garment of purple, and rent his clothes, and commanded him to be led throughout the City, and in the same place where hee had committed the wickednesse against ONIAS, hee was slaine as a murderer.

In taking reuenge of this innocent mans death, I should haue thought that this wicked King had once in his life-time done Iustice. But presently after this, at the suite of one Ptolemie, a traytor to Ptolemie Philometor, he condemned innocent ment to death; who iustly complained against Menelaus, and his brother Lysimachus, for a second robbing of the Temple, and carrying thence the Vessels of gold remaining. Hereby it is manifest, that he was guided by his owne outrageous will, and not by any regard of justice: since he reuenged the death of Onias, yet slew those that were in the same cause with Onias, who had they told their cause, yet before the Scythians, they should haue beene heard as innocent.

By reason of such his vntedificence, this King was commonly termed Epimachus, that is, madde, in stead of Epiphane, which signifieth Noble or Illustrious.

After this, Antiochus made preparation for a second voyage into Egypt, and then were seen throughout all the Citie of Ierusalem, fortie dayes long, horsemen running in the aire with Robes of gold, and as bands of Spearemen, and as troopes of Horsemen set in aray, incounting and cursing one against another. Of these prodigious signes, or rather forewarnings of Gods all Histories haue deliuered vs, some more, some lesse. Before the destruction of Ierusalem by Vespasian, a starre in the forme of a sword appeared in the Heauens directly ouer the Citie, after which there followed a slaughter like vnto that of *Epiphane*s, though farre greater. In the Cymbrian warres, Pliny tells vs that Armies were scene fighting in the aire from the morning till the evening.

In the time of Pope Iohn the eleuenth, a fountaine powred out bloud in stead of water, in or neare the Citie of Genoa; loone after which the Citie was taken by the Saracens, with great slaughter. Of these and the like prodigious signes, Vespera hath collected many, and very remarkable. But this one seemeth to me the most memorable, because the most notorious. All men know that in the Emperour Nero, the Off-spring of the Cæsars, as well naturall as adopted, tooke end; whereof this notable signe gave warning.

When Livia was first married to Augustus, an Eagle let fall into her armes a white Henne, holding a Lawrell branch in her mouth. Livia caused this Henne to be carefully nourished, and the Lawrell branch to be planted: Of the Henne came a faire encrease of white Poultry, and from the little branch there sprang vp in time a Groue of Lawrell: so that afterwards, in all Triumphs, the Conquerors did vse to carrie in their hands a branch of Bayes taken out of this Groue; and after the Triumphs ended, to set it againe in the same ground: which branches were obserued, when they happened to wither, to forehew the death of those persons who carried them in triumph. And in the last yeare of Nero, all the broodes of the white Hennes died, and the whole Groue of Bayes withered at once. Moreover, the heads of all the Cæsars Statues, and the Scepter placed in Augustus his hand, were stricken downe with lightning. That the Iewes did not thinke such ill signe to be vnworthie of regard; it appears by their calling vpon God, and praying, that these tokens might turne to good.

Now, as the first voyage of Antiochus into Egypt was occasioned by discord of the two brethren therein raigning: so was his second Expedition caused by their good agreement. For the elder Ptolemie being left in Alephius, not strong enough to force his brother, who had defended Alexandria against all the power of their vnkle; thought it the best way to secke entrance into that royall Citie, rather by persuation than by armes. Phylcon had not as yet forgotten the terror of the former siege: the Alexandrines though they loued not Philemeter, yet loued they worse to liue in scarcitie of victuals (which was alreadie great among them, and like to grow extreme) since nothing was brought in from the Countrey; and the friends of the younger brother saw no likelihood of good issue to be hoped for without reconciliation. These good helpes, and aboue all these, the loving disposition of Cleopatra, who then was in Alexandria, encouraged Philemeter in his purpose. But that which made him earnestly desirous to accomplish it, was the feare wherein he stood of his vnkle. For though Antiochus were gone out of Egypt with his armie; yet had he left behinde him a strong garrison in Pelusiū; retaining that Citie, which was the Key of Egypt, to his owne vse. This consideration wrought also with Phylcon, and with those that were about him; so as by the vehement mediation of Cleopatra their sister, the two brethren made an end of all quarrels.

When the newes of this accord was brought to Antiochus, hee was greatly enraged: for notwithstanding that hee had pretended no other thing than the establishing of the King Philemeter his nephew, and a meaning to subject his younger brother vnto him, which hee gaue in answer to all Embassadors; yet hee now prepared to make sharpe warre vpon them both. And to that end hee presently furnished and sent out his Nauie towards Cyprus, and drew his Land Armie into Celestria, readie to enter Egypt the Spring following. When he was on his way as fast as Rhinocorura, he met with Embassadors sent from Ptolemie. Their errand was partly to yeeld thanks to Antiochus for the establishing of Philemeter in his Kingdom; partly to beseech him, That he would rather be pleased to signifie what hee required to haue done in Egypt, which should be performed, than to enter it as an enemy with so puissant an Armie. But Antiochus returned this short answer, That he would neither call backe his Fleet, nor withdraw his Armie, vpon any other condition, than that Ptolemie should surrender into his hands, together with the Citie of Pelusiū, the whole Territorie thereto belonging: and that hee should also abandon and leaue vnto him the Isle of Cyprus, with all the right that he had vnto either of them for euer. For answer vnto these demands, hee set downe a day certaine, and a short one. Which being come and past, without any accord made, the Syrian Fleet entred Nilus, and recovered as well those places which appertained to Ptolemie in Arabia, as in Egypt it selfe; for Alephius and all about it receiued Antiochus, being vnable to resist him. The King hauing now no stoppe in his way to Alexandria; passed on thitherwards by eate journeyes.

Of all these troubles past, as well as of the present danger wherein Egypt stood; the Romans had notice long agoe. But they found, or were contented to finde, little reason for them to intermeddle therein. For it was a ciuill warre: and wherein Antiochus seemed to take part with the iuster cause. Yet they gaue signification, that it would be much displeasing vnto them, to haue the Kingdom of Egypt taken from the rightfull owners. More they could not, or would not doe; being troubled with Perseus; and therefore loath to prouoke Antiochus too farre. Neuerthelesse, the Egyptian Kings being reconciled, and standing joyntly in neede of helpe against their Vnkle, who prepared and made open warre against them both: it was to bee expected, that not onely the Romans, but many of the Greekes, as being thereto obliged by notable benefices, should arme in defence of their Kingdom. Rome had bene sustained with food from Egypt, in the warre of Hannibal; when Italy lying waste, had neither corne, nor money wherewith to buy sufficient store. By helpe of the Egyptian, had Aratus laid the foundation of that greatnesse, whereto the Acheans attained. And by the like helpe, had Rhodes bene defended against Demetrius Poliorcetes. Neither were these friendly turnes, which that bountifull house of the Ptolemies had done for sundrie people abroad, ill followed or seconded, by other as bad in requitall: but with continuance of sutable beneficence, from time to time encreased. Wherefore the two brothers sent abroad confidently for ayde: especially to the Rhodesians and Acheans, who seemed most able to giue it effectually. To the Romans, Phylcon and Cleopatra had sent, a yeare since: but their Embassadors lay still in Rome. Of the Acheans they desired in particular, that Lycortas the braue warrior might be sent to them as Generall of all the Auxiliaries, and his sonne Polybius Generall of the Horse. Hereunto the Acheans readily condescended: and would immediately haue made performance; if Callicrates had not interposed his mischieuous arte. Hee, whether seeking occasion to vaunte his obsequiousnesse to the Romans; or much rather enuying those Noble Captaines, whose seruice the Kings desired; withheld the common voice; which was, That their Nation should, not with such small numbers as were requested, but with all their power, be aiding vnto the Ptolemies. For it was not now (hee said) convenient time to entangle themselves in any such businesse, as might make them the lesse able to yeeld vnto the Romans what helpe (sooner should be required in the Macedonian warre. And in this sentence, hee with those of his faction obstinately persisted; terrifying others with bigge words, as it were in behalfe of the Romans. But Polybius affirmed, that Martius the late Consul had signified vnto him, that the Romans were past all need of helpe: adding further, that a thousand foote, and two hundred horse, might well bee spared, to the ayde of their benefactors, the Egyptian Kings, without disabling their Nation to performe any seruice to the Romans; for as much as the Acheans could, without trouble, raise thirtie or fortie thousand fouldiers. All this notwithstanding, the resolution was deferred from one meeting to another; and finally broken, by the violence of Callicrates. For when it was thought that the Decree should haue passed; he brought into the Theater where the assembly was held, a Messenger with letters from Martius; whereby the Acheans were desired to conforme themselves to the Roman Senate, and to labour, as the Senate had done, by sending Embassadors, to set Egypt in peace. This was an adice against all reason. For the Senate had indeed sent Embassadors to make peace; but as in a time of greater businesse else where, with such milde words, that nothing was effected. Wherefore it was not likely, that the Acheans should doe any good in the same kinde. Yet Polybius and his friends durst not gaine say the Roman Councell, which had force of an iniunction. So the Kings were left in much distresse; disappointed of their expectation. But within a while was Perseus overcome: and then might the Embassador sent from the Roman Senate, performe as much as any Armie could haue done.

Audience had beene lately giuen by the Senate, vnto those Embassadors of Physcon and Cleopatra; which hauing stayed more then a whole year in the Citie, brought nothing of their businesse to effect vntill now. The Embassadors deliuered their message in the name of those that had sent them: though it concerned (which perhaps they knew not) Phulometor, no lesse than his brother 10 and sister.

In this Embassage of Ptolemie, now requesting helpe from Rome; appeared a notable change of his fortune, from such as it had bin before three or four years last past. For in the beginning of these his troubles, which began with the Macedonian warre; either he, or Eulaeus and Lenaus (vpon whom the blame was afterwards laid) which had the government of him, thought his affaires in such good estate, that not only he determined to set vpon Antiochus, for Calesyria; but would haue interposed him selfe betwene the Romans and Perseus, as a competent Arbitrator; though it fell out well, that his Embassador was by a friend perswaded, to forget that point of his errand. From these high thoughts, he fell on the sudden, by the rebellion of his brother and subiects, to liue vnder protection of the same Antiochus. 20 And now at such time as by attennement with his brother and subiects, hee might haue seemed to stand in no need of such protection; he hath remaining none other helpe whereby to saue both his Kingdome and life, than what can be obtained by their intercession which were employed against him. This miserable condition of him, his brother and sister, shewed it selfe euen in the habit of those Embassadors. They were poorly cladde; the haire of their heads and beards ouer-grown, as was their manner in time of affliction; and they carried in their hands, branches of Oliue. Thus they entered into the Senate; and there fell groueling and prostrate vpon the floare. Their garments were not so meane and mournfull, nor their 30 looks and countenances so sad and dejected, but that their speech was than either of the other farre more lamentable. For hauing told in what danger their King and Country stood; they made a pititull and grieuous complaint vnto the Senate, beseeching them to haue compassion of their estate, and of their Princes, who had alwayes remained friendly and faithfull to the Romans. They said that the people of Rome had so much heretofore fauoured this Antiochus in particular, and were of such account and authority, with all other Kings and Nations; as if they pleased but to send their Embassadors, and let Antiochus know, that the Senate was offended with his undertaking vpon the King their Confederat; then would he presently raise his siege from before Alexandria, and withdraw his Armie out 40 of Egypt into Syria. But that if the Senate protracted any time or vsed any delay; then should Ptolemie and Cleopatra be shortly driuen out of their Realmes, and make repaire to Rome, with shamefull dishonor to the Senate and people thereof, in that, in the extreame dangers of all their fortunes, they had not vouchsafed to relieue them.

The Lords of the Senate moued with compassion, sent incontinently C. Popilius Lenus, C. Decimius, and A. Hostilius, as Embassadors, to determine and end the warre betwene those Kings. In commiſſion they had first to finde King Ptolemie, and then Antiochus; and to let them both vnderstand, that vnlesse they surceaſed and gaue over Armes, they would take that King no more for a friend to the Senate and people of Rome, whom they found obſtinate or vsing delay. So these Romans, together with the Alexandrine Embassadors, tooke their leave, and went onward their way within three dayes after.

Whilst

Whilst Popilius and his fellowes were on their way toward Egypt, Antiochus had transported his Armie ouer Lusine, some fortie myles from Alexandria. So neare was hee to the end of his journey, when the Roman Embassadors met him. After greeting and salutations at their first encounter, Antiochus offered his right hand to Popilius: but Popilius filled it with a Role of paper; willing him to reade those Mandates of the Senate, before hee did anie thing else. Antiochus did so; and hauing a little while considered of the businesse, hee tolde Popilius, That hee would aduise with his friends, and then giue the Embassadors their answer. But Popilius, according to his ordinarie blunt manner of speech, which hee had by nature, made a Circle about the King with a Rodde which he held in his hand, willing him to make him such an answer as hee might report to the Senate, before hee moued out of that Circle. The King astonished at this so rude and violent a Commaundement, after hee had stayed and pawed a while, I will be content (quoth he) to doe whatsoever the Senate shall ordaine. Then Popilius gaue vnto the King his hand, as to a Friend and Allie of the Romans.

Thus Antiochus departed out of Egypt, without anie good issue of his costly Expedition; euen in such manner as * Daniel had prophesied long before: yea, fulfilling euery particular circumstance, both of returning, and of doing mischief to Ierusalem after his returne; like as if these things had rather bene historiated than fore-told by the Prophet. As for the Roman Embassadors, they stayed a while, and settled the Kingdome of Egypt, leaving it vnto the elder brother, and appointing the younger to raigne ouer Cyrene. This done, they departed towards Cyprus; which they left, as it had beene, in the power of the Egyptian, hauing first sent away Antiochus Fleet, which had already giuen an ouerthrow to the Egyptian shippes.

How the Romans were dreadfull to all Kings. Their demeanour towards Eumenes, Prusias, Masanissa, and Cotys. The end of Perseus and his children. The instability of Kingly Estates. The Triumphs of Paulus, Anicius, and Octavius. With the Conclusion of the Worke.

BY this peremptorie demeanour of Popilius, in doing his Message, and by the ready obedience of King Antiochus to the will of the Senate; wee may perceiue how terrible the Romans were growne, through their conquest of Macedon. The same Popilius had beene well contented, a year before this, to lay aside the roughnesse of his naturall condition, and to giue good language to the Acheans and Attolians, when hee went Embassador to those people of Greece, that were of farre lesse power than the King Antiochus. Likewise, Antiochus had with good wordes, and no more than good wordes, dismissed other Embassadors which came from Rome, in such sort, as they complained not, much lesse vsed anie menacing tearmes, though hee performed nothing of their request. But now the case was altered. So found other Kings as well as Antiochus.

Eumenes sent to Rome his brother Attalus, to gratulate the victorie ouer Perseus, and to craue helpe or countenance of the Senate against the Gallogreekes, which molested him. Verie welcome was Attalus, and louingly entertained by most of the Senatours: who bad him be confident, and request of the Senate his brothers Kingdome for himselfe; for it should surely be giuen him. These hopefull promises tickled Attalus with such ambition, that hee cyther approued, or seemed to approue the motion. But his honest nature was soone reclaimed by the faithfull counsaile of Stratus a Phylician; whome Eumenes had sent to Rome of purpose to keepe his brother vpriight. So, when hee came into the Senate, hee deliuered the errand about which hee had bene sent; & recounted his owne seruices done to the Romans in the late Warre,* wherewithall he forgot not to make of his brother as good mention as he could: and finally requested, That the Townes of Annus and Maronea might be bestowed vpon himselfe. * By his omitting to sue for his brothers Kingdome, the Senate conceiued opinion, that he meant to craue another day of audience for that businesse alone. Wherefore, to make him vnderstand how gracious hee was, they not onely graunted all his desire; but in the presents which they gaue to him (as was their custome to Embassadours that came with an acceptable message) they vsed singular magnificence. Neuertheless, Attalus tooke no notice of their meaning; but went his way, contented with what they had already graunted. This did so highly please the Senate, that whilst hee was yet in Italie, they gaue order for the libertie of Annus and Maronea: thereby making vneffectuall their promise; which otherwise they could not, without shame, reuoke. And as for the Gabogreeker, which were about to invade the Kingdome of Pergamus; they sent Embassadours to them, with such instructions, as rather encouraged than hindered them in their purpose. The displeasure of the Senate beeing so manifest, Eumenes thought it worthe of his labour to make another voyage to Rome. Hee might well blame the tollie of his second voyage thither, for this necessitie of the third: since, by his malice to Perseus, hee had layed open vnto these ambitious Potentates the way to his owne dores. No sooner was he come into Italie, than the Senate was readie to send him going. It was not thought expedient to vie him as an enemy, that came to visit them in loue: neyther could they, in so doing, haue auoided the note of singular inconstancie: and to entertaine him as a friend, was more than their hatred to him, for his ingratitude, as they deemed it, would permit. Wherefore they made a Decree, That no King should be suffered to come to Rome; and by vertue thereof sent him home, without expence of much further complement.

Prusias King of Bithynia had bene at Rome somewhat before; where he was welcommed after a better fashion. Hee had learned to bechaue himselfe as humbly as the proud Romans could expect or desire. For entring into the Senate, hee lay downe, and kissed the threshold, calling the Fathers his gods and sauours: as also hee vsed to weare a Cappe, after the manner of slaues newly manumitted, professing himselfe an enfranchised bondman of the People of Rome. He was indeede naturally a slave, and one that by such abject flatterie kept himselfe safe; though doing otherwise greater mischife than anie wherewith Perseus had bene charged. His errand was, besides matter of complement, to commend vnto the Senate the care of his sonne Nicomedes, whome he brought with him to Rome there to receiue education. Further petition he made, to haue some Townes added to his Kingdome: whereto, because the graunt would haue bene vnjust hee receiued a cold answer. But concerning the Wardship of his sonne, it was vnderaken by the Senate: which, vaunting of the pleasure lately done to Aegypt, in freeing it from Antiochus, willed him thereby to consider, what effectuall protection the Romans gaue vnto the children of Kings, that were to their patronage commended.

But aboute all other Kings, Massinissa held his credit with the Romans good. His quarrels were endlesse with the Carthaginians: which made the friendship of the Romans to him the more assured. In all controuersies they gaue judgement on on his side: and whereas hee had inuaded the Countrey of Emporia, holding the Lands, but vnable to winne the Townes; the Romans (though at first they could finde no pretext, whereby to countenance him in this oppression) compelled finally the Carthaginians both to let goe all their hold, and to paye five hundred Talents to the Numidian; for hauing hindered him of his due so long. Now indeede had Rome good leysure to deuise vpon the ruine of Carthage: after which, the race of Massinissa himselfe was shortly by them rooted vp. But heereof the olde King neuer dreamed. Hee sent to Rome one of his sonnes, to congratulate the victorie ouer Perseus; and offered to come thither himselfe, there to sacrifice for joy vnto Iupiter in the Capitol. His good will was louingly accepted; his sonne rewarded; and hee entreated to stay at home.

Cotys the Thracian sent Embassadours, to excuse himselfe touching the aide by him giuen to Perseus, for that the Macedonian had him bound by hostages; and to entreat, That his sonne, which was taken with the children of Perseus, might be set at libertie for conuenient ranfome. His excuse was not taken; thre hee had voluntarily obliged himselfe to Perseus, by giuing hostages, without necessitie: Yet was his sonne giuen backe to him ranfome-free; with admonition, to carrie himselfe better toward the Romans in time following. His Kingdome lay betweene Macedon and some barbarous Nations; in which respect, it was good to hold him in faire tearmes.

As for those vnhappy Kings, Perseus and Gentius, they were ledde through Rome, with their children and friends, in the Triumphs of Emilius and Anticius. Perseus had often made suite to Emilius, that hee might not be put to such disgrace: but hee still receiued one skornefull answer, That it lay in his owne power to prevent it; whereby was meant, that hee might kill himselfe. And surely, had hee not hoped for greater mercie than hee found, hee would rather haue sought his death in Macedon, than haue bene beholding to the courtesie of his insolent enemies for a wretched life. The issue of the Roman clemencie, whereof Emilius had giuen him hope, was no better than this: After that hee, and his fellow King, had bene ledde in chaynes through the streets, before the Chariots of their triumphing Victors, they were committed to prison, wherein they remayned without hope of release. It was the manner, that when the Triumpher turned his Chariot vp towards the Capitol, there to doe sacrifice, hee should command the captiues to be had away to prison, and there put to death: so as the honour of the Vanquisher, and miserie of those that were overcome, might be both together at the utmost. This last sentence of death was remitted vnto Perseus: yet so, that hee had little joy of his life; but cyther famished himselfe, or (for it is diuersly reported) was kept watching perforce by those that had him in custodie; and so died for want of sleepe. Of his sonnes, two died; it is vnertaine how. The youngest called Alexander (onely in name like vnto the Great, though declined sometimes perhaps by his father, vnto the fortunes of the Great) became a loyner, or Turner, or, at his best preferment, a Scribe vnder the Roman Officers. In such perpetie ended the Royall Houe of Macedon: and it ended on the suddaine; though some eightscore yeares after the death of that Monarch, vnto whose ambition this whole Earth seemed too narrow.

If Perseus had knowne it before, that his owne sonne should one day be compelled to earne his liuing by handie-werke, in a painefull Occupation; it is like, that he would not, as in a wantonnesse of Soueraigneticke, haue commanded those poore men to be slaine, which had recovered his treasures out of the sea, by their skill in the feat of diuing. He would rather haue bene verie gentle, and would haue considered, that the greatest oppressors, and the most vnderdrotten wretches, are all subiect vnto One high Power, gouerning all alike with absolute command.

But such is our unhappinesse; in stead of that blessed counsaile, Do as ye would be done vnto, a sentence teaching all moderation, and pointing out the way to felicitie; wee entertaine that arrogant thought, I will be like to the Most High: that is, I will doe what shall please my selfe. One hath said truly:

Isaenai. Sat. 10.

Possit volunt* —

*Euen they that haue no murtherous will,
Would haue it in their power to kill.*

All, or the most, haue a vaine desire of abilitie to doe euill without controule: which is a dangerous temptation vnto the performance. God, who best can judge what is expedient, hath graunted such power to verie few: among whom also, verie few there are, that vse it not to their owne hurt. For who sees not, that a Prince, by racking his Soueraigne authoritie to the vtmost extent, enableth (besides the danger to his owne person) some one of his owne sonnes or nephewes to roo vp all his progenie? Shall not manie excellent Princes, notwithstanding their brotherhood, or other nearnesse in blood, be driuen to flatter the Wife, the Minion, or perhaps the Harlot, that gouernes one, the most vnworthie of his whole house, yet reigning ouer all? The vntimely death of manie Princes, which could not humble themselves to such flatterie; and the common practise of the Turkish Emperours, to murder all their brethren, without expecting till they offend; are too good proofes hereof. Hereto may be added, That the heire of the same Roger Mortimer, who murdered most traiterously and barbarously King Edward the second; was, by reason of a marriage, proclaimed, in time not long after following, heire apparent to the Crowne of England: which had he obtained, then had all the power of Edward fallen into the race of his mortall enemy, to exercise the same vpon the Line of that vnhappie King. Such examples of the instabilitie whereto all mortall affaires are subiect; as they teach moderation, and admonish the transitorie Gods of Kingdomes, not to authorize, by wicked precedents, the euill that may fall on their owne posteritie: so doe they necessarily make vs vnderstand, how happie that Countrie is, which hath obtained a King able to conceiue and teach, That * God is the fittest and sharpest Schoolemaster, that can be devised, for such Kings, as thinke this world ordained for them, without controule to turne it upside-downe at their pleasure.

The true Law

Now, concerning the Triumph of L. Aemilius Paulus; it was in all points like vnto that of T. Quintius Flaminius: though farre more glorious, in regard of the Kings owne person, that was ledde along therein, as part of his owne spoyle; and in regard likewise both of the Conquest and of the Bootie. So great was that quantitie of Gold and Silver carried by Paulus into the Roman Treasure, that from thenceforth, vntill the ciuile Warres, which followed vpon the death of Iulius Caesar, the Estate had no need to burthen it selfe with anie Tribute. Yet was this noble Triumph likely to haue beene hindered by the souldiours; who grudged at their General, for not hauing dealt more bountifully with them. But the Princes of the Senate ouer-ruled the People and Souldiours herein, and brought them to reason by seuerall exhortations. Thus Paulus enjoyed as much honour of his victorie as men could giue. Neuertheless, it pleased God to take away from him his two remaying sonnes, that were not giuen in adoption: of which, the one died fye dayes before the Triumph; the other, three dayes after it. This losse hee bore wisely: and told the People, That hee hoped to see the Commonwealth flourish in a continuance of prosperitie; since the joy of his victorie was requited with his owne priuate calamitie, in stead of the publike.

About

About the same time, Ottavius the Admirall, who had brought Perseus out of Samothrace; and Anicius the Prætor, who had conquered Illyria, and taken King Gentius prisoner; made their seuerall triumphs. The glory of which magnificent spectacles; together with the confluence of Embassages from all parts; and Kings, either visiting the Imperiall Citie, or offering to visit her, and doe their duties in person; were enough to say vnto Rome, Sume superbiam, Take vpon thee the Maieutie, that thy deserts haue purchased.

BY this which we haue already set downe, is seene the beginning and end of the three first Monarchies of the world; whereof the Founders and Erectours thought, that they could neuer haue ended. That of Rome which made the fourth, was also at this time almost at the highest. We haue left it flourishing in the middle of the field; hauing rooted vp, or cut downe, all that kept it from the eyes and admiration of the world. But after some continuance, it shall begin to lose the beauty it had; the stormes of ambition shall beat her great boughes and branches one against another; her leaues shall fall off, her limbes wither, and a rabble of barbarous Nations enter the field, and cut her downe.

Now these great Kings, and conquering Nations, haue bin the subiect of those ancient Histories, which haue beene preferred, and yet remaine among vs; and withall of so many tragical Poets, as in the persons of powerful Princes, and other mightie men haue complained against Inuidie, Time, Destinie, and most of all against the Variable successe of worldly things, and Instabilitie of Fortune. To these undertakings, the greatest Lords of the world haue bene stirred vp, rather by the desire of Fame, which ploweth vp the Aire, and soweth in the Winde; than by the affection of bearing rule, which draweth after it so much vexation, and so many cares. And that this is true, the good aduice of Cineas to Pyrrius proues. And certainly, as Fame hath often beene dangerous to the liuing, so is it to the dead of no vse at all; because separate from knowledge. Which were it otherwise, which are dissolued; they themselves would then rather haue wished, to haue stolne out of the world without noyse than to be put in minde, that they haue purchased the report of their actions in the world, by rapine, oppression and crueltie, by giuing in spoile the innocent and labouring soule to the idle and insolent, and by hauing emptied the Cities of the world of their ancient Inhabitants, and filled them againe with so many and so variable sorts of sorrowes.

Since the fall of the Roman Empire (omitting that of the Germanes, which had neither greatness nor continuance) there hath beene no State fearfull in the East, but that of the Turke; nor in the West any Prince that hath spread his wings farre ouer his nest, but the Spaniards; who since the time that Ferdinand expelled the Moor out of Gransda, haue made many attempts to make themselves Masters of all Europe. And it is true, that by the treasures of both Indies, and by the many Kingdomes which they possesse in Europe, they are at this day the most powerfull. But as the Turke is now counterpoised by the Persians, so in stead of so many Millions as haue beene spent by the English, French, and Netherlands in a defensive war, and in diuisions against them, it is easie to demonstrate, that with the charge of two hundred thousand pound continued but for two yeares or three at the most, they may not only be perswaded to liue in peace, but all their swelling and ouerflowing streames may be brought backe into their naturall channels and old banks. These two Nations, I say, are at this day the most eminent, and to be regarded; the one seeking to roote out the Christian Religion altogether, the other the truth and sincere profession thereof, the one to joyne all Europe to Asia, the other the rest of all Europe to Spain.

For the rest, if we seeke a reason of the succession and continuance of this boundlesse ambition in mortall men, we may adde to that which hath been already said; That

That the Kings and Princes of the world have alwayes laid before them, the actions, but not the ends, of those great Ones which preceded them. They are alwayes transported with the glorie of the one, but they neuer minde the miserie of the other, till they find the experience in themselves. They neglect the aduice of God, while they enjoy life, or hope it; but they follow the counsell of Death, vpon his first approach. It is he that puts into man all the widome of the world, without speaking a word; which God with all the words of his Law, promises, or threats, doth not infuse. Death which hateth and destroyeth man, is beleued, God which hath made him and loues him, is alwayes deferred. I have considered (saith SALOMON) all the workes that are vnder the Sunne, and behold, all is vanitie and vexation of spirit: but who beleuees it, till Death tells it vs. It was Death, which opening the conscience of Charles the first, made him enjoye his sonne Philip to restore Nauarre; and King Francis the first of France, to command that iustice should be done vpon the Murderers of the Protestants in Merindol and Cabrières, which till then he neglected. It is therefore Death alone that can suddenly make man to know himselfe. He tells the proud and insolent, that they are but Abiects, and humbles them at the instant; makes them crie, complaine, and repent, yea, euen to hate their forerpassed happinesse. He takes the account of the rich, and proues him a begger; a naked begger, which hath interest in nothing, but in the grauell that fills his mouth. He holds a Glasse before the eyes of the most beautiful, and makes them see therein, their deformitie and rottennesse; and they acknowledge it.

O eloquent, iust and mightie Death! whom none could aduife, thou hast perswaded; what none hath dared, thou hast done; and whom all the world hath flattered, thou only hast cast out of the world and despised: thou hast drawne together all the farre stretched greatnesse, all the pride, crueltye, and ambition of man, and couered it all ouer with these two narrow words, Ere facit.

Laſtly, whereas this Booke, by the title it hath, call it ſelfe, The firſt part of the General Hiſtorie of the World, implying a Second, and Third Volume; which I alſo intended, and haue hewen out; beſides many other diſcouragements, perſwading my ſilence; it hath pleaſed God to take that glorious Prince out of the world, to whom they were directed; whoſe unſpeakable and neuer enough lamented loſſe, hath taught mee to ſay with I ſa. Verſa eſt in Luctum Citha.

The use of Chronological Tables is needfull to all Historicks, that reach to any length of time; and most of all, to those that are most general: since they cannot, like Annales, yearly set downe all Occurrences not coherent. This here following, may serve as an Index to the present Part of this Workes; pointing unto the severall matters, that having fallen out at one time, are farre daynayed in the Reason. Certainly it is not perfect: neither do I thinke, that any can be. For how many the years of the first Patriarchs may seeme to have beene well-neare compact, yet in the reignes of the Kings of Iuda and Israel, we finde manye fractions, and the last reare, or yeres, of one King recovered also as the former of another. The same is most likely to have fallen out in manye other; though not so perfectly recorded. Here may be added the diverse and imperfect formes of the yearre, which were in use among sundrie Nations: saying the * Summer Months, in proofe of some Ages, to fall in: or the Winter; and so breeding extreme confusion in the reckoning of their times. Neither is it a small part of trouble, to chuse, out of so manye, and so diversely disagreeing computations, what have already gotten authority, what may probably be held for true. All this, and a great deal more, is to be alleged, in excuse of such error as a more intenuent and perfect Calculator shall happen to finde herein. It may serve to free the Booke, and likewise the Reader (if but of meane judgement) from any notorious Anachronisme; which ought to be iustice. The Booke indeed will need it, even in that regard; not onely for (some errors of the Press; in the numbering of yeares, but for some basike mis-reckonings of mine owne; which I desire to have hereby reformed, in hope that the printing of this Table shall not want careful diligence. The Reader, if he be not offended with the rest, shall finde reason to be pleased with this, as tending wholly to his owne ease.

The Titles over the Columns, have reference to that which follows under them; as will readily be conceived. Where two Titles, or more, are over the head, as [ Rome Nabonassar ] there does the numbers underneath answer proportionally, the higher to the higher, the lower to the lower. For example: The walls of Ierusalem were destroyed in the 219. year from the building of Rome, and in the 314. from NABONASSAR. In like manner it is to be understood, That IESHOPIAT began his reign in the 3774. of the IULIAN Era in the 3092. of the World, and in the 99. year of the Temple. This needs not more illustration; nor indeed so much, to those that are acquainted with works of this kind. To avoid prolixity, I have forborne to insert those years, which I find not signed with some remarkable accident: as with the birth or death of some Patriarch; the beginning of some Kings Reign; some change of Government; some Battail fought; or the like. So, of the 13. years wherein SYLVIVS CAEPETVS reigned over the Latines, I note only the first; that is, omitting all between the 4. of IESHOPIAT, wherein CAEPETVS began, unto the 17. wherein SYLVIVS AVVENTIVS succeeded, and wherein IESHOPIAM first reigned with IESHOPIAT his father. For though it is aine to have filled up a Page with 12. lines of idle cyphers; numbering forth 2. 3. 4. 5. an I fill upwards, till I had come to the first of AVVENTIVS, and 17. of IESHOPIAT. It setting downe the Kings, there is noted over the head of euerie one, what place he held in order of Succession; as whether he were the first, second, fifth, tenth, or so forth in rank; of those that reigned in his Countrey, without notable interruption: Before the name is the first year of his reign; at the end, or foot of the name (as the space gives leave) is the whole number of years in which he reigned; in the spaces following underneath are those years of his, which were concurrent with the beginning of some other King, or with the years of anie remarkable accident. Where two numbers, or more, are found before one Kings name, there it is to be understood, that the same year belonged, not only to the King then beginning, but vnto some one, or more, of his

his fore-goes: as the first year of IEROHAM King of Israel was the same with the second of his brother AHABIA, and the 22. of his father AHAH. So, where two or three names are found in one place; as in the 3077. year of the World, ZIMRI, TIBNI, and OMRI: it is meant, that curie one of them reigned in some part of the same year, which is reckoned the second of ZLA, and the first of OMRI. Particularly, under the years of the Egyptian Kings are set down the years of those DYNASTIES, which it was thought meet to insert; as likewise, afterwards, the day of the month upon which NAONASSARS year began: which, how it varied from other years, may be found in the place last above cited.

Concerning the Æra, or account of Yerres, from I PHITTVS, who began the Olympiads, from Rome, built by NABONASSAR, and the like; as much as was thought convenient but being found, where due place was, in the book itself: as it remaineth only to note, that under the title of Olympiads is set downe first the number of the Olympiad, and beneath it, the year of that Olympiad: as that CYRVS began his raigue in Persia, in the 55. Olympiad, and the first year thereof.

Now, for that the years of the World, of the Olympiads, of Rome, of NABONASSAR, and other, had not beginning in one month, but some of them in March, some in April, some about Midsummer, and some at other times: the better to expresse their severall beginnings, some painefull Chronologers have divided them proportionally in their severall Columns; appointing part of the one year to part of the other: not (as I have here done) counting all overthwart with one freight line, as if all had begun and ended at one time. But this labour have I spared, as more trouble more than usefull, since the more part would not have apprehended the meaning, and since the learned might well be without it. It will only be needfull to observe, that henceforward the Æra of the Olympiads be 24. years elder than that of Rome, and 29. than that of NABONASSAR, yet the Æra of our King may have begun at such a time of the year as did not suite with this difference. But hence I take little regard. The more curious will easily find my meaning: the vulgar will not find the difficultie. One familiar example may explaine all. QUEENE ELIZABETH began her reign the 17. of November, in the year of our LORD 1558: Shee was crowned, held a Parliament, brake it up; shewd diverse Images; and reformed manie things in Religion; all in her first year: yet not all in that year 1558, but the greater part in the year following, whether we begin with the first of January, or with the 25. of March. The like may be observables found in this Table; but so, as the difference is never of a whole year.

The IVLIAN Period, which I have placed, as the greater number, over the years of the World, was devised by that honorable and excellently learned JOSEPH SCALIGER: being accommodated to the IVLIAN years, now in use among us. It consisteth of 798 years; which results from the multiplication of 19. 28, and 15, that is, of the Cycle of the Moone, the Cycle of the Sunne, and the years of an Indiction. Being divided by one of these, it leaves the number of the present years; or if no fraction remaine, it shewes the last year of that Cycle to be current. For example: in the 4498. of this Period, when was fought the great battaile of Canne, the Prime or Golden number was 14, the Cycle of the Sunne 18, and consequently the Dominical letter F. as may be found by dividing the same number of the IVLIAN Period 4498, by 19, for the Prime, by 28, for the Cycle of the Sunne. This IVLIAN Period, after the present account, alwayes exceeds the years of the World by 682. Besides the former Æres, and other thence redundance, it is a better Character of a year, than any other Æra (as From the beginning of the World, From the Flood, From Troy taken, or the like) which are of more uncertaine position.

Since I shall not need to write, as touching the use or explication of these Tables. Neither was thus much requisite to such as are conversant in workes of this kinde: it sufficeth if hereby all be made plaine enough to the vulgar.
